Wm. James, Q.C. and Druce, for the plaintiff, contended that the questions were whether the patron had any right to restrain waste; and secondly, whether, if he had, such right had not been taken away from him by the agreement. The licence given by this agreement to open and work minerals, for which the consent of the ordinary or the Ecclesiastical Commissioners was necessary, was invalid, where such consent had not been, as in the present case, obtained: (Knight v. Mozeley, 1 Amb. 185; Duke of Marlborough v. St. John, 5 De G. & Sm. 174; Barton v. Phillips, lately before the Lords Justices, not yet reported). This was no more than a parol licence. There was no contract that the patron was only entitled to restrain such act of waste. The licence was granted in ignorance of its illegality, which was, in fact, a fraud on the rights of the church: (Bishop of Hereford v. Storey, Cro. Eliz. 185; Bramall v. Collins, 7 Q. B. Rep. 952.) They also cited Co. Litt. 44 b; 5 & 6 Vict. c. 108, and 21 & 22 Vict. c. 57.

Little (Roll, Q.C. with him), for the defendant the incumbent, urged that the agreement was valid to all intents and purposes, and the plaintiff must be held to be bound by its provisions. It was a clearly legal transaction: (Co. Litt. 341 a and b.) That it had been communicated to the ordinary, the bishop, who had not objected, and his assent must therefore be assumed; this, in fact, might be now obtained. After allowing the licence to be acted upon for ten years, and considerable outlay upon it, if there had been a mistake as to the strict law, it was one in which both parties had participated. It was clear, therefore, he was entitled to no account. He also cited The Earl of Rutland's case, 1 Lev. 107; Co. Litt. 45 b; 4 Bac. Abr. 760; Pullen v. Ready, 2 Atk. 587; Duke of Devonshire v. Elym, 14 Beav. 530. In the cases cited on the other side, the patron had not assented to the contemplated Act.

Daniel, Q.C. and Hetherington, for the sub-lessee Pegg, supported the defendant's title.

James in reply.

The VICE-CHANCELLOR took time to consider his judgment, and on Nov. 23 said:—That any working of minerals under the glebe of an incumbency must be sanctioned by the bishop as ordinary. The bill prayed that a certain agreement of March 1851 might be set aside as null and void, to obtain an account of past workings under the agreement, and for an injunction to restrain the incumbent and his sub-lessee from further working. He had early in the argument come to the determination that the working of these mines was illegal, and the question was, whether or not such working could be made lawful by the concurrence of the ordinary. Any working of this kind must at least be sanctioned by the ordinary. He (the V.C.) had not been able to satisfy himself whether even that sanction had been sufficient. As to authorities upon the power of an incumbent to open mines, there was no decision on the point. The case of the Duke of Marlborough v. St. John had been cited, and he should have been extremely glad to have had the assistance of a decision of so able a judge as Sir James Parker, V.C. But that cause had not any material bearing upon the present question. There the acts sought to be ascertained were with respect to felling timber beyond what was necessary for repairs. This passage occurred in the judgment in that case. [The V.C. read the judgment.] His Honour then referred to the Dean and Chapter of Worcester's case, 6 Rep. 37 a, and to the Earl of Rutland's case, and said that, looking through the subsequent cases, thus much appeared to be established, first, that the incumbent could not open mines without the concurrence of the ordinary and patron; secondly, that the patron was the proper person to institute a suit to restrain such working. A MS. report of Bartlett v. Phillips (ante), had been handed to his Honour, and he said that it appeared from this report that Knight Bruce, L.J. had guarded himself very carefully in his expressions—but clearly indicated that he had not made up his mind that consent might not be given by the patron and ordinary. The question now was, what was proper to be done to make the suit available for effecting what was necessary in justice to all parties. As to the relief prayed, the patron had no right to come to the court for an account of past profits; his only right was to the injunction. No agreement would be made as to the agreement being null and void. The decree would be:—Declare that the workings of the mines in question by the defendant Weekes and his lessee, in pursuance of the agreement of the 25th March 1851, were not lawful, but the court being of opinion that the working of the mines, &c., if duly authorised, will be of benefit to the rectory, direct an inquiry as to what steps are necessary and proper to carry out such working. Direct that the agreement between the defendants Weekes and Pegg be delivered—and an account of the working of Pegg pursuant to his undertaking (with all just allowances); and declare that what shall be found due from Pegg on taking such account ought to be laid out for the permanent benefit of the rectory, subject to any future direction.

The cause was afterwards spoken to on the merits, but the judgment, in substance, remained as above.

REG. v. LEATHAM.

Corrupt Practices Prevention Act—Bribery—Limitation of proceedings—Evidence.

The 17 & 18 Vict. c. 102, s. 14 (the Corrupt Practices Prevention Act) enacts that no person shall be liable to any penalty or forfeiture hereby enacted or imposed, unless some prosecution, action, or suit for the offence committed shall be commenced against such person within the space of one year next after such offence against this Act shall be committed, and unless such person shall be summoned or otherwise served with a writ or process within the same space of time.

Quere, whether this section applies to an information for a misdemeanor, and not for a penalty or forfeiture.

The defendant was indicted in the first count of an indictment for having paid a sum of money to A., with the intent that it should be expended in bribery at an election, and he was indicted in the others with having bribed different voters, when he was found guilty upon all the counts. The evidence was that he paid the money to W., who paid it to A.,

with the intent as stated in the first count, and that A., and not the defendant, personally bribed the different electors:

Held, that this was ground only for an application to the court at the trial that the prosecutor should be compelled to elect upon which of the charges he would proceed, that of having advanced money for the purpose of bribery, or for each distinct act of bribery committed by the agent, he being liable as a principal to be found guilty of the misdemeanor.

Information, dated 22nd May 1860, states:—Be it remembered that Sir Richard Bethell, Knight, Attorney-General of our Sovereign Lady the Queen, who for our said Lady the Queen prosecutes in this behalf in his proper person, comes into the court of our said Lady the Queen, before the Queen herself at Westminster, on the 22nd May in this same term, and for our said Lady the Queen gives the court here to understand and be informed that heretofore, to wit, on the 29th April 1859, at the borough of Wakefield, in the county of York, a certain election was duly had and held for the electing of a burgess to serve in this present Parliament for the said borough of Wakefield, and that before and at the time of the committing of the several offences hereinafter mentioned, William Henry Leatham was a candidate to be elected and returned at the said election as a burgess so to serve in Parliament for the said borough of Wakefield. And the said Attorney-General for our said Lady the Queen further gives the court here to understand and be informed, that heretofore and before the said election was so had and held as aforesaid, to wit, on the 26th April in the year aforesaid, the said William H. Leatham, so then being such candidate as aforesaid, unlawfully, wilfully and corruptly did advance and pay to one Thomas Field Gilbert certain money, to wit, the sum of 2000*l.*, with the intent that such money or some part thereof should be expended in bribery at the said election, in contempt of our Lady the Queen and her laws, to the evil example of all others in the like case offending, against the form of the statute in such case made and provided, and against the peace of our Lady the Queen, her crown and dignity.

Second count.—And the said Attorney-General for our said Lady the Queen further gives the said court here to understand and be informed, that heretofore and before the said election in the first count of this information mentioned was so had and held as therein mentioned, to wit, on the day and year last aforesaid, the said W. H. Leatham, so then being such candidate as therein mentioned, unlawfully, wilfully and corruptly did give and cause to be given to Samuel Croft, he the said Samuel Croft then being a person entitled to vote at the said election for the said borough of Wakefield, certain money, to wit, the sum of 30*l.*, in order thereby to induce the said Samuel Croft to vote at the said election for him the said W. H. Leatham, to be thereat elected and returned a burgess to serve in Parliament for the said borough of Wakefield as aforesaid; and so the said Attorney-General for our said Lady the Queen gives the said court here to understand and be informed, that the said W. H. Leatham, in manner and by the means last aforesaid, unlawfully, wilfully and corruptly did bribe the said Samuel Croft, so then being such person entitled to vote at the said election as aforesaid, to give his vote at the said election for him the said W. H. Leatham, to be so thereat elected and returned as aforesaid, in contempt of our said Lady the Queen and her laws, to the evil example of all others in the like case offending, against the form of the statute in such case made and provided, and against the peace of our said Lady the Queen, her crown and dignity.

Third count.—And the said Attorney-General for our said Lady the Queen further gives the said court here to understand and be informed, that heretofore and before the said election in the first count of this information mentioned was so had and held as therein mentioned, to wit, on the day and year last aforesaid, the said W. H. Leatham, so then being such candidate as therein mentioned, unlawfully, wilfully and corruptly did give and cause to be given to John Burton Rhodes, he the said John Burton Rhodes then being a person entitled to vote at the election for the said borough of Wakefield, certain money, to wit, the sum of 40*l.*, in order thereby to induce the said J. B. Rhodes to vote at the said election for him the said W. H. Leatham to be thereat elected and returned a burgess to serve in Parliament for the said borough of Wakefield as aforesaid; and so the said Attorney-General for our said Lady the Queen gives the said court here to understand and be informed, that the said W. H. Leatham, in manner and by the means last aforesaid, unlawfully, wilfully and corruptly did bribe the said J. B. Rhodes, so then being such person entitled to vote at the said election aforesaid, to give his vote at the said election for him the said W. H. Leatham to be so thereat elected and returned as aforesaid, in contempt of our said Lady the Queen and her laws, to the evil example of all others in the like case offending, against the form of the statute in such case made and provided, and against the peace of our said Lady the Queen, her crown and dignity.

Fourth count.—And the said Attorney-General for our said Lady the Queen further gives the said court here to understand and be informed, that heretofore and before the said election in the first count of this information mentioned was so had and held as therein mentioned, to wit, on the day and year last aforesaid, the said W. H. Leatham, so then being such candidate as therein mentioned, unlawfully, wilfully and corruptly did give and cause to be given, to wit, by one Robert Sharpley on his behalf, to John Firman Tower, he then being a person entitled to vote at the said election for the said borough of Wakefield, certain money, to wit, the sum of 40*l.*, in order thereby to induce the said J. F. Tower to vote at the said election for him the said W. H. Leatham to be thereat elected and returned a burgess to serve in Parliament for the said borough of Wakefield as aforesaid; and so the said Attorney-General for our said Lady the Queen gives the court here to understand and be informed, that the said W. H. Leatham, in manner and by means last aforesaid, unlawfully, wilfully and corruptly did bribe the said J. F. Tower, so then being such person entitled to vote at the said election as aforesaid, to give his vote at the said election for him the said W. H. Leatham to be so thereat elected and returned as aforesaid, in contempt of our said Lady the Queen and her laws, to the evil example of all others in the like case offending, against the form of the statute in such case made and provided, and against the peace of our said Lady the Queen, her crown and dignity.

Fifth count.—And the said Attorney-General for our said Lady the Queen further gives the said court here to understand and be informed, that heretofore and before the said election in the first count of this information mentioned was so had and held as therein mentioned, to wit, on the day and year last aforesaid, the said W. H. Leatham, so then being such candidate as therein mentioned, unlawfully, wilfully and corruptly did give and cause to be given to George Wainwright, he the said G. Wainwright then being a person entitled to vote at the said election for the said borough of Wakefield, certain money, to wit, 20*l.*, in order thereby to induce the said G. Wainwright to vote at the said election for him the said W. H. Leatham to be thereat elected and returned a burgess to serve in Parliament for the said borough of Wakefield as aforesaid; and so the said Attorney-General for our Lady the Queen gives the court here to understand and be informed, that the said W. H. Leatham, in manner and by the means last aforesaid, unlawfully, wilfully and corruptly did bribe the said G. Wainwright, so then being such person entitled to vote at the said election aforesaid, to give his vote at the said election for him the said W. H. Leatham to be so thereat elected and returned as aforesaid, in contempt of our said Lady the Queen and her laws, to the evil example of all others in the like case offending, against the form of the statute in such case made and provided, against the peace of our said Lady the Queen, her crown and dignity.

Sixth count.—And the said Attorney-General for our said Lady the Queen further gives the said court here to understand and be informed, that heretofore and before the said election in the first count of this information mentioned was so had and held as therein mentioned, to wit, on the day and year last aforesaid, the said W. H. Leatham, so then being such candidate as therein mentioned, unlawfully, wilfully and corruptly did give and cause to be given, to wit, by one Wm. Woodhead on his behalf, to Wm. Cheeseborough, he the said W. Cheeseborough then being a person entitled to vote at the said election for the said borough of Wakefield, certain money, to wit, the sum of 35*l.*, in order thereby to induce the said W. Cheeseborough to vote at the said election for him the said W. H. Leatham to be thereat elected and returned a burgess to serve in Parliament for the said borough of Wakefield as aforesaid; and so the said Attorney-General for our said Lady the Queen gives the said court here to understand and be informed, that the said W. H. Leatham, in manner and by the means last aforesaid, unlawfully, wilfully and corruptly did bribe the said W. Cheeseborough, so then being such person entitled to vote at the said election as aforesaid, to give his vote at the said election for him the said W. H. Leatham to be so thereat elected and returned as aforesaid, in contempt of our said Lady the Queen and her laws, to the evil example of all others in the like case offending, against the form of the statute in such case made and provided, and against the peace of our said Lady the Queen, her crown and dignity.

Seventh count.—And the said Attorney-General for our said Lady the Queen further gives the said court here to understand and be informed, that heretofore and before the said election in the first count of this information mentioned was so had and held as aforesaid, to wit, on the day and year last aforesaid, the said W. H. Leatham, so then being such candidate as in the said first count mentioned, unlawfully, wilfully and corruptly did give and cause to be given to Charles Clarkson, he the said Charles Clarkson then being a person entitled to vote at the said election, certain money, to wit, the sum of 30*l.*, in order thereby to induce the said C. Clarkson to give his vote at the said election for him the said W. H. Leatham to be thereat elected and returned a burgess to serve in Parliament for the said borough of Wakefield as aforesaid; and so the Attorney-General for our said Lady the Queen gives the said court here to understand and be informed, that the said W. H. Leatham, in manner and by the means aforesaid, unlawfully, wilfully and corruptly did bribe the said C. Clarkson so then being such person entitled to vote at the said election as aforesaid, to give his vote at the said election for him the said W. H. Leatham to be so thereat elected and returned as aforesaid, in contempt of our said Lady the Queen and her laws, to the evil example of all others in like case offending, against the form of the statute in such case made and provided, and against the peace of our said Lady the Queen, her crown and dignity. And therefore the said Attorney-General of our said Lady the Queen prays the consideration of the said court here in the premises, and that due process of law may be awarded against him the said W. H. Leatham in his behalf to make him answer to our said

Lady the Queen touching and concerning the premises aforesaid.

RICHARD BETHELL.

Plea, not guilty. Issue thereon.

The indictment was tried at York summer assizes 1860, before Martin, B., and a verdict found for the Crown.

Sir F. Kelly (Edward James, Mellish and Quain with him) moved for a new trial on the ground of misdirection.—First, under the 17 & 18 Vict. c. 102, s. 14, the prosecution should have been commenced within one year of the offence being committed. Here the information was filed on the 22nd May 1859, and the latest of the offences charged was committed on the 26th April 1858. This information therefore was not filed in time. Secondly, the defendant was not liable to be convicted both upon the first count and the several other counts. The only act the defendant was proved to have done was, that he gave 2000*l.* to Wainwright for the purposes of the election. Wainwright employed Gilbert, who was the agent who bribed the several persons mentioned in the second, third, fourth, fifth and sixth counts of the indictment. There is no instance of a person having been convicted of two offences created by the same section of a statute for one act only done by him. There was no evidence of any specific authority to Wainwright to bribe at all, still less to put money into the hands of Gilbert or Sharpley for that purpose. Thirdly, there was no evidence of the defendant having bribed the voters himself, as charged in the second, third, fourth, fifth, sixth and seventh counts of the indictment. Fourthly, the giving of the money to Wainwright was not the giving of it to Gilbert, as charged in the first count. Fifthly, inadmissible evidence was received. Certain letters which passed between Wainwright and Leatham were put in evidence compulsorily before the commission to inquire into corrupt practices at the Wakefield election under the 15 & 16 Vict. c. 57, s. 8. These letters are now exempted from being admitted as evidence for any purpose whatever: (sect. 9.)

Cur. adv. vult.

COCKBURN, C.J.—In this case the Attorney-General, on the 22nd May last, filed an information against the defendant, charging him, in the first count, with having, on the 26th April 1859, paid to one Thomas Field Gilbert money with intent that it should be applied in bribery at an election for a member of Parliament for Wakefield. There were several other counts, in which the defendant was charged with actual bribery of several persons who were respectively named in those counts. The defendant was found guilty generally. Sir F. Kelly, on behalf of the defendant, on the first day of term, took several objections to the proceedings. The first objection was that the prosecution was out of time, as the offence in each count was laid, and by the evidence was committed, if at all, more than a year before the filing the information and issuing the process upon it. The second ground of objection, as we understood it, was, that as the defendant was found guilty upon the first count, he ought not to have been found guilty upon the other counts, it appearing that there was but one act, namely, that of paying money by him to an agent, so that the actual bribery was by the agent without communication with the defendant as to the individuals whom he was said to have bribed; and that if the present proceedings were good, a man might be prosecuted, convicted and punished more than once for what was, in fact, but one act actually done by him. The third ground of objection was, that the case for the prosecution being that the defendant had employed subordinate agents by whom the bribes were given, the defendant could not be found guilty of having bribed the voters himself. The fourth ground of objection was, that the defendant was stated in the first count to have paid money to one Gilbert, whereas the evidence was that he had paid it to one Wainwright, who had afterwards paid it to Gilbert but without any direction or interference by the defendant. The fifth ground of objection was, that a document produced compulsorily upon the inquiry of the commissioners under the 15 & 16 Vict. c. 57, was received in evidence against the defendant at the trial. With respect to the first of these objections, if it be one, it appears upon the record and may be taken advantage of in arrest of judgment or writ of error, and it is therefore unnecessary for the court to interfere on motion. But we are strongly disposed to think that the objection is untenable, and that the limitation applies only to proceedings for penalties or forfeitures given by the statute. The words are, "No person shall be liable to any penalty or forfeiture hereby enacted or imposed unless some prosecution, action, or suit for the offence committed shall be commenced against such person within the space of one year next after such offence against this Act shall be committed, and unless such person shall be summoned or otherwise served with a writ or process within the same space of time." The present is not a proceeding for a penalty or forfeiture, but it is an information for a misdemeanor, and is, it seems to us, not within the terms of the 14th section of the 17 & 18 Vict. c. 102. This view becomes strongly confirmed when it is borne in mind that the Act we are considering refers specifically to process applicable only to civil proceedings, and not to an indictment for misdemeanor. With respect to the second objection it appears to us that it is now too late to make it, and that, if available at all, it would only be by application at the trial that the prosecutor should be compelled to elect upon which of the charges laid in the information he would proceed. Upon the face of the information each count contains a charge of a separate offence, and, in point of law, there is no objection to any number of misdemeanors, nor even of felonies, being charged in separate counts in one indictment, provided the judgment be the same for each. There is no doubt that a man by one and the same act may commit two or more several and distinct offences. A man wrongfully intending to kill A. fires a gun at him, but misses him, and kills, without intending it, B. and C. There is but one act, but he would be liable to be indicted three times: for the homicide of B., for that of C., and for shooting at A. with intent to kill him. By the 17 & 18 Vict. c. 102, s. 2, art. 5, paying money to any person with intent that such person should use it to bribe electors, is declared to be equivalent to bribery, and, as such, a misdemeanor, though no person was actually bribed; and by article first the giving money to an elector to induce him to vote is declared to be bribery, and as such a misdemeanor. But the offences are not the same, though it may be said that they arise from one and the same act. If, however, they were in law the same, a conviction or acquittal upon a charge founded upon the fifth article might, with proper averments, be pleaded to another indictment founded upon the first; and if, as in the present case, both charges were included in one indictment, the court before whom the case was tried might, in its discretion, put the prosecutor to his election upon the application of the defendant; but, as no such application was made in the present case, we do not see upon what ground we can interfere. With respect to the third objection, we are of opinion that if a man employs an agent to corrupt voters, and that agent in carrying such general instructions into effect employs subordinate agents within the scope of the authority received from the principal, such principal, with reference to the express terms of this statute, as well as upon general principles of law, will be guilty of a misdemeanor as a principal in the transaction. The fourth ground of objection appears to be a serious one, and upon that we think there should be a rule. With respect to the fifth objection, we are strongly disposed to think that the proviso to the 5th section of the 15 & 16 Vict. c. 57, only applies to "statements" properly so called, made by any person in answer to questions put to him, and not to documents produced by such persons. As, however, this is a point not free from doubt, and of general importance, we think there should be a rule as to that. We think, therefore, that there should be a rule upon the fourth and fifth objections, and none upon the first, second and third.

REG. v. JAMES CRAWSHAW.

Lotteries—Evidence of keeping—Indictment—Verdict accompanied with a recommendation—Ignorance of law.

By the 10 & 11 Will. 3, c. 17, s. 1, lotteries are declared common and public nuisances. Sect. 2, which came into operation on a subsequent day, rendered persons keeping lotteries liable to a penalty to be sued for by information or action. The 42 Geo. 3, c. 119, contained similar enactments:

Held, that the keeping a lottery was an indictable offence.

The defendant kept an eating-house, and sold tickets for what was called "The Great Eastern Money Club," in respect of which prizes were drawn, and the holders of the tickets whose numbers were drawn for prizes received the same; and the defendant delivered out the prizes to such ticket-holders:

Held, that this evidence was sufficient to support a conviction against the defendant of keeping a lottery, but not sufficient to support a charge of keeping a house for betting upon horse-racing, under the 16 & 17 Vict. c. 119.

The jury returned a verdict of guilty, but recommended the prisoner to mercy, on the ground that perhaps he did not know that he was acting contrary to law:

Held, that the conviction was not invalidated by the addition to the verdict.

Case reserved for the opinion of this court by the chairman at the general quarter sessions of the peace for the county of Lancaster, holden by adjournment at Salford, in the said county, on the 27th, 28th and 29th days of Aug. 1860.

James Crawshaw was tried on the following indictment:—

County of Lancaster, to wit.—The jurors for our Lady the Queen, upon their oath present, that J. Crawshaw, on the 28th July 1860, and on divers other days and times between that day and the taking of this inquisition, at the borough of Ashton-under-Lyne, in the county of Lancaster, unlawfully did set up, keep and maintain a certain lottery, to wit, a little-go, to the great damage and common nuisance of all the liege subjects of our said Lady the Queen there inhabiting and residing, and to the evil example of all others in the like case offending, and against the form of the statutes in such case made and provided, and against the peace of our said Lady the Queen, her crown and dignity.

Second count.—And the jurors aforesaid, upon their oath aforesaid do further present, that the said J. Crawshaw on the said 28th July 1860, and on divers other days and times between that day and the taking of this inquisition, at the borough of Ashton-under-Lyne aforesaid, unlawfully did set up, conduct and maintain a certain lottery not authorised by Parliament, in which said lottery prizes were awarded to the subscribers thereto, for whom certain numbers were drawn, to the great damage and common nuisance of all the liege subjects of our Lady the Queen there inhabiting and being, and to the evil example of all others in like case offending, and against the form of the statutes in such case made and provided, and against the peace of our Lady the Queen, her crown and dignity.

Third count.—And the jurors aforesaid, upon their oath aforesaid, do further present, that the said J. Crawshaw, on the said 28th July 1860, and on divers other days and times between that day and the taking of this inquisition, at the borough of Ashton-under-Lyne aforesaid, did unlawfully open, keep and use a certain room in a certain house, to wit, a house in Old-street, in the said borough, which said room and house were then occupied by him the said J. Crawshaw for the purpose of money being received by the said J. Crawshaw, then being the occupier of such room as aforesaid, as the consideration for securing the paying by some other persons, to wit, the Great Eastern Money Club, of money on the event of a certain horse-race, to the great damage and common nuisance of all the liege subjects of our Lady the Queen there inhabiting, being, residing, and passing, to the evil example of all others in like case offending, against the form of the statute in such case made and provided, and against the peace of our Lady the Queen, her crown and dignity.

Fourth count.—And the jurors aforesaid, upon their oath aforesaid, do further present, that the said J. Crawshaw, on the said 28th July 1860, did unlawfully open, keep and use a certain room in a certain house, to wit, a house in Old-street, in the said borough, which said room and house were then occupied by him the said J. Crawshaw for the purpose of money being received by the said J. Crawshaw, then being the occupier of such room as aforesaid, as the consideration for an undertaking by him the said J. Crawshaw to pay money on the contingency of horse-races, to the great damage and common nuisance of all the liege subjects of our Lady the Queen there inhabiting, being, residing and passing, to the evil example of all others in like case offending, against the form of the statute in such case made and provided, and against the peace of our Lady the Queen, her crown and dignity.

Fifth count.—And the jurors aforesaid, upon their oath aforesaid, do further present, that the said J. Crawshaw, on the said 28th July 1860, and on divers other days and times between that day and the taking of this inquisition, did unlawfully set up, keep, maintain and conduct a lottery not authorised by Parliament, to the common nuisance of all the liege subjects of our Lady the Queen, and to the evil example of all others in like case offending, contrary to the form of the statute in that case made and provided, and against the peace of our said Lady the Queen, her crown and dignity.

The first witness who was called was John Preston. His evidence was as follows:—I am a police constable of the parish of Ashton-under-Lyne. I know the defendant; he lives in Old-street, Ashton-under-Lyne, and keeps an eating-house there. On the 28th July last I saw in his window a placard—a large one. After seeing it I went into the house; his wife was there, and the defendant was in the shop-place also. I said "I want a horse-ticket." I was not in uniform. His wife gave me one out of a drawer. I paid sixpence for it. I asked her "When and where do they draw?" She said, "It will be drawn on Monday night, where I do not know; it is not drawn regularly at the same place." I then came away. Defendant was present at the time. On Monday the 30th July I went again; defendant and his wife were in. I bought another horse-ticket. The defendant's wife served me from the same drawer. I paid sixpence for it. I asked when and where it would be drawn. Defendant's wife said, "To-night; but I do not know where." I purchased the same day a list. This is it (the list is annexed, marked B). I paid a half-penny for it. I examined it to look whether my ticket purchased on the first occasion was a prize. In consequence of what I saw there, I went the next morning, Tuesday the 31st, to the defendant's house, and took with me the first ticket I had bought. I gave it to the defendant, and said there is a prize for this, and gave it to him. He went into the kitchen, as if to look whether it was so, and returned and gave me 4s. 10d. I asked him why he did not give me the 5s. He only laughed. My other ticket was not a prize. I afterwards gave it to chief constable Dalglish. This is it (this ticket is annexed, marked A). Both the tickets were for the same drawing.

Cross-examined.—I went to defendant's by direction of my superintendent. I went alone. I can't say whether defendant knew me. I had then been a police constable at Ashton-under-Lyne but a few weeks. The first time I went was at half-past four p.m. on the Saturday. I saw no one there the first time but defendant and his wife.

The next witness called was William Chadwick, whose evidence was as follows:—I am an inspector of police at Ashton-under-Lyme. On Thursday the 2nd Aug. last I apprehended the prisoner under a warrant. I went to his place and found there four placards stuck up in the window (the four placards are annexed and marked respectively with the letters C, D, E, F). I asked defendant to hand me what tickets he had, and his wife handed me from a drawer in the counter these tickets now produced. (The tickets taken from the drawer and now produced in court purported to be tickets in two different money clubs, White South Union Weekly Money Club, and the Great Eastern Money Club. These tickets were not each on separate pieces of paper, but a number printed in succession on the same slip of paper, but so as to be easily separated one from the other. There were seventy-six in all produced, fifty-six in the first above-mentioned, and twenty in the last above-mentioned club. A few tickets of each are annexed, marked respectively with the letters H and I.)

This, with some formal evidence, closed the case for the prosecution.

The counsel for the defendant contended that the first, second and fifth counts of the indictment were bad in substance; that an indictment did not lie, either under the statute 10 & 11 Will. 3, c. 17, or under the statute 42 Geo. 3, c. 119; that in the case of both these statutes an offender could not be proceeded against under the 1st section taken by itself, but must be proceeded against, if at all, under the 2nd and 3rd sections.

They also contended that the third and fourth counts of the indictment were bad in substance; that the statute 16 & 17 Vict. c. 119, did not apply at all to the case; that there was no proof of the defendant's house being a betting-house within the meaning of that statute; that there was no proof of the event or contingency here being such a one as is provided for in that statute.

The Court overruled these objections.

The counsel for the defence then submitted that there was no evidence for the jury in support of the first, second and fifth counts.

The Court decided that there was.

The counsel for the defendant then addressed the jury, who found the defendant guilty on each count of the indictment, but recommended him to mercy, on the ground "that perhaps he did not know he was acting contrary to law."

The counsel for the defendant submitted that this was a verdict for the defendant.

The Court ruled otherwise, but allowed the defendant to go out on bail until the next Hilary sessions, and now submit the case for the opinion of this court, as to whether the objections taken by the counsel for the defendant, or any and which of them, are well-founded and ought to prevail.

Dr. Wheeler (Kaye with him) for the prisoner.—
This is not an indictable offence under either of the statutes, 10 & 11 Will. 3, c. 17, s. 1, or the 42 Geo. 3, c. 119. If an offence has been committed against those statutes the remedy is by proceedings according to the statutes. Though the 1st section of 10 & 11 Will. 3 contains a prohibition, and, under ordinary circumstances an indictment would lie for an infringement of it, yet in the second section the remedy is provided, and that is the proper course of proceeding. The 2nd section enacts, that from and after the 29th Dec. 1699 these offences shall be punishable by a penalty, to be recovered by information, bill, plaint, or action at law. The 1st section came into operation at an earlier date than the second one, and therefore, if the 1st section gave a separate and independent remedy, the result would be that, under the 1st section, an offender was liable to an indictment and a severer penalty than he would be under sect. 2. It is submitted that these are not cumulative provisions, and that the statute which creates the offence also provides the remedy. Moreover, there would have been no object in the 2nd section, if a remedy by indictment had been provided by the 1st. The reason for postponing the operation of sect. 2 was probably that the 1st section created the prohibition, and it was desirable to grant time by way of warning the public before making the penalty attach.

[Q. B.]

ERLE, C.J.—Is not sect. 2 a power to common informers to sue for penalties?

CROMPTON, J.—How does this point arise? Is this a proceeding in arrest of judgment?

Wheeler.—The objection was taken in the ordinary way at the close of the case for the prosecution.

ERLE, C.J.—We will treat this case as a motion in arrest of judgment.

Wheeler.—The object then was to give warning that a lottery was a common and public nuisance. Before the passing of the statute of 10 & 11 Will. 3, lotteries were common all over England. The same argument applies to the counts framed upon the 42 Geo. 3, c. 119, the 1st section of which enacts that from and after the passing of that Act, lotteries and little-goes shall be deemed a public nuisance, and in the same manner as the statute of Will. 3, the 2nd section enacts that from the 1st July 1802 persons keeping lottery offices shall be liable to a penalty, and be deemed rogues and vagabonds.

CROMPTON, J.—Blackstone ranks lotteries among common nuisances, though he does not say so in so many words.

Wheeler.—The 1st section speaks of the thing as a nuisance, and the 2nd deals with the persons practising it. The cases of Rex v. Gregory, 5 B. & Ad. 555, and Rex v. Harris, 4 T. R. 205, and Dwarris on Statutes were then cited as to the construction of sections like these. Secondly, supposing this to have been an indictable offence, there was no evidence for the jury on which they were justified in finding the defendant guilty. There ought to be evidence of a lottery or a determination by lot brought home to the defendant. There was no evidence that the place was a place, or the game a game, within the mischief of the Act, or to connect the defendant with the distribution of prizes. An agency should have been proved against the defendant. The distribution of prizes may have been in some other manner than by lot. The third and fourth counts are not made out. There was no proof that this was a betting-house within the Act 16 & 17 Vict. c. 119. There must be evidence of a lottery to make an offence; but what evidence is there of the defendant's setting up, keeping and maintaining a lottery? The case of Ryder v. Wood, 29 L. J. 1, M. C., was then cited.

No counsel appeared to argue on behalf of the prosecution.

ERLE, C.J.—We have considered this case, and are of opinion that the evidence bearing on the counts relating to horse-racing was not sufficient to support those counts. With respect to the counts on the Lottery Acts, we are of opinion that there was evidence for the jury which justified them in coming to the conclusion they did. This was virtually the purchase of a ticket in a lottery, in the expectation of drawing a prize. The defendant was concerned both in selling the ticket and delivering out the prizes to the purchaser, and the jury were well justified in inferring that he was intimately connected with the lottery. The objection that there was no evidence to support those counts therefore fails. We have looked at the verdict of the jury recommending the defendant to mercy, as perhaps he was not acquainted with the law, and we are, nevertheless, of opinion that the conviction is valid.

Ignorance of the statute is no excuse for the violation of its provisions. That ground does not annul the verdict. The great point in Mr. Wheeler's argument is really one in arrest of judgment. The defendant was indicted for a misdemeanor supposed to have been created by the 10 & 11 Will. 3, which in the 1st section declares that the keeping of a lottery shall be a common and public nuisance, and in the 2nd section prohibits all persons from keeping lotteries, under a penalty of 500*l.*, at the suit of a common informer, or if not so prosecuted, makes them liable as vagrants or rogues; and the second part of the Act came into operation at a different time to the first. It was contended that that was a declaration that it was not intended that the first enactment should be the subject of an indictment, and that the proper remedy was under the 2nd section, and therefore that this indictment could not be sustained. We have attended to that argument, but we find a principle to have prevailed for a long time, that where the Legislature declares a thing to be a common and public nuisance, the person who does the act renders himself liable to an indictment. I take the case of Rex v. Gregory to be an application of that principle by a court of very great authority. That principle is an answer to the objection. We therefore hold that those counts which are framed on the Lottery Acts are not bad in point of law. The result will be, that the conviction will be affirmed on these counts.

The rest of the Court concurring,

Conviction affirmed.

COBBETT v. WHEELER AND ANOTHER.

Ejectment—Turnpike—Mortgage of tolls—Costs of nonsuit—Liability to.

Plaintiff, as personal representative of a deceased mortgagee of turnpike tolls, sued the lessees of the tolls as tenants in possession of the toll-house, to recover possession of them. A trustee was let in to defend as landlord, and at the trial the plaintiff was nonsuited. Defendants afterwards signed judgment and arrested the plaintiff for the costs of the nonsuit:

Held, that the plaintiff was liable for such costs under the stat. of 4 Jac. 1, c. 3.

Ejectment by the plaintiff as the personal representative of a mortgagee of the tolls of a turnpike-road, in the county of Hants, to recover the toll-gates. The action was brought against the defendants as the tenants in possession, being the lessees of the tolls. Subsequently one of the turnpike trustees named Jenkins was admitted to defend as landlord, under the C. L. P. A., 15 & 16 Vict. c. 76, s. 172.

The action was tried at the spring assizes 1856, for the county of Hampshire, before Crowder, J., when the plaintiff, failing to give sufficient evidence of the existence of the mortgage, was nonsuited.

Subsequently the defendants signed judgment, and took the plaintiff in execution for the costs of the nonsuit.

On a former day in this term the plaintiff obtained a rule nisi to set aside the judgment, so far as related to costs, on the ground that the statute of 4 Jac. 1, c. 3, giving defendants costs in cases of nonsuit, did not apply to the case of the defendants, who are sued under the General Turnpike Act in respect of matters relating to the trust.

Lush and Thring showed cause.—On the part of the plaintiff it is said that no costs are payable in case of a plaintiff suing turnpike trustees. [HILL, J.—It was said that the defendants, as trustees, were not liable to costs, and that therefore the plaintiff was not.] The case of Wormwell v. Hailstone, 6 Bing. 658, which was cited for that proposition, was a case where the trustees of a turnpike-road were sued in the name of the defendant their clerk, according to the 3 Geo. 4, c. 126, s. 74, which enacts that the trustees may sue and be sued in the name of their clerk, and it was held that the property of the clerk was not liable to be taken in execution to satisfy the judgment. That was so held upon a proviso in sect. 74 in these words:—"Provided always, that every trustee, commissioner, clerk or clerks, shall be reimbursed and paid out of moneys belonging to the turnpike-road for which he or they shall act, all such charges, costs and expenses as he or they shall be put unto or become chargeable with, or liable to by reason of his or their being so made plaintiff or plaintiffs, defendant or defendants." The present case is distinguishable. This action is brought against the lessees of the tolls, and necessarily so, because they are the tenants in possession; and if the trustee had not come in to defend, there could be no doubt but that the defendants would be entitled to their costs. Then why are they to be deprived of them, because it happens that another person is let in to defend? But sects. 186 and 187 of the C. L. P. A. 1852, seem to provide for the defendant's costs in ejectment in such a case as this. This case, however, is certainly not within that of Wormwell v. Hailstone. Then, as to the statute of 4 Jac. 1, c. 3, it is submitted that this case falls within it, and that the defendants are entitled to their costs of nonsuit in pursuance of it. The provision in the statute of Jac. 1 is, that if any person shall commence or sue in any court of record, or in any other court, any action, bill, or plaint of trespass, or ejectione firmæ, or any other action whatsoever, wherein the plaintiff or defendant might have costs (in case judgment should be given for him), and the plaintiff is nonsuited, or the defendant has a verdict, the defendant is to be entitled to his costs. This statute only defines the class of actions in which defendants shall be entitled to their costs, and does not limit that right in the way contended for by the plaintiff.

SIBBET v. AINSLEY.

The plaintiff in person supported the rule.

COCKBURN, C.J.—I am of opinion this rule ought to be discharged. Several questions arise: first, whether the case is within the statute 4 Jac. 1, c. 3, which gives costs to a defendant on the nonsuit of the plaintiff? Whether the words "any other action wherein the plaintiff or the demandant might have his costs in case judgment should be given for him" apply only to the class of actions immediately before referred to, or only serve to define another class of actions to which the statute of Henry the Eighth is extended. It is a grave question whether Mr. Lush's construction of the statute is not the right one; but I will assume that Mr. Cobbett's argument is right. Then arises the question upon sect. 74 of the General Turnpike Act. Does that give immunity for costs to the defendants? Mr. Cobbett relies on the case of Wormwell v. Hailstone. If it were necessary to decide this case on the words of the proviso at the end of sect. 74, I should consider it incumbent to reconsider the case of Wormwell v. Hailstone. I own it appears to me that the effect of the proviso is not to divest the adverse party of his right to look to the other party, whoever he may be, for his costs, but merely to give that party, when the costs have been paid, an indefeasible right to compensation for them out of the funds of the turnpike trust. I will assume, however, that the effect of the proviso is to compel the plaintiff suing a person who defends on behalf of the trustees to resort to the trust-funds to recover his costs. Still, to bring the case within the statute of James, the condition is, that the action must be one wherein the plaintiff or demandant might have costs in case judgment is given for him. That brings us to the question, whether the plaintiff in this case, if successful, might have had his costs. Turning to sect. 48 of the General Turnpike Act, it is clear that Mr. Cobbett, if he had been successful, would have been entitled to his costs, and he would have been entitled to sign judgment and take out execution for his costs; and the trustees must have satisfied them before he would have been bound to give up possession of the toll-houses. There is another serious difficulty in the way of the plaintiff; that is, in this case there are two other defendants necessarily made defendants—the lessees of the tolls, who were entitled to have execution for their costs. They would have been liable to Mr. Cobbett in costs if he had succeeded, and therefore, on the other hand, they are entitled to execution for their costs, he having failed. This rule must be discharged.

HILL, J.—I am of the same opinion. Assuming Mr. Cobbett's argument on the statute of James to be right, still the ground of his motion wholly fails, for if he had succeeded he would have been entitled to sign judgment for recovering possession of the toll-gates, and also for his costs of suit; and therefore the defendants are entitled to the costs of the nonsuit.

Rule discharged.

SIBBET (appellant) v. AINSLEY (respondent).

Father neglecting to maintain child—Paternity denied—Evidence—5 Geo. 4, c. 83, s. 3.

A. was summoned before justices, under 5 Geo. 4, c. 83, s. 3, for wilfully refusing to maintain his child. He and his wife had lived separate for about three years before the birth of the child in question, though in the same town: she led a disreputable and profligate life, and he always avoided her, and she had been seen as a prostitute in company with several men, and the child was born in a gaol. The justices dismissed the summons, holding that the legal presumption that the husband was the father of the child was rebutted by this evidence:

Held, that the justices came to a right conclusion.

Case stated under the 20 & 21 Vict. c. 43.

The respondent was charged before a justice of the peace at the petty sessions, Newcastle-upon-Tyne (11th May, 1860), by the overseer of the chapelry of St. John in that town, with neglecting to support his child, which became chargeable to the said chapelry. The justice dismissed the summons, and stated the following case for the opinion of this court:—

At the hearing of the information it was admitted that the respondent had been duly married to his present wife Sarah; that three years ago they had separated, and that since such separation the respondent had resided in Newcastle-upon-Tyne, and it was proved to my satisfaction that they had not since lived together; that the child in question was the child of the wife of the respondent; that it was born in Durham Gaol on the 23rd Aug. last, that on the 20th April last it became and still is chargeable to the parish or parochial chapelry of St. John; that the respondent is able to work and maintain himself and his family; and that since the separation of the respondent and his wife she had lived in Newcastle, except for short periods of time. It was proved by the evidence of four police officers, that during the last two years the wife of the respondent had led a very disreputable and profligate life; that during that period she had been seen frequently at all hours of the night in company with men other than her husband, alone in passages, lanes, and retired places, and that she had been seen in brothels. (Two specific instances of adultery were then stated as proved.)

That on another occasion within the last two years she was found one night in a passage alone with a man, not her husband, by a police officer, other than the last two mentioned, and was taken out of it by him and sent away. It was also proved before me, that the respondent has been perfectly well aware of the sort of life his wife has been leading during the last two years. That in consequence he had most anxiously and constantly avoided her. That during that period she had very frequently annoyed him by hanging about the outside of his house, and shouting at and abusing him. That he has always done his utmost to keep her away from him, and has frequently sent for the police and ordered them to remove her, which they have done.

It was contended on behalf of the appellant that, as the respondent had since his separation from his wife lived in the same town as that in which she had resided for the most part during that period, access between them being possible must be presumed, and that any child she might have whilst they were so living must be considered to be the child of the respondent and legitimate. And the case of R. v. Mansfield, 1 Q. B. 144, was relied on.

I, the undersigned, being of opinion that access between a man and his wife when living separate, though both residing in the same town, at the same time, need not necessarily be presumed, even in cases where the same is possible, where circumstances are proved tending to the inference that no such intercourse in fact took place, and being also of opinion upon the foregoing facts that the respondent, though he has been living in the same town as his wife since their separation, had not had access to her during that period, and that her child, born on the 23rd of August last, was not the child of the respondent, but an illegitimate child, considered that he was not liable to maintain it, and that he ought not to be punished under the 5 Geo. 4, c. 83, s. 3, for neglecting to do so. And I dismissed the information, and the respondent was discharged.

The opinion of the Court of Q. B. is desired as to whether I was right in point of law.

C. F. HAMMOND.

Davison for the appellant.—The decision of the magistrate was wrong. The presumption of law is, that where a man and his wife live in such circumstances that access is possible, and a child is born, he is to be taken to be the father. The reasons given are not sufficient to warrant the magistrate in finding that the husband had not access to his wife during the necessary period. It is not enough to rebut the presumption to show that the wife has been guilty of adultery during the time: (Banbury Peerage case, 1 Sim. & Stu. 155; Hargreave v. Hargreave, 9 Beav. 552.) In Morris v. Morris, 5 Cl. & Fin. 163, it was laid down that the evidence must be such as to leave no reasonable doubt that the husband is not the father of the child. So in Goodright v. Saul, 4 T. R. 356.

Liddell, contra, was not called upon.

WIGHTMAN, J.—There is no doubt about the rule of law, that when a child is born of a married woman during wedlock, and the parties are so situated that the husband might have had access to his wife during the necessary period, the husband is presumed to be the father of the child. But that presumption may be rebutted by other evidence, showing that access has not in fact taken place. The question therefore is, whether there was such evidence to rebut the presumption. [His Lordship then recapitulated the facts.] These circumstances satisfactorily prove that intercourse did not take place between the husband and wife during the time. I therefore think the magistrate came to a right conclusion, and I should have come to the same conclusion myself.

HILL and BLACKBURN, JJ. concurred.

Judgment for the respondent.

Tuesday, Jan. 15.

Ex parte ANDERSON.

Habeas corpus—Colonies—Jurisdiction of Superior Courts in England.

The Superior Courts in England have a right to issue writs of habeas into the colonies, to bring up persons illegally imprisoned, unless their jurisdiction is taken away by statute. This court therefore issued a writ of habeas corpus to Canada, its jurisdiction to do so not being taken away by statute.

Edwin James (Flood and Gordon Allen with him). moved for a writ of habeas corpus, to be directed to the governor of the province of Canada, to the sheriff of Toronto, and the keeper of the gaol there, to bring up the body of one John Anderson, together with the cause of his detention.

COCKBURN, C.J.—Why is the name of the governor introduced?

James, Q.C.—The reason is, because in the St. Helena case the name of the governor was introduced as well as that of the keeper of the gaol. The affidavit is made in the following terms:—"I, Louis Alexis Chamerovzow, of No. 27, New Broad-street, in the city of London, Secretary of the British and Foreign Anti-Slavery Society make oath and say: I say, 1. That John Anderson, of the city of Toronto, in her Majesty's province of Canada, a British subject domiciled there, now is, as I verily believe, illegally detained in the criminal gaol of the said city there, against his will, not having been legally accused, or charged with, or legally tried, or sentenced for the commission of any crime, or for any offence against, or recognised by the laws in force in the said province, or in any other part of her Majesty's dominions, or not being otherwise liable to be imprisoned, or detained, under or by virtue of any such laws. 2. I verily believe that, unless a peremptory writ of habeas corpus shall immediately issue by this honourable court, the life of the said John Anderson is exposed to the greatest and to immediate danger." The Crown has power to issue the writ of habeas corpus into any part of her Majesty's possessions. Canada is a part of the possessions of the British Crown; and, in the language adopted in these cases, her Majesty has a right to have an account of the imprisonment of all her subjects in all her dominions. This court has as much right to issue this prerogative writ into Canada as a possession of the British Crown, as into the Isle of Wight or Yorkshire. Writs of habeas corpus went to Calais, when a possession of the British Crown, and have also gone to Ireland, and Canada stands in precisely the same position, being a possession of the British Crown. Canada was colonised in the reign of James I., and the first charter was granted in the 13th of James I. At that time (and the expression was material) the whole of that portion of America was called the "Plantations," and the Board of Trade was called the "Board of Trade and Plantations." Canada belonged to the British Crown till the year 1633, when it was ceded to France; and it was held by the Crown of France till the year 1759, when it was retaken, and ceded to the British Crown. The statute of the 14 Geo. 3, c. 83, treats Lower Canada as a colony in possession of England.

COCKBURN, C. J.—In Lower Canada the French law prevailed; but Toronto was an English colony in Upper Canada.

HILL, J.—The 14 Geo. 3, c. 83, recites that it was ceded to this country by the Treaty of Paris in 1763. The 8th section reserves civil matters for the old law; but, by the 11th section, the criminal law of England prevailed through the whole of Canada.

James, Q. C.—In the case of The Canadian Prisoners, 9 A. & E. 782, Lord Denman said: "The difficult questions that may arise touching the enforcement in England of foreign laws are excluded from this case entirely; for Upper Canada is neither a foreign State, nor a colony with any peculiar customs. Here are no 'mula prohibita' by virtue of arbitrary enactments; the relation of master and slave is not

Ex parte ANDERSON.

[Q. B.]

recognised as legal; but Acts of Parliament have declared that the law of England, and none other, shall there prevail." By the 11th section of the statute the 14 Geo. 3, c. 83, the criminal law of England is in force through the whole of Canada, and, beyond all question, a British subject in Canada is within a portion of her Majesty's dominions. It is matter of right and clear law that, as soon as a country becomes a portion of her Majesty's dominions, more especially if, like Canada, it becomes so by conquest or cession, the writ of habeas corpus issues into it, upon the ground that her Majesty has a right to know what has become of any one of her subjects. No instance can be found of the writ going into Canada, and therefore it is necessary to rely upon analogous cases. That the writ lies and runs into every part of her Majesty's dominions is laid down in Bac. Abr. tit. "Habeas Corpus" (B), in these terms:—"2. To what places it may be granted. It hath been already observed that the writ of habeas corpus is a prerogative writ, and that therefore, by the common law, it lies to any part of the King's dominions; for the King ought to have an account why any of his subjects are imprisoned, and therefore no answer will satisfy the writ, but to return the cause with paratum habeo corpus, &c. Hence it was holden that the writ lay to Calais at the time it was subject to the King of England." In Cowle's case, 2 Burrow's Rep. 834, Lord Mansfield said: "Writs not ministerially directed (sometimes called prerogative writs because they are supposed to issue on the part of the King), such as writs of mandamus, prohibition, habeas corpus, certiorari, are restricted by no clause in the constitution given to Berwick; upon a proper case they may issue to every dominion of the Crown of England. There is no doubt of the power of this court where the place is under the subjection of the Crown of England; the only question is as to the propriety. To foreign dominions which belong to a prince who succeeds to the throne of England this court has no power to send any writ of any kind. We cannot send a habeas corpus to Scotland, or to the Electorate; but to Ireland, the Isle of Man, the Plantations and (as since the loss of the duchy of Normandy they have been considered as annexed to the Crown in some respects) to Guernsey and Jersey we may, and formerly it lay to Calais, which was a conquest, and yielded to the Crown of England by the treaty of Bretigny." Copies of the writs which have been issued to Calais in 1387 and 1389 may be seen in 8 Rymer's Fœdera, 15. There was a writ issued from the Crown of England to Calais to bring up the body of Thomas, Duke of Gloucester, who was banished for treason to Richard II. The writ was attested at Westminster in 1389, and was issued by the H. of L., sitting as a court of judicature.

BLACKBURN, J.—It was not effectual, for the duke was put to death.

JAMES, Q.C.—Yes; and afterwards a writ issued against Halle (the governor of Calais-castle and the murderer of the duke), who was brought over to England, tried and beheaded, and his head was sent back to Calais and exhibited there to the people. Writs down to a much later period have been issued to places subject to the Crown of England, and with regard to Canada, which was called the "Plantations," they were held as of the manor of East Greenwich, of Windsor-castle and Hampton-court, and so on, which gave rise to the argument used on a former occasion in the House of Commons, that there was representation as well as taxation of the Canadians in the British Parliament. Lord Mansfield, in Cowle's case, said that the writ would issue to "every dominion of the Crown or England;" and that this court could send the writ to Ireland, to the Isle of Man and to the "Plantations." Vattel's Law of Nations, b. 1, c. 18. s. 210, is an authority for the position that where a nation took possession of a distant country, and settled in it, it became a part of the parent State; and Grotius de Jure Belli ac Pacis, b. 2, c. 9, is to the same effect. In 2 Peere William's Rep. 74, 75, it is said: "Memorandum, the 9th of August 1722.—It was said by the Master of the Rolls to have been determined by the Lords of the Privy Council, upon the appeal to the King in Council from the foreign plantations, 'That if there be a new and uninhabited country found out by British subjects, as the law is the birthright of every subject, so wherever they go they carry their laws with them, and therefore such new found country is to be governed by the law of England.'" Reg. v. Crawford, 13 Q. B. 613, was an application for a writ of habeas corpus ad subjiciendum to the Isle of Man, in which it was held that the writ would run into that island since the 5 Geo. 3, by which the island was vested in the Crown, and formed part of its dominions. Campbell v. Hall, Cowp. 204, was then cited. Various writs issued from this country to Calais; in 1363 a writ of amoveas issued to that place; in 1364 a writ of attachment against the mayor of Calais, and in 1374, a writ of inquisition respecting the goods of a felon.

CROMPTON, J.—The question is, whether the courts in Westminster-hall have now a concurrent jurisdiction with the local courts in granting this writ.

COCKBURN, C.J.—In the Berwick case, Berwick was not subject to the law of Scotland, and therefore there was no superior court which could send a habeas corpus to prevent an illegal imprisonment, unless this court took upon itself jurisdiction. But is that the case in Canada?

JAMES, Q.C.—The fact that Canada has both a separate legislature and judicature makes no difference. The Superior Courts in England have a concurrent jurisdiction with the courts in Canada as to issuing writs of habeas corpus.

CROMPTON, J.—You may contend that this is a right of the Crown.

JAMES, Q.C.—The affidavit shows that this is the case of a subject who is illegally in custody, and who has never been tried; it is not the case of a man who has been tried in Canada, or who is under the sentence of a court which has power to sentence him. The mere institution of a local jurisdiction will not oust the Queen of the right which she has to ascertain whether any of her subjects are illegally imprisoned. In the case of the Isle of Man, there are local courts which have the power to issue writs of habeas corpus, and so also in the St. Helena case (Ex parte Lees, Ell. Bl. & Ell., 28). In this case a writ of habeas corpus was very recently granted, after a writ of error had issued.

CROMPTON, J.—I issued the writ as ancillary to the writ of error, it being necessary that the party should be here when the writ of error was disposed of.

JAMES, Q. C.—If this court refuses a writ of habeas corpus the party has a right to go in succession to each of the Superior Courts, and to the Court of Chancery; and if this court should refuse their writ, he would have a right to go to every court in Westminster-hall, and it would be no answer in the other courts to say that the writ had been refused by a court of co-ordinate jurisdiction. That is a strong argument to show that this court has a concurrent jurisdiction with the Canadian courts.

COCKBURN, C.J.—The question is, whether it is within the ambit of this court's jurisdiction, or whether the power of granting the writ is not vested by the Crown in another jurisdiction.

JAMES, Q. C.—The right is in the Crown, and the mere establishment of such a jurisdiction in a local court cannot limit the rights of the Crown without the authority of an Act of Parliament.

COCKBURN, C. J.—By the conquest or cession of Canada the law of England attached, and this court has the power to issue writs of habeas corpus into that country, unless the Crown has either expressly or by implication taken away that power. The question is, whether by the establishment of a local judicature, and committing to it the duty of protecting the subject by issuing writs of habeas corpus, the Crown has not by implication taken away the jurisdiction of this court.

CROMPTON, J.—The Legislature may do that.

James, Q. C.—It is open to a party in this country to apply for the writ of habeas corpus to any court of co-ordinate jurisdiction. That is by the common law, and is peculiar to the writ of habeas corpus.

HILL, J.—There is one other case in which the subject has a similar right, that of prohibition.

James, Q. C.—It is a common law right of the subject to go to every tribunal for this writ, and, a fortiori, the courts in this country must have a concurrent jurisdiction with the colonial courts, unless it is taken away by an Act of Parliament.

COCKBURN, C. J.—Has not the right to go to every one of the courts arisen from the Habeas Corpus Act?

James, Q. C.—It is by the common law. This court is asked not to interfere with any judgment, but to grant a habeas corpus to liberate a man who is in illegal custody. He is not in custody under the commitment of any local court which has the power to try him; there is no judgment to set aside; but it is shown to the court that he is detained for no crime cognisable by the law of England. The learned counsel then referred to Carus Wilson's case, 7 Q. B. 984; and Dodd's case, 2 De G. & John., in which the writ had issued into the isle of Jersey. The case may arise when the courts in Canada might be unable to discharge their duties; that is a reason why this court should still retain the power of granting these writs.

COCKBURN, C. J.—Supposing the writ should go, what means has the court of enforcing it?

James, Q. C.—The court can enforce the writ by attachment; but it cannot be assumed that the Queen's writ will not be obeyed. The court can send its own officer to execute the writ. The same objection might be made in the case of the Isle of Man. Canada is a British possession, and a British colony; and the sheriff of Toronto and other officials are as much British subjects as if they were living in Yorkshire. An application has been made to the local court for a writ of habeas corpus, and refused; and it is now shown to this court that John Anderson, a British subject, is illegally detained in prison, having been guilty of no crime cognisable by the law of England. There are precedents for this application, and the mere fact that there are other courts which have a concurrent jurisdiction will not deprive the applicant of that protection for which he now prays the court.

Their Lordships then retired to consider their decision.

COCKBURN, C. J. said:—We have considered this matter, and the result of our anxious deliberations is, that we are of opinion that the writ ought to issue. We are, at the same time, sensible of the inconveniences that may result from the exercise of such a jurisdiction. We are quite sensible that it may be said to be inconsistent with that high degree of colonial independence, both in legislation and judicature, which has been carried into effect in modern times. At the same time, in establishing local legislation and judicial authority, the Legislature of this country has not gone so far as expressly to abrogate any jurisdiction which the courts in Westminster-hall might possess as to issuing writs of habeas corpus to any parts of her Majesty's dominions. We find the existence of that jurisdiction in these courts asserted in the earliest times, and exercised down to the most recent. We have it on the authority of the most eminent judges—Lord

Coke, Lord Mansfield, Blackstone, J., and Bacon's Abridgment—that these writs of habeas corpus have been issued, and are to be issued into all the dominions of the Crown of England wherever it is suggested to this court that one of the Queen's subjects is illegally imprisoned. Not only have we these authoritative dicta of the most eminent judges, and assertions of text writers, but we have the practical exercise of this prerogative from the earliest period down to modern times. The most remarkable cases are those where the writ was issued to the Island of Jersey, to the Isle of Man, and to St. Helena, and all these in very modern times. When we find that, upon these authorities, the power has been not only asserted but carried into effect as a matter of practice, even where a local legislature and judicature were established, nothing short of a legislative enactment expressly depriving us of this jurisdiction would warrant us in omitting to carry it into effect, when called upon to do so for the protection of personal liberty. It may be that the Legislature has thought proper to leave this concurrent jurisdiction in our courts, in this respect, even where local jurisdictions are established, to be exercised in the same way as it is exercised in the various courts of Westminster-hall. We can only act on the authorities, and we feel that we should not be doing our duty, under the authority of the precedents to which our attention has been called, if we did not issue this writ; therefore the writ must go.

Writ granted.

Wednesday, Jan. 16.

EMPSON (appellant) v. THE METROPOLITAN BOARD OF WORKS (respondents).

Metropolis Local Management Act—19 & 20 Vict. c. 120, ss. 161, 168—Right of appeal—What objections can only be taken upon appeal—Publication of rate.

There is an appeal to the quarter sessions against an assessment made by assessors appointed under sect. 168 of the 19 & 20 Vict. c. 120 (the Metropolis Local Management Act), in the same way as against a rate made by overseers under sect. 161 of the same Act.

Where there is a rate good upon its face, and duly allowed and published, a justice who is called upon to enforce it cannot go into any questions affecting its validity, which are matters of appeal.

The question of whether or not a rate has been duly published is one of fact, and if there be any evidence to support the decision of the justice below, this court will not interfere.

This was a case stated under the provisions of the 20 & 21 Vict. c. 43, by the metropolitan police magistrate for Greenwich, upon a complaint by the Metropolitan Board of Works against James Empson for nonpayment of a rate.

The case stated that the complainants are the assessors appointed by the Metropolitan Board of Works under the provisions of the 168th section of the Metropolis Local Management Act, 18 & 19 Vict. c. 120, to levy the sum of 9073*l.* 10*s.*, being the amount neglected to be paid by the Greenwich Board of Works in pursuance of a precept requiring payment thereof by them under the provisions of the 172nd section of the said Act.

The defendant is one of the ratepayers in the parish of St. Nicholas, Deptford, in the county of Kent, and the complaint was for neglecting to pay the sum of 10*s.*, being the amount due by him on the rate made by the said assessors. The facts proved before the magistrates were the following:—The Metropolitan Board of Works, on the 3rd March 1857, made an assessment upon the Greenwich district board, amounting to the sum of 10,723*l.* 14*s.* 8*d.*, for defraying the annual expenses of the metropolitan board, and for payment of the loans, mortgages, debts and liabilities of the late Metropolitan Commissioners of Sewers for the year ending 1856. That a precept was issued, dated the 13th March 1857, to the Greenwich district board, and duly served on the 14th March 1857, requiring payment of the said sum on or before the 30th May 1857, and that the Greenwich district board made certain payments in respect of the said precept, amounting in the whole to 1650*l.* 13*s.* 10*d.*, leaving a balance of 9073*l.* 10*s.* That on the 24th June 1859 the Metropolitan Board of Works, by appointment under the seal of the board, appointed the complainants to assess and levy the said sum of 9073*l.* 10*s.* so remaining unpaid. That on the 3rd Aug. 1859 the complainants made an assessment after the rate of 4*d.* in the pound upon the net annual value of the property rateable within the said parish, which was allowed by one of the magistrates of the Greenwich police court. That the defendant was assessed in the said rate for the sum of 10*s.* for a house and premises occupied by him within the said parish at the time of the making of the rate, and that on the 3rd Oct. last demand was made of the sum so due, and on his neglect to pay the same the summons in this case was issued. The following objections to the rate were then offered on the part of the defendant: First, that the Metropolitan Board of Works had no power to issue the precept of the 13th March 1857, and to demand the full sum of 10,723*l.* 14*s.* 8*d.*, inasmuch as 6275*l.* 18*s.* 7*d.* was in payment of the loans, mortgages, debts and liabilities of the late Metropolitan Commissioners of Sewers, under the 11 & 12 Vict. c. 112, of which the district of Greenwich was not liable to pay any portion; secondly, that nothing was now due under the said precept, the Greenwich district board having paid the sum of 1650*l.* 15*s.* 10*d.*, which was more than the metropolitan board could legally demand of them; thirdly, that consequently the assessment of the said assessors was invalid, and the rate made by them illegal; fourthly, that the assessment made by the said assessors was not estimated according to the estimate or basis on which the county rate was assessed in 1857, the county-rate of 1850 having been adopted instead of the county-rate of 1856; fifthly, that the defendant was not liable to pay the demand claimed, which it was contended was due, if at all, on the issuing of the precept of the 13th March 1857, at which time the defendant was not, nor until the month of March 1859 did he become, an occupier of rateable property, nor liable to pay rates in the said parish of St. Nicholas, Deptford.

The magistrate declined to entertain these five objections, considering that they were matters for appeal to the court of quarter sessions against the rate, and the rate not having been appealed against by the defendant, it was not competent to him to receive them at that stage of the proceedings.

With respect to the notices affixed on or near the doors of the parish church of St. Nicholas, Deptford, it was proved that there were two entrance gates into the churchyard, leading to the church, one gate more distant than the other from the church. This gate was found locked, and the notices were affixed on the outside pillars of this gate. The party putting the notices was not cognisant of the existence of the other gate which was nearest the church-door, and did not consequently go to it. Whether this gate was or was not locked did not appear. On the church-door leading from the latter gate was placed a board for notices to be affixed, and on which all notices are usually affixed. On the church-door leading from the other gate no such notice board is placed. The magistrate overruled the objection, considering that the notice so affixed was a sufficient compliance with the statute requiring the notice to be affixed "on or near the doors," &c. The magistrate thereupon ordered and adjudged the amount so claimed to be paid to the said complainants by the said defendant.

By sect. 170 of the before-mentioned Act, the Metropolitan Board of Works are from time to time to assess upon the different parts of the metropolis the sums which in their judgment ought to be charged upon them for defraying the expenses of the said board in the execution of the Act, &c.; the annual value of the property to be estimated according to the estimate or basis on which the county-rate is assessed, &c.

By sect. 172 the board are to issue precepts requiring payment, to be directed (inter alia) to the board of works for a district.

By sect. 158 the district boards are to require the overseers of their parish to levy and pay over to such board the sums which the board may require.

By sect. 161 the overseers are to levy the amount, and to make an equal pound-rate on those who are assessed to the relief of the poor; and such rates are to be allowed in the same manner and be subject to all the same provisions in relation to appeal, &c., as the rate for the relief of the poor in the same parish.

By sect. 168 the district board may, in case of default or neglect of any overseers to pay the amount required by any such order, and the metropolitan board may, in case of any default or neglect of any district board to pay the amount required by any precept of the said metropolitan board within such time and in such manner as may be therein mentioned, appoint persons to levy any money required by such board for the purposes of this Act in any parish or district, "and such persons shall proceed in the same manner, and have the same powers, remedies and privileges, and be subject to the same regulations and penalties with reference to the levying of such money, as any overseers would have had or been subject to with reference to levying any such money in pursuance of an order of the vestry or district board, or where the same might be levied by the vestry under this Act, as such vestry would have had or been subject to with reference to levying the same."

The district board having declined to enforce the precept of the metropolitan board (except as to the sum of 1650*l.* 13*s.* 10*d.*), the latter board acted upon the 168th section, and appointed assessors to levy and collect the rate for raising the amount mentioned in their precept.

E. H. Woolrych now appeared in support of the order of the magistrate, and contended that none of the objections taken before the magistrate were available upon such a proceeding, for that the rate being good upon its face, the magistrate was bound to enforce it, there having been no appeal against the rate itself.

Lush, Q.C. was here called upon by the court, and he argued that the rate was bad in its origin, for that a liability was cast upon Greenwich, which, in law, it was not liable to bear, the rate being in part for debts to which Greenwich was not liable to contribute.

[COCKBURN, C.J.—We have more than once laid it down that all which the magistrate has to do upon such an application is to see that the rate is good upon its face. If you object that the rate is made for an improper purpose you should appeal to the sessions.] There is no appeal under the 168th section, under which this rate has been made. If overseers levy a rate under sect. 161, there is an appeal; but where the rate is levied by assessors under sect. 168 no appeal appears to be given. [COCKBURN, C.J.—The words of sect. 168 involve an appeal.] The words of that section only refer to the "powers, remedies and privileges" of the overseers; nothing is said about a right of an individual to appeal. [COCKBURN, C.J.—The object is to place the persons who are specially appointed in the same position as the overseers. CROMPTON, J.—The 168th section, instead of repeating all the words of the 161st section, uses general words to express the same meaning.] The rate was bad in its origin, and therefore the magistrate had jurisdiction to inquire into the objection. [COCKBURN, C.J.—In the case of The Luton Board of Health v. Davies, 29 L. J. 173, M. C., an objection was there taken to the merits of the rate, and we said that where the rate is good upon its face, the remedy should be by appeal, and not by an objection before justices when it is attempted to enforce it. CROMPTON, J.—If the objection is a matter of appeal it cannot be urged before the justices. COCKBURN, C. J.—The principle upon which we have acted is a very clear one. Where there is a rate good upon its face, it is not for the justice to go into questions which are matters for appeal. CROMPTON, J.—We have gone so far as to say that under the statute of Elizabeth, where the party assessed has no land in the parish, that may be urged as an objection before the justice; but that is upon the peculiar wording of the statute, which directs the occupiers of lands in the parish to be assessed.] Then there is another question, namely, that the rate was not duly published. The 7 Will. 4 & 1 Vict. c. 45, s. 2, with reference to poor-rates, and which therefore applies to this rate, enacts that "the notice is to be affixed on or near to the doors of all the churches and chapels within such parish or place." In the present case the facts show that the notice was not affixed on or near to the door of the church. [HILL, J.—All that is required is, that it should be affixed on or near to the door. This was a question of fact for the magistrate.]

COCKBURN, C.J.—There is nothing in this objection, unless you can show that there was no evidence before the magistrate. He has, however, found the fact against you. Judgment for the respondents.

BACKHOUSE v. THE CHURCHWARDENS OF BISHOPWEARMOUTH.

Appeal by Quaker against an order for payment of church-rates—Power of justices of the peace to make such order, the validity of the rate being in dispute.

A quaker having refused to pay church-rates, a complaint was made to the justices of the peace, who made an order of payment upon him, upon which he appealed to this court, and disputed the validity of the rates:

He'd, that, as the dispute in question was as to the validity of the rates, the justices had no power to make the order.

CASE.

Edward Backhouse, a Quaker, was summoned under sect. 4 of 7 & 8 Will. 3, c. 34, before the justices of the peace for the county of Durham, on the 11th Feb. 1860, to answer the complaints made by the churchwardens of the parish of Bishopwearmouth, in the said county of Durham, and severally dated the 21st Jan. 1860, for that he, having been duly rated and taxed in and by a certain church-rate for the said parish, made on the 15th July 1858, and in and by a certain other church-rate for the said parish, made the said 15th July 1858, and in and by a certain other church-rate for the said parish, made the 7th May 1859, had refused and neglected to pay such rates within six calendar months then last past, on demand duly made. As to the two rates of the 15th July 1858, it was proved on behalf of the respondents that on the 15th Jan. 1860 Edmund Gray, one of the churchwardens, had demanded these two rates from the appellant, who refused to pay them. It was proved that on the 3rd Feb. 1859

(more than six months previous to the date of the complaint) the collector had called at the house of the appellant and saw and asked a servant for the two rates. It was not proved, however, that the appellant's servant had ever communicated to him such application, or that he had ever authorised her to refuse payment. It was urged that a sufficient demand had been made on the 3rd Feb. 1859, but the justices did not consider that there had been a sufficient demand and refusal previous to six calendar months before the date of the complaint, so as to oust them of jurisdiction under 11 & 12 Vict. c. 43, s. 11, as to all the three rates. The appellant was then called upon to answer the matter of the complaints, whereupon he disputed the validity of all the rates under the following circumstances:—

The affairs of the parish of Bishopwearmouth have from time immemorial been managed by a vestry, called "the ancient select vestry" of the parish of Bishopwearmouth, consisting of the rector (who is ex officio the chairman) and of twelve ratepayers. It was not proved that the churchwardens were members of the vestry ex officio, but by the minute-book of the proceedings of the vestry, which was produced and given in evidence, it appeared that the churchwardens had usually attended the meetings of the vestry. The parish of Bishopwearmouth was formerly very extensive, and comprised certain townships, and also the hamlet of Sunderland. In 1719 the hamlet of Sunderland was severed from it, and created a distinct parish by an Act of Parliament passed for that purpose. Previous to the year 1844 several district churches had been built, and on the 11th Nov. 1856, by an order in council, separate districts were carved out of the original parish of Bishopwearmouth, and assigned to these new churches by the names of St. Thomas, St. Andrew, St. Paul, Hytton and Ryhope, and by the operation of 19 & 20 Vict. c. 104, s. 14, and the Acts incorporated therewith, these several districts became on the passing of that Act separate and distinct parishes, and as such authorised and required to hold distinct vestries, elect their own churchwardens and levy their own church-rates. In Feb. 1850, 600*l* was borrowed by the ancient select vestry, with the consent of the bishop of the diocese, and for the purposes contemplated by the Act, by way of mortgage of the church-rates of the then whole parish under the Act of 59 Geo. 3, c. 134. From the 29th July 1856 the parish hereinafter called Bishopwearmouth proper has comprised part of the township of Bishopwearmouth, the township of Bishopwearmouth Panns, and the township of Silksworth, but not St. Thomas, Ryhope and Hytton, or St. Andrew.

The names, with the residences of the ancient select vestry in 1850, were set out in the mortgage-deed as parties thereto of the second part.

In April 1858 the respondents were elected churchwardens, and at that time and after the 15th July 1858 the following persons, together with the rector, constituted the ancient select vestry, and either resided or had places of business, and were occupiers and ratepayers in such one of the several parishes. (Here follow the names of the vestrymen, seven of whom belonged to the parish of Bishopwearmouth proper, one to St. Thomas, one to Hytton, and one to Ryhope.)

The respondents Edwin Gray and John James Kayil, both of whom reside in the parish of Bishopwearmouth proper, were elected churchwardens at a meeting of the vestry on the 6th April 1858, at which were present the rector and six members of the "ancient select vestry," and the churchwardens Robert Sharp and Edwin Gray.

On the 15th July 1858 a meeting of the vestry was held, at which were present the rector and five other members of the vestry, and also the same churchwardens. At this meeting two rates were levied, one of $\frac{3}{4}$ d. in the pound and the other of $\frac{1}{4}$ d. The resolution as to the $\frac{3}{4}d.$ stated that this rate was laid upon the entire parish of Bishopwearmouth as it existed in 1850 at the date of the mortgage, and before any of the new parishes or districts, except Sunderland, had been severed, for satisfying the balance still remaining due to Christopher Bramwell, the mortgagee, and the interest and expenses thereon.

The rate was headed as follows:—

"An assessment for a church-rate of the parish of Bishopwearmouth, in the county of Durham, and for the purposes chargeable thereon according to law, made this 15th day of July 1858, after the rate of $\frac{3}{4}d.$ in the pound by the ancient select vestry of the said parish.

"JOHN J. KAYLL, Churchwarden."

The following memorandum was subscribed at the end of it:—

"We, the undersigned, being the major part of the members composing the ancient select vestry of and for the parish of Bishopwearmouth in the county of Durham, do this day, 15th day of July 1858, at our vestry meeting for that purpose duly and legally convened and assembled, rate and tax all and every the inhabitants and parishioners of the parish of Bishopwearmouth aforesaid, liable to contribute to a church-rate for and towards the necessary repairs of the church of the parish, and for and towards the providing the necessaries for the decent celebration of divine service and offices therein, and for and towards the other expenses necessary and legally incident to the office of churchwardens for the current year, the several sums of money hereinbefore mentioned being a rate or assessment of $\frac{3}{4}d.$ in the pound on the annual value of all rateable messuages, lands, tenements and hereditaments.

"J. P. EDEN,

"J. J. KAYLL, }

"NATHAN HORN,

"EDWIN GRAY. }

"J. S. ROBINSON,

Churchwardens."

As to the rate of $1\frac{1}{4}d.$ in the pound for a church-rate, it was resolved that the rate should be laid upon all parties within the district of the parish remaining attached to the parish church.

The amount on the face of this rate was 240*l.* 1*s.* 8 $\frac{1}{4}d.$, and the rate was headed as follows:—

"An assessment for a church-rate of the parish of Bishopwearmouth, in the county of Durham, and for the purposes chargeable thereon according to law, made this 15th July 1858, after the rate of $1\frac{1}{4}d.$ in the pound, by the ancient select vestry by the said parish.

"JOHN J. KAYLL, Churchwarden."

And at the end of it is subscribed the same memorandum as that on the rate for $\frac{3}{4}d.$; but having three additional signatures, viz., those of Anthony Ettrick and Robert Fenwick, and Matthew Lee, as churchwarden.

As to the rate of 2*d.* in the pound made on the 7th May 1859.

On the 26th April 1859 a meeting of the select vestry, duly convened, was held, at which the rector and five others were present, and also the churchwardens Edwin Gray and John J. Kayll, who were re-elected as churchwardens for the ensuing year.

On the 7th May 1859 a meeting of the select vestry was held, when a rate of 2*d.* in the pound was levied on the then parish of Bishopwearmouth proper; the rate had the same memorandum subscribed to it as the others.

All the above three rates were duly allowed and confirmed by the Consistorial Court of the Bishop of Durham.

Under the circumstances, it was contended by the appellant that if the said ancient select vestry ever had a legal existence, it had become defunct by the severance of the parish, and that it was not a legally constituted vestry when the said rates or any of them were levied, because many of the vestrymen were not parishioners of the parish for which the vestry was constituted and acted at the time the rates were made. It was further objected that the churchwardens were not elected nor the rates granted by a legal majority of the select vestry. It was also objected that the $\frac{3}{4}d.$ rate was excessive, and that the $1\frac{1}{4}d.$ rate included items not chargeable upon the church-rate. It was also urged that the mortgage-debt ought to have been paid off in 1856.

The justices being of opinion that the three rates were valid upon the face of them, made an order upon the appellant to pay the same on the terms of the 7 & 8 Will. 3, c. 34, s. 4; but they stated that they declined to enter into the question as to the invalidity of the rates by reason of the alleged illegal constitution of the ancient select vestry, either originally or by reason of the severance of the parish of Bishopwearmouth as set out in the case.

The question for the opinion of the court is, whether, under the circumstances, the appellant is liable to pay the first three several rates, or any one or any more of them, and, if so, which of them.

After the case had been argued at some length by Willes for the appellant, and Coleridge for the respondents, in which the following cases were cited—R. v. The Churchwardens of Dursley, 5 A. & E. 10; R. v. St. Michael's, Pembroke, 5 A. & E. 603; R. v. Carpenter and others, 6 A. & E. 794; Reg. v. Abney, 3 E. & B. 779; Reg. v. Byrom, 12 Q.B. 321; Blackett v. Blizard and another, 9 B. & C. 851; Watkins v. Seaman, 2 Lutw. 435; Pigott v. Bearblock, 4 Moore, 399—the Court said that they would consider the preliminary point raised for the appellant, viz., whether, as the validity of the rate was in dispute, the justices had such jurisdiction as would enable them to enforce the order, and if they decided that they had not, then they would not have to give judgment on the other points. Cur. adv. vult.

Nov. 22.—ERLE, C.J. now delivered the judgment of the court. — In this case three church-rates had been made upon the appellant, and he, being a Quaker, had been summoned to appear before two justices for nonpayment under the 7 & 8 Will. 3, c. 34, s. 4, and had offered, bonâ fide, several serious objections to the validity of the rates. The magistrates were of opinion that the rates were valid on the face of them, and therefore made an order to pay, and declined to enter into the question of the invalidity of the rates by reason of the alleged illegal constitution of the vestry; and they have stated the facts given in evidence before them, and have sent to us the question, under the 20 & 21 Vict. c. 43, s. 2, whether the appellant is liable to pay all or any of these rates. The respondent alleges that the 7 & 8 Will. 3, c. 34, gives jurisdiction to the justices, and creates a duty in them to make the order under these circumstances. That statute recites that Quakers, by a pretended scruple of conscience, refused to pay tithes and church-rates, and enacts that two justices may, on complaint of a refusal to pay, examine the truth and justice of such complaint, and ascertain and state what is due and payable by such Quaker to the party complaining, and enforce payment; and then gives an appeal to the quarter sessions, and takes away the certiorari unless the title of such tithes, omitting church-rates, shall be in question. This Act, and some others which follow, were temporary Acts; but these provisions were made perpetual by the 1 Geo. 1, c. 6, and were extended to other dues and payments of like nature with tithes and church-rates; and the clause taking away the certiorari, unless the title to tithes is in question is materially altered by leaving it in all cases where the title to such tithes, dues, or payments shall be in question. The respondent's construction is said to be confirmed by the 53 Geo. 4, c. 127, s. 6, which extends the provisions of the last-mentioned statute to any value not exceeding 50*l.*, and makes no provision for taking away the jurisdiction of the justices in case there should be an objection to the validity of a church-rate; whereas, in sect. 7 immediately following, giving jurisdiction to two justices over persons not Quakers, up to 10*l*., there is such a provision, and so the respondent contends that Quakers were intentionally left to the decision of two justices, while the rest of the community were to have recourse to a tribunal more conversant with ecclesiastical law. On the other hand, it seems extremely improbable that the Legislature should intend to deprive Quakers of any legal protection which other persons are entitled to. Also the context of the first enactment, giving power to the justices to examine the truth and justice of the complaint and the refusal on account of a pretended scruple of conscience, indicates an intention that the compulsion of the justices should be used to overcome the pretended scruple, and to proceed, and if there should be a real objection to the validity of the rate the justices would not act in accordance with truth and justice if they compelled payment of an invalid rate without being able to decide the true liability of the party. The statute declares the intention of the Legislature to be so in respect of tithes, by leaving the certiorari to move the proceedings when the title comes in question; the reason of this extends equally to rates and dues. The Act 5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 74, tends to support the appellant's views of the intention of the Legislature, and enacts that a Quaker who is sued for any tithes or ecclesiastical rate under 50*l*. in any case shall be subject to the summary jurisdiction of two justices, and further provides that nothing therein contained shall extend to a case where the title to any tithes, or a rate or any modus or composition shall be bonâ fide in question. This statute confines the summary jurisdiction over tithes where the title is not in question, and there are expressions indicating the same intention, although imperfectly expressed in respect of church-rates. An examination of the statute does not lead to a clear decision of the case now before us; but we find nothing in it to exclude the operation of the general rule that the summary jurisdiction of justices ceases when a matter of title comes into question bonâ fide before them. Our answer is founded on the application of that principle, and for so doing there is considerable authority. In Re Froness, cited by Denison, J. in Rex v. Wakefield, 1 Burr. 486, Pratt, C.J. declared his opinion that, where the right was in question, such cases were not intended to be within the statute then before the court, giving the justices jurisdiction in respect of small tithes. In Re Wakefield (supra), an order upon a Quaker for payment of dues other than tithes, being of the same nature as church-rates, had been removed by certiorari on this ground, that the title was in question, and therefore that the justices had no jurisdiction. The affidavits in answer showed the title was not really in question, but was disputed by a Quaker on a mere pretence. Lord Mansfield declared the Act was passed for the ease and benefit of Quakers, and that jurisdiction was given to the justices where the dues were withheld from obstinacy or mere scruple, but not when the legal right and title was in dispute. The court said, disputes of title must be contravened bonâ fide before the jurisdiction is ousted, and as that was not the case there, the certiorari was quashed, and the order of the justices for levying the rate was sent back to be executed. The court therefore by implication declared, if there had been a real dispute about the title to dues, it would have been the duty of the justices to refuse to make the order. In the present case, where the validity of the rate is bonâ fide put into question, we think the justices should not have proceeded, and therefore the order against the appellant to pay was improperly made. It follows, the question of title submitted to us the facts here stated was not for the decision of the justices, and that we could not properly give any further judicial answer. The appeal, therefore, must be allowed. Appeal allowed.

READ (appellant) v. STOREY (respondent).

*Beerhouse—Beer 1½*d*. a quart—Licence for sale of. A licence is requisite for the sale of beer, whether sold at a price not exceeding 1½*d*. a quart, or any other price; by 3 & 4 Vict. c. 61, s. 13.*

The following case was stated for the opinion of the Court of Ex., pursuant to the 20 & 21 Vict. c. 43, upon a conviction of the appellant at the petty sessions held at Wincanton, in the county of Somerset, on the 27th Aug. 1860, and adjourned to the 29th of the same month, for selling beer without a licence.

CASE.

At a petty session holden at the Town-hall in Wincanton, in and for the division of Wincanton, in the county of Somerset, on the 27th Aug. 1860, before us the undersigned Henry Hobhouse and Richard Phelipa, Esquires, two of her Majesty's justices of the peace, in and for the said county, a complaint preferred by William Storey, a serjeant of police (hereinafter called the respondent), against Richard Read (hereinafter called the appellant), under sect. 13 of the Act 3 & 4 Vict. c. 61, charging for that the said appellant "did, on the 25th July last, at Wincanton, sell beer by retail without a licence," was heard by us the said justices, and adjourned to the 29th Aug. 1860, and then determined, the said parties respectively being present, when the appellant was duly convicted before us of the said offence, and we adjudged him to pay a penalty of 1*s*., to be applied according to law, and also to pay the respondent the sum of 5*s*. 6*d*. for his costs in that behalf.

And whereas the appellant, being dissatisfied with our determination upon the hearing and determination of the said complaint, as being erroneous in point of law, hath, pursuant to sect. 2 of the statute 20 & 21 Vict. c. 43, applied to us in writing within three days after the said determination, to state and sign a case setting forth the facts and the grounds of such our determination as aforesaid, for the opinion thereon of her Majesty's Court of Ex. at Westminster.

Now therefore we, the said justices, in compliance with the said application of the appellant, and the provisions of the statute aforesaid, do hereby state and sign such case as follows:—

At the hearing of the aforesaid complaint it was proved by the complainant, the respondent in this appeal, that on the 25th July 1860 he went to the appellant's house, and called for a pint of beer, with which he was served, and that he paid ¾*d*. for it, and further, that the appellant had not a licence to sell beer, but that he had a board up with an inscription on it, "Table beer sold here."

The defendant, being the appellant in this appeal, did not deny that on the 25th July he sold beer of the denomination mentioned in the statute 42 Geo. 3, c. 38, s. 18, namely, beer at and after the rate of 1½*d*. a quart. He submits that by sect. 18 of that statute he was allowed to retail such beer at no greater or higher price than at and after the rate of 1½*d*. the quart, without obtaining a licence as a common alehouse keeper. That the stat. 3 & 4 Vict. c. 61, s. 12, recognises this Act, by authorising excise officers to enter houses kept open for the sale of beer of that description, and that in that section the word "licensed" is not used, although in the preceding section conferring a similar authority in regard to licensed beerhouses, the word is there used. He submits, further, that the 13th section of 3 & 4 Vict. c. 61, does not apply to beer not exceeding $1\frac{1}{2}$ d. a quart, inasmuch as the interpretation clause in 1 Will. 4, c. 64, referred to by the 20th section of the 3 & 4 Vict., does not mention such beer.

We, however, being of opinion that a licence is necessary for the sale of beer at $1\frac{1}{2}$ d. a quart, and that by the 21st section of 3 & 4 Vict. c. 61, all the provisions of 1 Will. 4, c. 64, and 4 & 5 Will. 4, c. 85, are made applicable to that Act, and, moreover, that the interpretation clause, sect. 32, is also applicable to it, and which enacts that the word "beer" shall be deemed to include "beer, ale and porter," without any reference to price or quality, and seeing also that the 17th section of 4 & 5 Will. 4, c. 85, imposes a penalty upon all persons selling beer without a licence, wholly irrespective of price or quality, and thereby virtually repealing the 18th section of 42 Geo. 3, c. 38, we are decidedly of opinion that a licence was necessary, and that the evidence given before us brought the case within the operation of the said 13th section of the Act 3 & 4 Vict. c. 61, and accordingly give our determination against the appellant in the manner before stated.

The question of law arising from the above statement, therefore, is whether upon the true construction of the several Acts of Parliament hereinbefore referred to, a licence was requisite for the sale of beer at a price not exceeding $1\frac{1}{2}$ d. a quart.

Whereupon the opinion of the Court of Ex. is asked upon the said question of law, whether or not we, the said justices, were correct in our determination as aforesaid. And as to what further should be done or ordered by the said court in the premises.

Given under our hands this 2nd day of November, in the year of our Lord 1860.

(Signed) H. HOBHOUSE,
R. PHELIPS.

T. Thring argued for the respondent, contending that it was not lawful for any person (not being the keeper of an inn, alehouse, or victualling-house), under the provisions of any of the Acts of Parliament mentioned in the body of the case [and which he referred to], to sell any beer by retail at a price not exceeding $1\frac{1}{2}$ d. the quart, without having an excise licence authorising him so to do. By 3 & 4 Vict. c. 61, s. 11, it is enacted that "It shall be lawful for any officer of excise at all times during the hours in which any house licensed for the retail of beer or cider may be kept open, to enter into every house, cellar, room, or place entered for the storing, keeping, or retailing of beer or cider, and to make search for and seize all wine and spirits, and sweets, which may be found in any such house, cellar, room, or place, and to examine all beer or cider kept therein." Sect. 12. "That it shall be lawful for any officer of excise during the hours in which any house is kept open for the sale of beer after the rate of $1\frac{1}{2}$ d. or after a less rate the quart, to enter into every such house, cellar, room, or place for the keeping or retailing such beer, and to make search for and seize all wines, spirits, sweets, and all beer which by law they are not entitled to sell." Sect. 13. "If any person not being duly licensed to sell beer or cider, shall retail any beer or cider, either to be consumed in or upon the house or premises, or off the premises where sold, or if any person shall sell any beer or cider to be consumed in or upon the house or premises where sold, without being duly licensed so to do, such person shall in addition to any excise penalty to which he may thereby become subject forfeit 5*l.*, such penalty to be recovered in the same manner as any other penalty, (not being excise penalties) are by the said recited Acts (11 Geo. 4 & 1 Will. 4, s. 64, and 4 & 5 Will. 4, c. 85), or this Act, to be recovered, levied, and applied. Provided always, that no information or other proceeding for the recovery of the said penalty shall be exhibited or commenced, except by and in the name of a constable or other officer of the place."

Scotland, for the appellant, contended that the appellant was not guilty of any offence within the 13th section of 3 & 4 Vict. c. 61. That the said section only applied to the sale of beer in respect of which an excise licence was required at the time the said Act came into operation, and that neither by the said Act nor any former Act was a licence required for the sale of beer at $1\frac{1}{2}$ d. or a less rate the quart. That the said Act expressly recognised the lawful sale of beer at $1\frac{1}{2}$ d. or a less rate the quart in unlicensed houses. That the former Acts 1 Will. 4, c. 64, and 4 & 5 Will. 4, c. 85, did not take away the previously existing right to sell such beer without a licence, but only extend, subject to certain amendments, the granting of the licences before required to other persons than those before capable of holding such licences be also referred to the several Acts of Parliament relating to the sale of beer. The following is a copy of a general order issued by the Board of Excise in reference to the sale of table-beer at the rate of $1\frac{1}{2}$ d. per quart:—"General order. Excise Office, London, 16th Nov. 1830. In pursuance of directions from the Right Honourable the Lords Commissioners of his Majesty's Treasury, signified by letter from one of their Lordship's Secretaries, dated the 9th inst.: Ordered, that no objection be made by the officers of this revenue to the sale of table-beer only, by retail, by persons not licensed in the same manner as before the passing of the Act 1 Will. 4, c. 64, provided such beer be not sold at a higher price than $1\frac{1}{2}$ d. per quart. By the board, CHARLES BROWNE."

Thring in reply.

Cur. adv. vult.

Jan. 12.—POLLOCK, C.B. delivered judgment.—This was an appeal from the decision of the magistrates who had convicted the defendant for selling beer without a licence to sell, although the beer was of the price of $1\frac{1}{2}$ d. a quart. We are of opinion that the conviction should be affirmed. The case is clearly within the 13th section of the 3 & 4 Vict. c. 61; that is to say, the defendant has sold beer without a licence for so doing. It is therefore for him to show some exception in the Act of Parliament, or some qualification of the enactments in that section, which will exempt him from its operation. Now, he relies on the preceding section, which speaks of houses kept for the sale of beer at $1\frac{1}{2}$ d. or less the quart, and of the seizure of beer they are not entitled to sell. Certainly the section is not well drawn. With reference to a beerhouse the law in that clause in the Act of Parliament will not bear a very nice grammatical construction to be put upon it. This, it is said, assumes there is some beer they are not entitled to sell, and as the previous section applies to licensed beer-houses, sect. 12 must be taken to apply to unlicensed houses; and so it appears such houses may sell some beer, which can only mean beer of the price at which the defendant sold his. The section will not bear a critical examination; but probably does mean to relate to houses not licensed to sell—not licensed at all—but kept for the sale of beer at the rate of $1\frac{1}{2}$ d. or less a quart, and no other, and to authorise the seizure of some quality of beer. But, assuming that to be the case, we think it is enough to control the express words of the next clause, which in terms comprehends all beer of every description. There is no enactment like that in sect. 12 in the original statute of the 11 Geo. 4 & 1 Will. 4, and the succeeding Sale of Beer Acts. It is clear therefore that, before the 3 & 4 Vict., persons selling beer at $1\frac{1}{2}$ d. or less a quart, and not licensed, may be subject to a penalty under the 11 Geo. 4 & 1 Will. 4. The assumption, therefore, in the 12th section of the 3 & 4 Vict., that there is beer which a person may be entitled to sell, though not licensed (if there is any such assumption), is erroneous, and the section cannot be treated as an enactment that such beer may be sold. Sect. 12 was probably introduced in relation to the then known state of things, namely, there were places not licensed at which beer was sold at the rate of $1\frac{1}{2}$ d. or less a quart, and it was necessary to give a right to the excise officers to enter and search there as in licensed houses. It was argued that the 42 Geo. 3, c. 38, s. 18, which prohibits every person not being a common brewer, nor licensed alehouse-keeper, from selling beer "at any higher rate than $1\frac{1}{2}$ d. a quart," in effect legalised the sale of cheap beer without any license. It is to be observed that all that that section does is, not to permit such sale without a licence, but to except it from the additional penalty there mentioned. Even if legalised by the 42 Geo. 3, it really may have been intended by the 11 Geo. 4 & 1 Will. 4, and subsequent Acts, including the 3 & 4 Vict., to apply their enactments to all beer, strong and weak, there being on their passing less need to facilitate the sale of cheap beer, and possibly it being thought right that the new class of beersellers paying a licence should be protected from the competition of table-beer sellers. But we need not speculate on the objects of the Legislature. The enactment prohibiting the sale of beer without a licence is plain, and no exception ought to be applied to it without strong reasons, and we see none. We are therefore of opinion that the conviction was right.

DIXON v. DOUBLEDAY.

DIXON (appellant) v. DOUBLEDAY (respondent).

County rate—Committee of justices to prepare a basis—Their powers to require the attendance of parties and the production of documents—15 & 16 Vict. c. 81.

By the 15 & 16 Vict. c. 81 (An Act to consolidate and amend the statutes relating to the assessment and collection of county rates in England and Wales) the justices at quarter sessions may, from time to time, appoint a committee of their body for the purpose of preparing a basis or standard for fair and equal county rates; and by sect. 7 the committee may require the overseers of the poor, constables, assessors, collectors, "and any other persons whomsoever," to appear before them, and to produce all parochial and other rates, assessments, valuations, apportionments and other documents in their custody or power relating to the value of or assessment on all or any of the property within the several parishes and places which may be liable to be assessed towards the county rate, and to be examined on oath and answer such questions as the said committee may put to them touching the said rates, assessments, valuations, or apportionments, or the value of the property aforesaid:

Held, that the committee have, under this section, power to summon and examine on oath any person whomsoever, though he occupies no official position, and to require him to produce any documents in his possession which are necessary to enable them to ascertain the value of the property.

Where, therefore, the respondent was connected with collieries, and had in his possession documents showing the value of the property, and he was summoned by a committee under the Act to attend and produce all accounts of receipts and expenditure, and all other documents in his custody or power, relating to the value of the said collieries, and he refused to comply with such summons:

Held, that he was bound to have complied with such summons, and that in not having done so he had rendered himself liable to the penalty under the Act.

This was a case stated under the 20 & 21 Vict. c. 43, upon the dismissal of an information. The following was the information:—

"Northumberland to wit.—The information of William Dixon, of Alnwick in the county of Northumberland, clerk to the committee of justices of the peace for the said county, appointed under the Act of Parliament 15 & 16 Vict. c. 81, for the purpose of preparing a basis or standard for fair and equal county rates in the said county, duly authorised in that behalf and acting by the order and for and on behalf of the said committee, made before me Hugh Moises, Esq., one of her Majesty's justices of the peace in and for the said county, at Alnwick, in the said county, this 26th day of May in the year of our Lord 1860, who saith that Thomas Doubleday, of Newcastle-upon-Tyne, Esq., having been required by an order in writing of the said committee, signed by the said William Dixon as their clerk, and by their order and duly served upon him, to appear before the said committee on the 4th day of April instant, at the court-house, at Morpeth in the said county, at twelve o'clock at noon, and then and there to produce before them all accounts of receipts and expenditure and all other documents in his custody or power relating to the value of certain collieries and coal-mines in the east division of Castleward in the said county, to wit, Backworth Colliery and Burradon Colliery, such collieries and coal-mines being property in the several parishes within the said division liable to be assessed towards the county rate, and to be examined on oath, and answer such questions as the said committee might put to him respecting the said several collieries and coal-mines, so that with the aid of the returns from the parochial and other rates then in the custody of the said committee, they might be enabled more correctly to arrive at the true rateable value of such collieries and coal-mines, did unlawfully and without any reasonable excuse, neglect to appear before the said committee accordingly, contrary to the form of the statute in such case made and provided.

"W. DICKSON.

"Taken before me at the time } first above mentioned, at Alnwick } HUGH MOISES."
in the said county.

The information was laid under the 15 & 16 Vict. c. 81, s. 8.

On the day of hearing all parties attended. The facts were admitted by the defendant to be correctly laid in the information. It was also admitted by him that he had in his possession private accounts and documents relating to the annual value of the collieries and coal-mines in the information mentioned, and that he was able to give evidence touching the net annual value, but he declined to produce the said documents, or to give the required evidence. It was admitted by the prosecutors that the defendant was not overseer of the poor, a constable, an assessor, a collector of public rates of or for any parish, township, borough, or place, within the county, and that he was not a person having the custody or management of any public or parochial rates or valuations of any such parish, township, borough, or place, within the county. It was also admitted by the prosecutors that the defendant had not in his custody or power any parochial or other rates, or assessments, valuations, apportionments, or other documents relating to the value or assessment on all or any of the property with respect to which he was required to give evidence; and, further, that any document in the defendant's possession, or information relating to the subject-matter of the inquiry, were so solely in his private capacity.

DIXON v. DOUBLEDAY.

[Q. B.]

On the part of the said committee it was contended that they have the power to require the owners and lessees of collieries and lands, and any other person or persons whomsoever, to appear before them, and to produce their private accounts or other documents of a like nature in their custody or power relating to (that is, calculated to show) the net annual value of any property in the county rateable to the relief of the poor, and that the expression "any other persons whomsoever" in the 7th section of the Act is not confined or limited to persons being public officers having the custody of parochial and such like documents. That the primary object of the statute is to enable the committee to prepare a basis or standard for fair and equal county rates, the same to be prepared rateably and equally according to the full and fair annual value of the property rateable to the relief of the poor. That by sect. 6 the words "full and fair annual value" are to be taken to mean the net annual value of the property. That to enable the committee to arrive at and ascertain that value very extensive powers are given to them by sects. 5 and 7, including the power to call before them "any persons whomsoever" to produce documents, and to be examined upon oath touching the value of the property to be assessed. That if it be said that the expression "any person whomsoever" in sect. 7 must be construed to mean any persons of a public or quasi public character, such as constables and others mentioned in the Act, the answer to that argument is twofold: firstly, the object of the Legislature requires a more liberal construction of the words; and secondly, the marked difference between the language used in the 5th section (which is confined to persons of a public or quasi public character) and that used in the 7th section, clearly shows that the intention of the Legislature was to confer upon the committee the power of calling for private accounts and examining private individuals with reference to the net annual value of any of the rateable property in the county. It was also contended by the said committee that in the case of collieries the overseers have no means of ascertaining the rents paid by the lessees, or of ascertaining what additional annual value should be put upon the collieries in respect of things affixed and giving additional value to the freehold (such as waggon ways, &c.), and such information can only be obtained by the examination of the owners or lessees of the collieries or their agents, and by compelling them to produce such documents as are in their possession or power relating to the net annual value of the property in question.

On the other hand it was contended, on the part of the defendant, that the committee have not the power to require him to appear before them, and produce his private accounts, or other documents of a like nature relating to the value of any property liable to be assessed to the county rate, and to examine him on oath, and compel him to answer questions touching the value of property.

The view of the justices coinciding with that of the defendant, they dismissed the information.

By the 15 & 16 Vict. c. 81 (An Act to consolidate and amend the statutes relating to the assessment and collection of county rates in England Wales), s. 2, it is enacted that it shall be lawful for the justices of every county, at their general or quarter sessions, from time to time to appoint any number of justices, not exceeding eleven nor less than five, to be a committee for the purpose of preparing a basis or standard for fair and equal county rates, such basis or standard to be founded and prepared rateably and equally according to the full and fair annual value of the property, messuages, lands, tenements and hereditaments rateable to the relief of the poor in every parish, &c.

By sect. 5 it is enacted that, "For the purpose of preparing such basis or standard . . . the said committee by their order in writing, to be signed by their clerk, may from time to time . . . direct the overseers of the poor, constables, assessors, and collectors of public rates of or for any parish . . . and all other persons having the custody or management of any public or parochial rates or valuations of any such parish . . . to make returns in writing to the said committee . . . of the amount of the full and fair annual value of the whole or any part of the property within the parish . . . liable to be assessed towards the county rate, together with the date of the last valuation for the assessment of such parish, and the name of the surveyor, or if no surveyor, then the name or names of the person or persons by whom, and the manner in which the said valuation was made," &c.

By sect. 7 it is enacted, that "the said committee may from time to time, as often as they may deem it necessary . . . require the said overseers of the poor, constables, assessors, collectors, and any other persons whomsoever, to appear before them when and where and as often as the said committee may deem expedient, and to produce all parochial and other rates, assessments, valuations, apportionments and other documents in their custody or power, relating to the value of or assessment on all or any of the property within the several parishes and places aforesaid, which may be liable to be assessed towards the county rate, and to be examined on oath and answer such questions as the said committee may put to them touching the said rates, assessments, valuations, or apportionments, or the value of the property aforesaid," &c.

By sect. 8 it is enacted, that "every overseer of the poor, constable, assessor, collector, or other person so required to make returns, or to appear as aforesaid, who shall without any reasonable excuse neglect to make such returns in writing as aforesaid, or wilfully make any false return, and every person who shall neglect or refuse to appear when required to do so as aforesaid, or to be sworn or examined, or to produce such documents as hereinbefore provided, shall forfeit a sum not exceeding 20*l.*, to be prosecuted for and recovered by order of the said committee, before any two of her Majesty's justices of the peace."

Manisty, Q.C. (Liddell with him) now appeared for the appellant; and Mellish (Davidson with him) for the respondent.

The arguments were similar to those used in the court below, and stated in the case.

CROMPTON, J.—The statute gives powers to the justices to make a standard for the county rate which is to be a lasting one, the parishes having a power of appeal. It is a very important matter to be adjusted, and therefore a committee is to be appointed to carry it out. I agree with Mr. Mellish as to what is the object of the Act, namely, to ascertain whether or not the parishes are fairly rated upon the rental and not a merely arbitrary rating. Now they can, by sect. 5, get the exact rating under the poor-rate. But I do not see how the committee are to get at the real value of the parish unless they get at the parts of it. They might get from the overseers the fact that the parish is not assessed on its fair annual value, and therefore it seems to me to be very necessary that there should be a power to ascertain the real value. That being the object of the Act, the words used are very strong, and seem to give the power to get at it by summoning before them all persons who can furnish them with the necessary information. This may be an inquisitorial proceeding, and be liable to abuse, but it is a very necessary power, and I do not see how the committee could get on without it. It seems to me that the persons to be summoned are not confined to overseers of the poor, constables, assessors and collectors, but extend to all other persons. The words are extremely strong, and giving them their ordinary meaning, it cannot be held that "any other person

REG. v. BESTER.

whomsoever" means only any other person of the like nature as those previously mentioned. Then the words as to the documents are very strong; they are, "all parochial and other rates, assessments, valuations, apportionments and other documents in their custody or power relating to the value of or assessment on all or any of the property." Nothing can be stronger. I think the words give the power to summon any persons whom they may think necessary for the purpose of affording them the necessary information. It is a power given to a body of gentlemen in the belief that they will not exercise it vexatiously. I think the justices came to a wrong conclusion.

HILL, J.—I am of the same opinion. The question is whether the words "any other persons whomsoever" must be construed according to their plain and grammatical meaning, or are to be restrained to mean only those persons mentioned in the 5th section? And on full consideration I think the words are to be construed according to their natural meaning. The rule in such cases is, that the intention of the Legislature must be gathered from the object it had in view. The object here is very plain. Seeing then what was the object of the Legislature, it is of importance that all the requirements of the Act should be construed with reference to that object. One of the duties imposed by the 5th section is that of giving the date of the last valuation and the name of the surveyor. Now it was clearly the intention of the Act to give the committee a power to refer to the surveyor, but if the limitation is put upon the words that is contended for, the committee would have no power to have the surveyor who made the survey before them. Then the 7th section gives power not only to have before them the overseers, constables, assessors and collectors, but "any other persons whomsoever." There is no power for the committee to call for any document, except such as has reference to the value of the property. Now it may be said that this power is inquisitorial, and so it may be; but there is nothing unfair in giving the committee a power to make this inquiry. Looking at the whole Act of Parliament, I see nothing unfair, unjust, or improper, in holding that the words used are applicable to this person, and I therefore think that the magistrates came to an erroneous determination. REG. v. BESTER.

Municipal corporation—Election of councillor—Disqualification of candidate—Notice thereof to voters—Time for fresh election.

When a party seeks to invalidate an election upon the ground that votes given were thrown away by reason of the party for whom they were given being disqualified, it must be shown that such a number of voters as are sufficient to turn the election had notice of the disqualification before voting, and it is not sufficient to allege that the fact of disqualification "was generally and notoriously known in and through the said borough at and before the said nomination," &c.

Where a party has been elected a town-councillor of a municipal borough, and he resigns his office, the election to supply his place is well held, if it takes place within ten days after notice is given of the vacancy by two burgesses, as provided for by sect. 11 of the 16 & 17 Vict. c. 79.

Lush, Q. C. (Newton with him) moved for a rule calling upon a Mr. Bester to show cause by what right he exercised the office of town-councillor of the borough of Godmanchester. It appeared that at the last general election, on the 1st Nov., four councillors were to be elected, upon which occasion there was a contest, and ultimately a Mr. Bates was declared to be elected as one of the candidates (the lowest of the four) who had the greatest number of votes—a Mr. Custance being the next highest. At the time of the election it was said that Mr. Bates was disqualified, and upon this point the affidavit used upon this motion stated that he was not duly rated, &c., "and not living and never having been a householder within the said borough or within seven miles thereof, which latter fact was generally and notoriously known in and throughout the said borough at and before the said nomination of the said Robert Bates." Proceedings were afterwards taken by quo warranto against Mr. Bates, whereupon he resigned his office. Mr. Custance thereupon claimed the seat, but the town council declined to admit him, and they proceeded to a fresh election, upon which Mr. Bester was elected. [CROMPTON, J.—Are your affidavits sufficiently strong that it was notoriously known that Mr. Bates was disqualified? You only say that it was generally and notoriously known in and throughout the said borough. This is a very general statement.] The defendant will not be precluded by the granting of this application. There is another objection. By the 5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 76, s. 47, it is enacted that if any extraordinary vacancy shall be occasioned in the office of councillor, the burgesses entitled to vote shall on a day to be fixed by the mayor of such borough (such day not to be later than ten days after such vacancy) elect from the persons qualified to be councillors another burgess to supply such vacancy. And by the 16 & 17 Vict. c. 79, s. 11, it is enacted that "if any extraordinary vacancy shall happen in the office of councillor, the election to supply such vacancy shall take place not later than ten days after notice shall have been given to the mayor or town-clerk by any two burgesses, anything to the contrary notwithstanding." In the present case the election had not taken place within ten days after the vacancy, though it had taken place within ten days after notice having been given by two burgesses. The 47th section of the 5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 76, is not repealed by the 11th section of the 16 & 17 Vict. c. 79, and both sections may therefore stand together, and as the town-clerk was aware of the vacancy by Bates's resignation, because he prepared it, the new election ought to have taken place within ten days of that time. The meaning of the 16 & 17 Vict. c. 79, is, that when the town council themselves have no knowledge of the fact, then the time is to run from the date when they have notice from two burgesses. [HILL, J.—This would seem to be sufficient.]

CROMPTON, J.—I think there should be no rule in this case. It is no doubt a part of corporation law, that if voters are made aware of the disqualification of a candidate, their votes for him are thrown away. No doubt this rule operates harshly sometimes, as it may have the effect of putting into office a person who has a very inconsiderable number of votes. If the applicant had come forward and stated that such and such voters, who knew of the disqualification, voted for the party, and thereby gave him the majority, that would have been a different matter; but here he comes and asks us to draw an inference which, in fact, he himself has not drawn.

HILL, J.—I am of the same opinion. I think that Mr. Lush's affidavit is insufficient. In order to sustain his case, he ought to have given proof that a certain number of electors sufficient to turn the election knew of the disqualification. The mode of swearing in the present case ought not to be encouraged. (a)

REG. v. MOURILYAN AND ANOTHER.

The Metropolitan Building Act—18 & 19 Vict. c. 122, ss. 3, 69, 72, 73—Expenses relative to a dangerous structure—From whom recoverable.

Where a chapel was leased by A. B. to C. D. for twenty-one years, and expenses were incurred by the commissioners under sect. 73 of the 18 & 19 Vict. c. 122 (the Metropolitan Building Act), such expenses were held to be recoverable from C. D., who was the owner as designated by sect. 3, and not from A. B.

This was a case stated for the opinion of the court upon an order made by a metropolitan police magistrate upon the defendants as owners of a dangerous structure, for the payment of the sum of 36*l.* 9*s.* 8*d.*, the expense incurred by the commissioners under the 18 & 19 Vict. c. 122, s. 173 (the Metropolitan Building Act) in respect of such dangerous structure.

By sect. 69 the commissioners may cause a survey to be made of a dangerous structure, and by sect. 71 the surveyor is to give a certificate, and if he finds the structure to be dangerous, the commissioners are, by sect. 72, to require the owner or occupier to take down, secure, or repair the same. By sect. 73, if the owner or occupier fails to comply with the notice, the commissioners may (after certain proceedings) cause such structure to be taken down, &c., "and all expenses incurred by the said commissioners in respect of any dangerous structure by virtue of the second part of this Act shall be paid by the owner of such structure, but without prejudice to his right to recover the same from any lessee or other person liable to the expenses of repairs."

By the interpretation clause, sect. 3, it is enacted that the word "owner" shall apply to every person in possession or receipt, either of the whole, or of any part of the rents or profits, of any land or tenement, or in the occupation of such land or tenement, other than as a tenant from year, to year, or for any less term, or as a tenant at will. The premises in question consisted of a chapel at Bermondsey, called Bethesda Chapel, used for divine service only on Sundays, of which property the defendants were the freeholders, but who had leased the same for twenty-one years to a Mr. Neil, and the question was, whether the defendants were the parties upon whom the order should be made, or the said Mr. Neil.

Ellis appeared in support of the order, and Manisty, Q. C. (Coxon with him) contra.

COCKBURN, C. J.—I am of opinion that the order of the magistrate was wrong, on the ground that the appellants were not the owners of the chapel, and consequently not liable to bear these expenses. It all turns upon the construction to be put upon the 72nd and 73rd sections; these provide that, when premises are in a certain state, then the proper parties shall cause the same to be shored up, and notice is to be given to the owner or occupier to take down, secure, or repair the same. The 73rd section goes on to provide how an order of justices is to be obtained requiring the owner or occupier to secure, &c. the premises; then, if this is not complied with, the commissioners may do it themselves and recover the expenses from the owner. Now the owner is the party primarily liable, and upon his default the occupier is liable. In this case the appellants are the lessors of premises to a person of the name of Neil, and he is lessee for a term of twenty-one years. It is plain that Mr. Neil being the lessee of the tenement, he is the owner of it. But it is said he is not liable because he is not in the occupation of it. The tenement is a chapel used on Sundays, and on other days it is shut up. The occupation must be taken subject to the nature of the premises. He is an occupier with a greater interest than from year to year. The order would have been good as against him.

EVERETT (appellant) v. GRAPES (respondent).

Bye-laws—Not to keep pigs—Bad—5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 76, s. 90.

A bye-law, made by a town council, under the provisions of sect. 90 of the 5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 76 (Municipal Corporation Act), imposed a fine upon every person "who shall keep, or suffer to be kept, any swine within the said borough from the 1st day of May to the 31st day of October inclusive in any year."

Held, that such a bye-law is bad.

This was a case stated under the 20 & 21 Vict. c. 43, upon a conviction by justices, for an offence against a bye-law made by the town council of Newport, Isle of Wight.

The case stated that on the 12th Dec. 1859 the town council of the borough of Newport, in the Isle of Wight, under the powers conferred by the Act 5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 76, s. 90, made a bye-law, of which the following is a copy:—

"Every person who shall keep, or suffer to be kept, any swine within the said borough from the 1st day of May to the 31st day of October inclusive in any year, shall for every such offence forfeit and pay the sum of 5*s.*, and the further sum of 2*s.* 6*d.* for every day the same shall continue."

This bye-law was duly allowed pursuant to the statute.

The appellant William James Everett, who is a butcher and a pork butcher, residing and carrying on business in the said borough of Newport, was summoned upon the information and complaint of the respondent George Grapes, the superintendent of police for the said borough, for having on the 5th June 1860 kept certain swine within the said borough, in breach of the said bye-law. The summons came on for hearing on the 18th June 1860, and it was proved that on the day named in the summons the appellant had in his slaughter-house within the borough a large sow, and ten small pigs about three weeks old, and that he had also in the slaughter-house at the same time a large hog, the latter of which he said he was going to slaughter, but it was not proved that the keeping of the said swine was a nuisance, or that they were kept on any other day than the said 5th June. The appellant's attorney contended that the bye-law in question was not for the regulation merely, but was in restraint of trade, and was therefore illegal; and further, that the said town council had exceeded their authority in making it, as by the 90th section of the said Act they were only authorised to make such bye-laws as to them should seem meet for the prevention and suppression of all such nuisances as were not already punishable in a summary manner by virtue of any Act in force throughout such borough, whereas the bye-law in question prohibited the keeping of swine absolutely, irrespective of the question of whether they were kept in such manner as to be a nuisance. The justices were of opinion that the said bye-law having been made with all the formalities prescribed by the 90th section of the 5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 76, and not having been disallowed by her Majesty in Council, they were bound to enforce it without reference to the question as to whether it was reasonable or unreasonable; but assuming they could entertain that question, they considered that the bye-law was a "regulation," and not a "restraint" of trade, and was therefore valid. They therefore convicted the appellant of the said offence, and adjudged him to pay a penalty of five shillings.

SPENCER v. THE NORTH STAFFORDSHIRE RAILWAY COMPANY.

By sect. 90 of the 5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 76, it is enacted, "That it shall be lawful for the council of any borough to make such bye-laws as to them shall seem meet for the good rule and government of the borough, and for the prevention and suppression of all such nuisances as are not already punishable in a summary manner by virtue of any Act in force throughout such borough, and to appoint by such bye-laws such fines as they shall deem necessary for the prevention and suppression of such offences," &c.

Bere appeared in support of the conviction, and contended that the bye-law was valid. [CROMPTON, J.—Bye-laws of this kind always have the qualification "so as to be a nuisance." WIGHTMAN, J.—Here the bye-law is generally against the keeping of pigs.]

Dowdeswell, for the appellant, was not called upon. The COURT thought the bye-law bad.(a)

Judgment for the appellant.

Monday Nov. 26.

REG. on the prosecution of the PARISH OFFICERS OF RUSHTON.

SPENCER v. THE NORTH STAFFORDSHIRE RAILWAY COMPANY.

Railway—Assessment to poor-rate.

The percentage amount to be allowed on the capital and tenants' profits, is to be calculated on the rolling stock of a railway company, with reference to the value which an incoming tenant would give for it at the time when the rate is made, and not with reference to its cost price to the company.

A railway company is entitled to a deduction in respect of capital invested in moveable things, such as office and station furniture, but not in respect of things so attached to the freehold as to become part of it.

Things capable of being removed, but so far attached to the railway as to be intended to remain permanently connected with it as permanent appendages to it, and essential to its working, are to be included in estimating the rateable value of the company's premises.

The deduction to be allowed in respect of stations, buildings and sidings is to be calculated on the actual value, and not on the original cost.

Whether a railway company is entitled to a deduction for interest and tenants' profits upon its floating capital depends upon this, viz., whether there is any delay in realising the profits beyond what is necessarily incident to the ordinary employment of capital.

Upon appeals by the North Staffordshire Railway Company against two rates made for the relief of the poor of the township of Rushton Spencer, in the county of Stafford, the following case was by consent and by order of Hill, J., stated for the opinion of this court, under 12 & 13 Vict. c. 45.

The North Staffordshire Railway passes through the township of Rushton Spencer, for a distance of 104 chains, and in respect of this portion of their line of railway, and the stations, buildings and sidings within the said township, the appellants are assessed in each of the said rates upon a net rateable value of 219*l*.

The appellants and respondents are agreed to take as the gross earnings in the said township of Rushton Spencer for one year the sum of 1761*l*.

The total working expenses of the line for one year ending the 30th June 1858, including rates, taxes, and Government duty and certain tolls payable to the Midland Railway Company, amounted to 132,290*l*., of which sum it has also been agreed that 965*l*. is the fair portion chargeable to the said township of Rushton Spencer, and to be deducted from the said gross earnings in ascertaining the net rateable value of the said line in the said township.

The appellants and respondents differ as to certain other items of deduction, hereinafter mentioned.

The rolling stock of the company, which includes all the locomotive engines, tenders, passenger carriages, horse-boxes, carriage-trucks, luggage-vans, goods, cattle and mineral waggons, and all other of every kind for the conveyance of persons, cattle, animals, goods, wares, minerals, merchandise, or other articles, matters, or things whatsoever on the railway cost the sum of 356,843*l*., and for the purposes of this case it admitted that this was a fair price at the time the articles constituting the railway stock were purchased, and also that similar articles would at the time of levying the rate have cost as much.

In addition to this stock the company has been obliged to provide, at a cost of 52,950*l*., turn-tables, cranes, weighing-machines, stationary steam-engines, lathes, electric telegraph and apparatus office and station, furniture and gas works. The turn-tables and some of the weighing-machines are affixed to the freehold by means of an iron band inserted in a large stone sunk in the land. The lathes and steam-engines are connected with the buildings in which they are placed by means of iron bolts. The electric telegraph consists, first, of posts driven into the ground; second, of wires passed through the sockets of such posts, but which wires may be disconnected from the posts without injury or displacing them; thirdly, of the electrifying machines, which are in no way affixed to the freehold. The gasworks consist partly of buildings and partly of gasometers, and the other usual plant for making gas, and of the pipes for conveying the same from the works to the railway-stations; the other weighing machines, which are all used for the purposes of the traffic on the line, and the office and station furniture are unconnected with the freehold.

The company allege, and for the purposes of this case it may be admitted to be the fact, that it has been found necessary, in carrying on the traffic and business of the railway, that the company should have in hand at command a sum of money by way of floating capital, for the purpose of providing surplus stores, such as rails, sleepers, &c., to be used in case of accidents on the line or other emergency, and partly in paying the wages of porters, pointsmen and other servants of the company, and in the current expenses of the line, which are for the most part paid weekly, or at other short periods.

The traffic over the whole of the company's line of railway is worked under a contract, which contract it has been agreed shall form part of this case.

The total amount of deductions made by the company from the contractors at the time when the rates were made in respect of the depreciation of the rolling stock and plant in the hands of the contractors was 71,000*l*., which sum would not be more than sufficient to restore the said rolling stock and plant to its original value, but which sum it is admitted has not been expended in such restoration. The company have also expended in the erection of their stations, buildings and sidings the sum of 360,000*l*.

The respondents contended that the deduction to be allowed in respect of interest on capital and tenants' profits ought to be ascertained by taking as the capital sum upon which such interest and profits ought to be calculated, the actual or depreciated value of the rolling stock at the time the rates were made, and that no allowance for interest and tenants' profits should be made in respect of a floating capital. The respondents also contend that the deduction to be allowed in respect of the turn-tables, cranes, weighing-machines, stationary steam-engines, lathes, electric telegraph apparatus, gasworks, stations, buildings, and sidings ought to be ascertained by taking the amount at which they are collectively assessed to the relief of the poor in the several parishes and townships within which the several parishes and townships are severally situated, and dividing the said amount between each parish and township in a certain proportion agreed upon between the said respondents and appellants.

The appellants contend that they are entitled to claim, as the proper deduction in respect of interest on capital and tenants' profits, the percentage amount calculated upon the whole amount of the said capital sums of 356,843*l.*, 52,950*l.* and the floating capital. They also contend that the proper deduction to be allowed in respect of all the stations, buildings and sidings is 6 per cent. per annum (which is a moderate rate of interest for money invested in buildings) upon the original cost of construction, and to take the annual amount so ascertained as the value to be deducted. It is agreed that, with reference to this head of deduction, the original cost of construction of the whole of such stations, buildings and sidings was 360,000*l.*

The questions for the opinion of the court are :

First, whether the percentage amount to be allowed for interest on capital and tenants' profits is to be calculated on the capital invested on the rolling stock taken at its cost prices, or upon the depreciated value of the rolling stock as estimated at the time when the rates were made, or at any other time.

Secondly, whether the appellants are entitled to a deduction for interest on capital and tenants' profits upon the said sum of 52,950*l.* the additional amount of capital invested in turn-tables, cranes, weighing-machines, stationary steam-engines, lathes, electric telegraph and apparatus, office and station furniture and gasworks, or upon any and what portion of such items, and if so, upon the sum originally invested in the said plant, or upon the depreciated value of the same, estimated at the time the rates were made, or at any other time, or how otherwise a deduction, if any, should be made in respect of the last-mentioned plant, or in respect of any part thereof.

Thirdly, whether the appellants are entitled to a further deduction for interest and tenants' profits, or either, upon the said floating capital.

Fourthly, whether the deduction to be allowed in respect of the stations, buildings and sidings along the line of railway ought to be ascertained by taking the rateable value at which the same are assessed to the relief of the poor only, allowing 6 per cent. upon the original cost of construction as contended for by the appellants, or how otherwise a deduction should be made in respect of the said stations, buildings and sidings.

It is agreed that, upon the decision of the court being given on the said several questions, the proper amount of assessment to the said rates shall (if necessary) be ascertained and settled in conformity with such decision by agreement between the parties, or by an accountant to be appointed by the attorneys on both sides, and the rate amended accordingly. And it is further agreed that judgment confirming or (if necessary) amending the said rates in conformity with such decision, and for such costs as the court shall direct, shall be entered on motion by either party at the sessions for the said county next or next but one after such decision shall have been given.

COCKBURN, C. J.—Four questions are propounded in this case for the decision of the court. The first is, whether the percentage amount to be allowed on the capital and tenants' profits is to be calculated upon the cost price of the rolling stock, or on the depreciated value which that stock may bear at the time the rate is actually made. We are of opinion that the allowance must be made with reference to the actual and not the original value. The point has already been decided by this court in Reg. v. The Great Western Railway Company, 6 Q.B. 179, in which decision we entirely concur. In addition to the reasons given in the judgment of the court in that case, it may be observed that that is under the Parochial Assessment Act, and tenants' profits on stock must necessarily be calculated with a view to a deduction from the gross earnings, in order to ascertain what a tenant would give for the entire property. Nothing could be more inconvenient than that a different principle should prevail in calculating the profits in the two cases. Now the question, when considered under the Parochial Assessment Act, must be looked at not with reference to railway companies who may have expended in the purchase of stock a much larger sum than the stock would now realise, but with reference to an incoming tenant, and the amount of capital such tenant would have to lay out in the purchase of the rolling stock necessary to carry on the undertaking. It is obvious that what it would be worth the while of a person or company about to embark in a commercial undertaking to give as the rent for the premises in which such undertaking is to be carried on, would depend on the amount to be deducted in addition to repairs and other necessary outgoings from the gross earnings in respect of the profits, and to the capital invested in the concern. But it is plain that a tenant would calculate such profits on the amount of the capital actually required to be invested in the stock, and not upon what may have been the value of the stock at some other time, and to some other person. Now it must be assumed that the stock in its existing condition is sufficiently effective to produce the earnings which, after the necessary deductions, constitute the improved value of the railway; and it cannot reasonably be supposed, if the company were about to give up the undertaking, they would not be content to part with the stock at its actual value, or if they were to do so the incoming tenant could not procure other stock, of an equal efficient character and value, to supply the deficiency. It follows that, in estimating under the statute 6 & 7 Will. 4, c. 96, what a tenant would pay for, the profits must be calculated on the actual value of the stock. It cannot be supposed that in exempting profits under the 6 Vict. a different principle of calculation was intended to be acted upon. The second question is, whether the company are entitled to a deduction in respect of the capital invested in the various articles therein specified, being things necessary for carrying on the business of the company. The articles to which such a question may have reference may be divided into three classes—first, things moveable, such as office and station furniture; secondly, things so attached to the freehold as to become part of it; and, thirdly, things which, though capable of being removed, are yet so far attached as that it is intended they shall remain permanently connected with the railway, or the purposes connected with it, as certain permanent appendages to it, and essential to its working. It is clear, in respect of the first class of articles, a reduction should be allowed: it is equally clear that no deduction should be allowed as to the second; as to the third, the question is finally settled by the decision of the court in the case of Reg. v. Southampton Docks, 14 Q.B. 587. The third question, whether the company are entitled to a deduction in respect of the floating capital therein referred to, is one of considerable nicety, and which, as it appears to us, must depend upon whether on the whole capital employed a greater delay occurs in realising the return than is ordinarily incidental to the employment of capital? No doubt the rent which an imaginary tenant contemplated by the Parochial Assessment Act could afford to pay would be the difference between the gross earnings after the necessary deductions and the amount of profits, due reference being had to the nature of the undertaking and the capital invested. Whatever tends to diminish such profits must go pro tanto to diminish the rent. Any delay in realising the profits beyond such as is necessarily incidental to the ordinary employment of capital, may, and it must be presumed they would be, taken fairly into account by the tenant in determining the rateable value. On the other hand, it must be observed that a large proportion of the earnings of a railway company is of a ready-money character. It may well be that when the whole of the capital and the whole of the earnings are taken into account the profits on the whole capital realised in the shares come, in this species of undertaking, under the average of commercial enterprise. If this should be a cause of delay in realising the profit that may arise as the amount of the capital, this may be considered to be compensated by the more than ordinary quickness of the return. On the whole, we have no means before us of determining the question with reference to this view of the case. All we can do is to point out the principle by which we think it must be determined. As regards the fourth question, we are of opinion that the deduction to be allowed in respect of stations, buildings and sidings must be calculated on the actual value at which they ought to be assessed, and not on the original cost of their construction.

SMITH v. THE CHURCHWARDENS, &c. OF ST. MICHAEL, CAMBRIDGE.

SMITH (appellant) v. THE CHURCHWARDENS AND OVERSEERS OF ST. MICHAEL, CAMBRIDGE (respondents).

Poor-rate—Inland Revenue offices—Stamp-office.

*The appellant agreed to let, and did let, to the Inland Revenue department, for their offices, five rooms of a house in his occupation, it being stipulated that the rent was to be 90*l.* per annum, this sum to include all expenses, namely, rent, rates, taxes, gas, wood, coals, also providing a trustworthy person to reside on the premises, to keep clean, light fires, and attend to the same. The appellant himself occupied the shop as distributor of stamps for the district:*

Held, that the premises so let and occupied were not exempt from being assessed to the rates for the relief of the poor.

This was a case stated under the 12 & 13 Vict. c. 45, s. 11, in the matter of an appeal against a rate for the relief of the poor of the parish of St. Michael in the borough of Cambridge, made the 15th July 1859.

The case stated that the appellant is, and at the time of making the said rate was, the tenant of the house, No. 8, Rose-crescent, in the said parish of St. Michael. The rent paid by him to Charles Claydon, the owner of the said house, is 52*l.* 10*s.* per annum. A portion of the said house, consisting of five of the principal rooms thereof, is, and at the time of making the said rate was, occupied by the surveyor of her Majesty's taxes, and by the collector of inland revenue, under an agreement set forth in the schedule hereto. Another part of the said house, consisting of one room only, is, and at the time of making the said rate was, occupied by the appellant solely and exclusively, with the exception hereinafter stated, as an office for the vending of stamps by him as distributor of stamps for the Cambridge district, and for the transaction of public business connected with his office of distributor of stamps for the said district.

The remainder of the said house, consisting of two kitchens and a coal cellar on the basement and three rooms on the second floor, one whereof is used as a sitting-room, and the other two as bedrooms, is occupied by a person named Wood and his family, under the circumstances hereinafter stated.

The appellant has agreed with Wood that the latter shall live upon the premises, and he pays Wood 6*l.* 10*s.* yearly, besides allowing him to live rent free and finding him with coals and candles. For this payment and allowance Wood, whose family consists of himself, his wife and daughter, cleans the rooms and lights the fires, and he has the exclusive use of the kitchens and of two of the said rooms on the second floor.

The appellant employs an assistant in his office, who also takes in orders under the advertisement hereinafter mentioned, and the appellant is paid by a commission on the stamps sold by him.

The appellant is the printer of the Cambridge Independent Press newspaper, published in Cambridge, and carries on a separate and distinct business as a printer, residing in a house on the Market-hill, where the business of printing and publishing the said newspaper is carried on, and where he carries on such private printing business. In the said newspaper, published on the 21st Dec. 1859, and on subsequent days, there appeared the following advertisement:—"Printing of every description economically, expeditiously and neatly executed, at 11, Market-hill, and Rose-crescent, Cambridge, where all orders will be thankfully received." Similar advertisements appeared in other publications. The No. 8, Rose-crescent, mentioned in the said advertisement, is the house in question. Previously to occupying the said house the appellant occupied and used as an office for the vending of stamps a shop in a house opposite, for which he paid a rent of 14*l.* a year, and no abatement was made in the amount at which the said house was rated on account of such part thereof being so occupied. The appellant is rated to the house-duty in respect of the said house. The rent of 90*l.* per annum payable to the appellant under the said agreement is, with the exception of 2*l.* 10*s.* per annum, exhausted by payments made by the appellant for the following purposes, namely, the said rent of 52*l.* 10*s.* per annum to the said Charles Claydon, the expenses of coal, firewood and other fuel, gas, wages to a person employed to reside on the premises in order to take care of the same, tenants' repairs, and other incidental expenses.

The appellant is rated for the said house in the said rate at the sum of 42*l.*, being the full annual rateable value thereof, after making the deductions required by law.

The question for the opinion of this honourable court is, whether the appellant is liable to be rated in the said rate in respect of the said house, or any part thereof.

If this honourable court shall be of opinion that the said appellant is liable to be rated in the said rate in respect of the whole of the said house, then the said appeal is to be dismissed, and the said court of quarter sessions shall and may adjudge accordingly, and that the appellant do and shall pay to the respondents their costs of and incidental to the said appeal, including the costs of and incidental to this special case.

If this honourable court shall be of opinion that the said appellant is not liable to be rated in the said rate in respect of any part of the said house, then the said appeal is to be allowed, and the said court of quarter sessions shall and may adjudge accordingly, and that the respondents do and shall pay to the appellant his costs of and incidental to the said appeal, including the costs of and incidental to this special case.

If this honourable court shall be of opinion that the said appellant is liable to be rated in the said rate in respect of part only of the said house, then the said rate is to be amended according to such directions as this honourable court may be pleased to give, and the said court of quarter sessions shall and may adjudge accordingly, and that each of the parties to the said appeal pay their own costs of and incidental to the said appeal, including the costs of and incidental to this special case.

SCHEDULE.

Cambridge.—With a view of concentrating all the Inland Revenue offices in Cambridge in one central building, situate and being No. 8, Rose-crescent, in the parish of St. Michael, in the town and county of Cambridge, I Henry Smith, distributor of stamps at Cambridge, on the one part, do hereby covenant and agree to let to the Hon. Board of Inland Revenue, five rooms and a closet in the aforesaid building, for the purposes hereinafter mentioned, retaining the front shop in my own possession as the stamp distributor's office; and I Stephen Roose, collector of inland revenue for Cambridge (collector on behalf of the Hon. Commissioners of Inland Revenue) on the other part, do hereby agree to take the five rooms and closet referred to above, for the purposes and subject to the conditions hereinafter mentioned, namely: Ground floor, No. 1, for the surveyor of taxes' office, being the first room as you enter on the left hand, with a closet therein; ground floor, No. 2, for the journal office, being the back room on the same floor; first floor, No. 3, for the collector's public receiving office, being the front room, with a closet therein; first floor, No. 4, for the collector's private office, adjoining the public office; second floor, No. 5, for the surveyor of taxes' store of blank forms, being immediately on the right hand of the upper stairs, with a closet opposite No. 5, for excise stores, &c., and also the general use of the water-closet, for the annual consideration of 90*l.*, this sum to include all expenses, namely, rent, rates, taxes, gas, wood, coals, also providing a trustworthy person to reside on the premises, to keep clean, light fires, and attend to the same. Possession to be given and rent to commence on the 25th day of March 1858, such rent to be paid half-yearly, namely, on the 29th day of Sept. (Michaelmas) and on the 25th day of March (Lady-day) in each year, as witness our hands the 24th day of Feb. 1858.

HENRY SMITH, Distributor of Stamps for Cambridge.

STEPHEN ROOSE, Collector of Inland Revenue, on behalf of the Commissioners of Inland Revenue, London.

O'Malley, Q.C. (Couch with him) appeared in support of the rate.

Lush, Q.C. (Keane with him) for the appellant.

The following statutes and cases were cited:—9 & 10 Will. 3, c. 25, s. 60; 7 & 8 Geo. 4, c. 53, s. 15; Smith v. Birmingham, 7 Ell. & Bl. 483.

The arguments sufficiently appear in the following judgment:—

Cur. adv. vult.

Nov. 26.—HILL, J.—In this case, which was argued before my brother Blackburn and myself, we took time to consider whether the appellant was to be considered the occupier of the whole of the house in respect of which he was rated, or whether five rooms and a closet in that house were in the occupation of the Commissioners of Inland Revenue. There is no doubt that the exclusive possession of part only of a house may be given so as in effect to make the two parts of a house separate tenements. The question in the present case was, whether such possession had been given; and we are of opinion that it had not. The agreement between the appellant, as the representative of the Commissioners of Inland Revenue, is set forth in the case: by it the appellant contracted to give to the Inland Revenue the exclusive enjoyment of five rooms in the house; and in the agreement it is expressed that the appellant agrees to let the other parties take the rooms; and it is stipulated that possession should be given of that part of the house, at a rent to commence at a particular time, all of which are words properly applicable to a demise of the five rooms. At the same time it is stipulated, for the annual consideration of 90*l.*, that this sum is to include all expenses—namely, rent, rates, taxes, gas, wood and coals—also providing a trustworthy person to reside on the premises and keep them clean, light the fires, and attend to the house. We think we must look, not so much to the words as to the substance of the agreement; and, taking the whole together, we think it must be construed not as a demise of the five rooms, but as an agreement by which the appellant came into the possession of those rooms, and keeping a servant there for himself; and, certainly, the exclusive enjoyment of the rooms was to be given in the same way as the guest at an inn, or a lodger in a house, has a separate apartment, or the master of a ship has a separate cabin, in which case the possession remains in the innkeeper, the lodging-house keeper, and the ship-owner. We think that the appellant was the occupier of the whole of the rated property. The other parts of the case were disposed of during the argument. The established law regarding occupation by servants of the Crown, and exemption from rates, is expressed by Lord Campbell, in Smith v. The Guardians of Birmingham, that no party can be rated unless he be a subject having a beneficial occupation in respect of which he may be rated. In the present case the appellant is a subject occupying in his own right the house in question, and deriving benefit to himself from that. It is true the benefit he derives arises partly from payments made to him as the servants of the Crown, and from privileges given to him in the capacity in which he acts. Nor do we see any reason or principle for extending the exemption to such a case. As to the room which the defendant occupies and in which he distributes the stamps, there is no pretence for saying the Crown occupied that room through their servant. Judgment will therefore be given in support of the rate.

REG. on the prosecution of THE EASTERN COUNTIES RAILWAY COMPANY (appellants) v. THE CHURCHWARDENS AND OVERSEERS OF THE PARISH OF FLETON, HUNTINGDONSHIRE, AND OTHERS (respondents).

Poor-rate—Railway-station—User of by another company at a rent greater than its value—Principle of assessment.

*The Eastern Counties Railway Company are the sole proprietors of a station at Peterborough, and in the year 1848 they entered into an agreement with the London and North-Western Railway Company, to endure for 999 years, whereby the latter company were to have the joint use of the station for their traffic, they binding themselves to pay for such use according to certain terms stipulated. The Great Northern Railway having since been opened, a considerable portion of the traffic of the London and North-Western line has in consequence been diverted, and the station has become worth much less to that company, and if the station were now going to be the subject of such an agreement, the rent would barely amount to one-third of that which the London and North-Western Company have agreed to give. The parish officers of Fletton (in which the station is situate) having assessed the Eastern Counties Railway Company in the larger sum, i. e. upon the basis of the rent agreed upon by the before-mentioned agreement, the company appealed to the quarter sessions against the assessment, and the sessions holding that the company should have been assessed upon the basis of what an incoming tenant from year to year would give for the subject of occupation, reduced the assessment from the sum of 1889*l.* 15*s.* to the sum of 635*l.* :*

Held, that the quarter sessions were wrong, and that the original assessment was correct.

Q. B.]

REG. v. THE CHURCHWARDENS, &c. OF FLETTON AND OTHERS.

[Q. B.]

This was a case stated by the quarter sessions of the county of Huntingdon, upon an appeal by the Eastern Counties Railway against an assessment to the poor-rate for the parish of Fletton, in that county.

The case stated that, by a rate made on the 17th Aug. 1859, the Eastern Counties Railway were rated in respect of the occupation by them of certain lands and premises occupied by them in the said parish of Fletton; that is to say (here various properties were set out, but the contention had reference only to the following): the Peterborough Railway station, platform, sheds, machines, wharf, sidings, electric telegraph offices and wires, main line of railway, thirty chains in length, cattle pens, workshope, roads, garden land, and fifteen houses and cottages occupied by the company's servants. The gross estimated rental of this was set down in the rate as 2495*l.* 6*s.*; the rateable value at 1889*l.* 15*s.*; and the rate upon the company at 1*s.* in the pound, at 94*l.* 9*s.* 9*d.* The case went on to state that the rate was duly appealed against, on the ground that the appellants were overrated, and that certain other persons to whom notices of appeal were given were underrated; that the rate as against the company was bad, inasmuch as it was not, as regarded themselves, made upon an estimate of the net annual value of the property occupied by them, upon an estimate of the rent of which the same might reasonably be expected to let from year to year, free of all the usual tenants' rates and taxes, and tithe commutation rent-charge (if any), and deducting therefrom the probable average annual costs of the repairs, insurance and other expenses (if any) necessary to maintain them in a state to command such rent, according to the provisions of the statute in that case made and provided. But the said rate, so far as the same related to the said company, was made upon an estimate of more than the net annual value of the said railway lands, station, &c. occupied by the said company in the said parish, and that they were overrated, &c.

At the trial the contest was confined to the property called "the station." The appellants were in occupation of a great part of it, and for the purposes of this case were to be deemed to be the persons rateable in respect of the whole occupation. Prior to the month of April 1848, and up to and at the time of the making of the agreement next hereinafter mentioned, there existed great competition between the appellants and the London and North-Western Railway Company for the traffic in goods and passengers between Peterborough and London and between Peterborough and places to the north and east of Peterborough, the London and North-Western Railway Company at that time used a portion of the station in question, in part exclusively and in part jointly, with the appellants.

In the month of April 1848 the appellants and the London and North-Western Railway Company entered into an agreement as follows:—There was set out an indenture between the Eastern Counties Railway of the first part, and the London and North-Western Railway Company of the second part, which, after reciting that the two companies had constructed and opened for traffic railways to Peterborough, and that the station at Peterborough used in common by the two companies had been erected at the sole expense of the Eastern Counties Railway Company, and that a portion of the line over which the traffic of the London and North-Western Railway Company is carried is the sole property of the Eastern Counties Company, and that arrangements had been made by the two companies for the future conduct of the Peterborough traffic; it was witnessed that, in consideration of the premises, the two companies agreed as follows:—First, that the said company of the second part, shall, paying the rents and performing the conditions of the agreement, be entitled to use the said station and portion of the line aforesaid jointly with the Eastern Counties

Railway Company for the term of 999 years. Secondly, that the said company of the second part shall, for the said portion of line and station, pay annually, by half-yearly payments, the following rent and expenses (that is to say), first, such sum annually as shall be equal to one mile's gross earnings after deducting 40 per cent thereof to cover all expenses for each year, upon that portion of the London and North-Western Railway Company which lies between the Peterborough and Sibston stations; secondly, such sum annually as shall be equal to 5 per cent. per annum upon the costs of the land and buildings to be occupied exclusively by the said company of the second part; thirdly, such sum annually as shall be equal to 7 per cent. per annum upon one half of the outlay of the station and buildings jointly used by the said two companies with the exception of land, and as shall be equal to 5 per cent. upon the land occupied by such jointly used station and buildings; fourthly, one moiety of the expenses of the management and conduct of the said joint station. Fifthly, that the said company of the second part shall keep in repair at their own expense so much of the said station and buildings as they shall exclusively occupy as aforesaid, and shall repay the said company of the first part all the outlay they have made upon internal fittings. Sixthly, that the said company of the first part shall keep in repair at their own expense the station and buildings to be jointly used, and shall manage and conduct the affairs and business of the said joint station, and shall deliver an account half-yearly to the said company of the second part of the expenses of such management, and that the said company of the first part shall provide the same amount of accommodation in all respects for the said company of the second part as for themselves, and act with impartiality in the management of the said station. These were the provisions for the division between the companies of certain portions of the traffic. The station at Peterborough used in common by the said two companies, as mentioned in the said agreement, is "the station," and ever since the execution of the said agreement the same has been and still is in force and effect, and the occupation of the station has been in fact under and in conformity with the said agreement, and leaving out of consideration the sum receivable by the appellants in respect of the portion of the line described in the recital of the said indenture as "a portion of the line leading to such station," on which for the purposes of this case nothing turns, the sum annually receivable by the appellants from the London and North-Western Railway Company under the said agreement, and charged in their published accounts to their credit as so receivable (and which in fact has been in part received, and no reason has been assigned in the said accounts, or was alleged at the trial, why the remainder should not be received, except that at the trial it was sworn that the London and North-Western Railway Company had refused to pay the same), has annually amounted and still amounts, after deducting the expenses of the management and conduct of the said joint station, to 5084*l.* 3*s.* 1*d.*; that is to say, to 1735*l.* 10*s.*, being a sum equal to the 5 per cent. per annum upon the cost of the land and buildings exclusively occupied by the London and North-Western Railway Company, and to 3348*l.* 13*s.* 1*d.*, being a sum equal to the 7 per cent. per annum upon one-half of the outlay of the station and buildings jointly used by the said two companies, and 5 per cent. per annum upon the land occupied by such jointly used station and buildings.

Up to the year 1850 a very large traffic, both in passengers and goods from Peterborough and the north-eastern and midland counties, was carried to London by the Eastern Counties Railway, with a view to which traffic the station was laid out and erected by the sp-pellants. The traffic from these districts was brought on to the Eastern Counties Railway at Peterborough by the Great Northern Railway (which did not then extend towards London further than Peterborough) by the Peterborough Lyston branch of the Midland Railway and by the then London and North-Western Railway. In the year 1850 the Great Northern Railway was opened from Peterborough to London, by a route which was shorter than that of the Eastern Counties Railway by twenty-six miles.

Immediately upon the opening of the Great Northern Railway, all the passenger traffic and a large portion of the goods traffic between Peterborough and London was diverted from the Eastern Counties Railway to the Great Northern Railway. Goods, however, were still brought on to the Eastern Counties line at Peterborough by the Midland Railway Company until the year 1857, when, by the opening of the Leicester and Hitchin Railway, the Midland Railway Company obtained an independent route to London, and accordingly ceased to send goods from Peterborough to London by the Eastern Counties Railway.

In 1858 the Welwyn and Hertford branch line was opened, by which the traffic at Peterborough was still further diminished, and since that year (with the exception of coals as hereinafter mentioned) the traffic at Peterborough of all kinds, so far as the appellants are concerned, has been confined to the short local traffic. For the purposes of such traffic an ordinary road-side station would be sufficient, and in consequence of this diminution in the traffic a large repairing shop and other buildings at the station in question have been taken down, and others have been allowed to fall into decay. The Great Northern Railway Company have an entirely separate station at Peterborough for the purposes of their own traffic. Between Peterborough and Ely, to which branch the station in question belongs, the traffic is so small that the branch is worked at a loss by the appellants. There is a considerable coal traffic belonging to the appellants passing through the station. There is no depôt of coals there, but the sidings are made use of for the purpose of shunting the trains, and additional sidings have from time to time been laid down for this purpose. There is a great competition between the railway companies for this coal traffic, and the rates are low, and this branch of traffic only becomes profitable when the coals are carried in large quantities and for long distances.

The buildings comprised in the station are now used in many cases for purposes entirely different and inferior to that for which they were originally erected, the offices intended for passenger traffic being used for store-rooms and other similar purposes. To an ordinary tenant, for any other purpose than that of a railway, the station would be of no annual value if he were bound to maintain the buildings in a state of repair.

At the trial of the appeal, the annual rateable value of "the station" as and for the purposes of a station, and for the purposes to which it was, in fact, applied, after making all deductions, was estimated by the witnesses called by the appellants at sums not exceeding 635*l.*, but those witnesses, in ascertaining the said annual rateable value, did not take into account the said annual sum receivable by the appellants from the North-Western Railway Company under the said agreement, or any part thereof. It was contended for the appellants that the said annual sum agreed upon in 1848, under a different state of circumstances for the objects mentioned in the agreement, ought not to be taken into account in ascertaining the annual rateable value of the station, or the sum at which it would now let to a tenant from year to year, and that the appellants were not, and are not by law, liable to be assessed to the rate in respect of or upon that sum, or any part of it.

The respondents contended that the hypothetical tenant from year to year contemplated by the 6 & 7 Will. 4, c. 96, must be supposed to be placed in the same position as the appellants in respect of the payment made under the agreement, such payment arising necessarily out of the occupation; that, if the tenant would be entitled to the payment, it would enhance the amount of the rent which, as tenant from year to year, he would be willing to offer for "the station;" and that therefore the appellants were by law liable to be assessed to the rate in respect of or upon such payment.

The court were of opinion that the annual rateable value of the station, not estimating the payment from the North-Western Railway Company, was 635*l.*, and they ordered the rate to be amended by substituting in it the sum of 635*l.* for the sum of 1889*l.* 15*s.*

The question for the Court of Queen's Bench is, whether the sum of money payable to the appellants under the agreement of 1848 by the London and North-Western Railway Company, ought to form part of the rateable value of the station.

If the said Court of Queen's Bench should answer the said question in the negative, the order of the quarter sessions is to be confirmed, and the rate to stand amended, and the respondents are to be ordered by the said Court of Queen's Bench to pay to the appellants their costs of and occasioned by this special case.

If the Court of Queen's Bench should answer the said question in the affirmative, the order of quarter sessions is to be quashed as to the substitution therein of 635*l.* for 1889*l.* 15*s.*, and the said sum of 1889*l.* 15*s.* is to remain in the rate, and the appellants are to be ordered by the said Court of Queen's Bench to pay to the respondents their costs of and occasioned by this special case.

Bovill, Q.C. and Markby, for the appellants, contended that the sessions were right, and that the true test of the rateable value was that which a tenant would at present give to rent the premises, according to the provisions of the 6 & 7 Will. 4, c. 96 (the Parochial Assessment Act), the rent or compensation agreed to be given by the London and North-Western Company not being the true criterion, that company having bound itself to give far more than the present real rateable value for the premises: (South-Eastern Railway Company v. Dorking, 3 Ell. & Bl. 499; Reg. v. The Eastern Counties Railway, 23 L. J. 96 n. M. C.; The Newmarket Railway Company v. St. Andrew-the-Less, 3 Ell. & Bl. 94.)

Keane, for the respondents, contended that the sessions were wrong, for that taking into consideration the liability of the London and North-Western Railway Company, the appellants are only rated at what a tenant would give: (Colleson v. The Monkwearmouth Shore, 4 Ell. & Bl. 13.)

Jan. 12.—COCKBURN, C.J.—This was a case stated for the opinion of this court by the Court of Quarter Sessions for the county of Huntingdon, on an appeal by the Eastern Counties Railway Company against a rate made on them in respect of their railway-station at Peterborough. The facts, so far as they are material, are shortly as follow:—The Eastern Counties Railway Company, the sole proprietors of the station in question, in the year 1848, entered into an agreement with the London and North-Western Railway Company, to endure for the term of 999 years, whereby the latter company were to have the joint use of the station for their traffic; they, on the other hand, binding themselves to pay for such use of the station according to certain terms stipulated in the agreement. The direct Northern Railway having since been opened, a considerable portion of the traffic of the North-Western line has, in consequence, been obstructed, and the station has become worth much less to the London and North-Western Company; and there is no doubt that if the matter were res integra—if the present London and North-Western Company, or any other company, working their line unfettered by the existing agreement, proposed to take from the Eastern Counties Company the use of the station at a yearly rent—such rent would barely amount to a third part of the sum actually paid. The parish of Fletton, in which the station in question is situated, having assessed the Eastern Counties Company in the larger sum, the company appealed against the rate, on the ground that, according to the Parochial Assessment Act, the rateable value is not the rent actually paid by the existing occupiers, but that which it may be presumed that an incoming tenant from year to year would give for the subject of the occupation. Adopting their view, the court of quarter sessions ordered the rate to be amended by reducing the rateable value on which the company had been assessed, from the sum of 1889*l.* 15*s.* to 635*l.* We are of opinion that this decision was erroneous, and that the original assessment was right. The fallacy of the argument in favour of the company consists in looking at the London and North-Western Company as the occupiers, and in considering what a tenant from year to year, coming in their place, would pay as rent for the use of the station. But the London and North-Western Railway Company are not occupiers of the station at all. They had only an enjoyment by way of user—in other words, an easement. The occupiers are the Eastern Counties Company, subject to this easement of the other company; and the true question is, what would a tenant coming into the place of the Eastern Counties Company give for such occupation? Now it is plain that a tenant coming into their place, in considering what rent he would give, after the necessary deductions, would take into account, as increasing the value of the premises, the amount to be annually paid by the London and North-Western Company for their user of the station. It is true the Eastern Counties Company, if they were to let the station, though they could, of course, only let that subject to the right of the London and North-Western Company to use it, might, taking a lower rent from their immediate lessee, reserve to themselves the receipt of the amount annually payable by the London and North-Western Company. Whether under such circumstances they would not still remain liable as occupiers quoad a moiety of the line, the London and North-Western Company having only an easement therein, it is unnecessary to decide. It is sufficient, in our opinion, for the present purpose to say, that, rebus sic stantibus, they are assessable to the full amount of what they receive. The very principle according to which the value of the occupation to the hypothetical tenant contemplated by the Parochial Assessment Act is to be estimated, is to assume the continuance of those circumstances which constitute the value to the existing occupier, unless it be made to appear that these circumstances are about to undergo a change. But there is nothing in the present case to lead to the supposition that the Eastern Counties Company will either forego their right, under a very advantageous agreement, which is to bind the London and North-Western Company to a very remote future, or that the Eastern Counties Company will either let the station to any other occupier; or, if they do, will place such occupier relatively to the other company in a different position from that in which they themselves stand. It will be time enough to deal with such altered circumstances when they arise. At present the Eastern Counties Company, as occupiers of the station, derive a profit, not only from their own use of the station, but also in respect of the sum annually paid by the London and North-Western Company for their use of it, and they ought, in justice, to contribute to the local burdens in proportion to the entire benefit which they derive from the occupier; and we think they fail legally, as they certainly do morally, in the attempt to withdraw themselves from such fair and equal contribution. The order of quarter sessions must therefore be quashed, and the rate will stand according to the original assessment.

Order of sessions quashed.

REG. v. THE REGISTRAR OF THE MEDICAL COUNCIL OF ENGLAND.

Medical Practitioners Act—Procuring entry of name on register by fraud—Infamous conduct—Erasure of name—21 & 22 Vict. c. 90, ss. 26, 29.

A medical practitioner represented that he had been educated abroad, and had a foreign diploma, and so procured his name to be entered on the register of medical practitioners, kept in pursuance of the 21 & 22 Vict. c. 90. The council afterwards erased the name, on the ground that the entry had been procured by fraud, but without giving the accused an opportunity of being heard. This court afterwards ordered the name to be restored, when the general council gave the accused notice that it was again proposed to erase his name, and called upon him to show cause to the contrary. On the day fixed the accused attended with his solicitor, when a further charge of "infamous conduct in a professional respect" (sect. 29) was preferred, founded on an alleged attempt to procure a degree at a Scotch University, by another personating him and undergoing the examination. The accused claimed to be heard by counsel, which was refused, whereupon the inquiry proceeded, the accused, though present, making no defence. The council decided that the entry was fraudulently made, and that the accused had been guilty of infamous conduct in a professional respect: Held, that the name of the accused person was liable to be struck off the register, both under the 26th and the 29th sections, and that it made no difference, that the misconduct occurred before the passing of the Medical Practitioners Act.

This was a rule nisi calling on the Registrar-General of the Medical Council for England, to show cause why a mandamus should not issue commanding them to restore the name of the prosecutor Mr. Organ to the register, from which it had been erased by order of the council.

Under the Medical Practitioners Act, 21 & 22 Vict. c. 90, all persons having certain qualifications were entitled to have their names entered on the register; and by the 45th section a power was given to the general council of dispensing with those general regulations in favour of gentlemen practising in the colonies, or in England with foreign or colonial diplomas, or in the employ of the army and navy, or of the public service, or of the East India Company.

The prosecutor Mr. Organ had petitioned the council under that section, and represented that he was educated in a foreign university, where he had obtained a diploma, and also that he was in the public service as a medical officer and vaccinator to certain parishes in Yorkshire. The Medical Council decided to dispense with the general regulations of the Act in his favour, as being a person employed in the "public service," and his name was accordingly entered on the register.

Objections were subsequently made to his name continuing on the register, upon the ground, first, that he had obtained the privilege by fraud; and secondly, that he had also been guilty of "infamous conduct in a professional respect," which, by the 26th and 29th sections of the Act, were grounds for causing a name to be erased from the register. The Medical Council being satisfied that his name ought to be erased upon these grounds, ordered it to be erased; but they did so without giving him notice of their intention, and affording him an opportunity of appearing before them to show cause to the contrary. He accordingly applied to this court and obtained a mandamus to be restored, and that writ being obeyed by the council, they gave him a formal notice that it was proposed to erase his name from the register, and called upon him to appear and show cause to the contrary.

The prosecutor accordingly attended with his solicitor, and begged to be heard by counsel; but, as the council refused this application, he declined to take any part in the proceedings, though he continued present during the whole inquiry.

One part of the charge made against him was, that he had attempted to procure a medical degree at Edinburgh, by sending some one to personate himself, and undergo the examination in his stead. This occurred before the passing of the Medical Practitioners Act. The trick, however, it was stated, did not succeed, as the person sent to personate the prosecutor was plucked on the examination. In the result the council came to the conclusion that the entry was "fraudulently made," and that the prosecutor had been guilty of "infamous conduct in a professional respect," and ordered his name to be erased from the register.

He then again applied to this court, and obtained a rule for a mandamus to be restored upon the ground that the Medical Council had no power, either under the 26th or 29th sections, to order any name once registered under the 46th section to be erased for anything done prior to the registration.

No question was now raised as to the propriety of the erasure, but only as to the jurisdiction of the council to order it.

By the 21 & 22 Vict. c. 90, s. 26, it is enacted, "That no qualification shall be entered on the register, either on the first registration or by way of addition to a registered name, unless the registrar be satisfied by the proper evidence that the person claiming is entitled to it; and any appeal from the decision of the registrar may be decided by the general council, or by the Council for England, Scotland, or Ireland (as the case may be), and any entry which shall be proved to the satisfaction of such general council or branch council to have been fraudulently and incorrectly made may be erased from the register by order in writing of such general council or branch council."

Sect. 29 enacts, "That if any medical practitioner shall be convicted in England or Ireland of any felony or misdemeanor, or in Scotland of any crime or offence, or shall, after due inquiry, be judged by the general council to have been guilty of infamous conduct in any professional respect, the general council may, if they see fit, direct the registrar to erase the name of such medical practitioner from the register."

M. Smith and Sleight showed cause on behalf of the council, and Hayes, Serjt. supported the rule.

CROMPTON, J.—I am of opinion that the rule ought to be discharged. If the facts are disputed the general rule is to make the rule absolute for a mandamus, and send the case down to have the facts found by a jury. But the present is not a case of that kind, for the prosecutor Mr. Organ had an opportunity of disputing the facts, but he did not avail himself of it. If the council had power to adjudicate, this court will not interfere unless there was no evidence upon which to act. Under the 26th section any person may come and say that there had been fraud, and that section applies as well to persons whose names have been registered pursuant to the 46th section as to those whose names have been registered under the previous section; for there may be fraud in imposing upon the council as well as upon the registrar. If it were necessary to give an opinion upon the point, I should say that the 29th section also applied to the case.

HILL, J.—I am of the same opinion. I entirely agree with my brother Crompton that the granting of this writ is to a certain extent discretionary, and that in this case the court ought not to interfere. Some terms ago the prosecutor obtained a mandamus to restore his name, upon the ground that the council struck his name off the register for misconduct, and did not give him an opportunity of being heard. But when the council gave him that opportunity, he attended with his solicitor, and when the specific charges were made known he asked to be heard by counsel. The Medical Council, in their discretion, declined to grant that request, and called upon him to answer the charges. He declined to do so, although the charges were minute and specific, and if untrue he might easily have answered them, but he confined himself to disputing the jurisdiction of the council. The council then found two facts; first, that the entry was fraudulently obtained, and they ordered it to be struck out under the 26th section; and they also adjudged that he had been guilty of "infamous conduct in a professional respect." The question thus arises, whether the 26th and the 29th sections apply. [His Lordship then referred to the various sections of the Act.] In my opinion the 26th section applies to a case like the present, where the name has been entered under the 46th section; and the 29th section also applies if the conviction takes place after, although the offence of "infamous conduct in a professional respect" may have been committed before the name is registered.

DAVIES (appellant) v. LORD BERWICK (respondent).

Master and servant—Servant in husbandry—

Who is not.

The appellant was hired "to keep the accounts of the farm, to weigh out the food for the cattle, to set the men to work and to lend his hand to anything, and especially to carry out the orders of his employer."
Held, that he was not "a servant in husbandry" within the meaning of the 4 Geo. 4, c. 34, s. 3.

This was a case stated under the 20 & 21 Vict. c. 43, upon a conviction of the appellant as a servant in husbandry under the 4 Geo. 4, c. 34, s. 3, for refusing to obey his master's orders. It appeared that the appellant was hired at wages amounting to 12 5s. per week, to keep the accounts of the farm, to weigh out the food for the cattle, to set the men to work, "and to lend his hand to anything, and especially to carry out the orders of his employer." His misconduct, for which he was convicted, consisted in his refusing to do a particular act which he was ordered to do for his master.

By the 4 Geo. 4, c. 34, s. 3, it is enacted "that if any servant in husbandry . . . shall contract with any person or persons whomsoever to serve him, her, or them, for any time or times whatsoever, or in any other manner . . . or neglect to fulfil the same, or be guilty of any other misconduct or misdemeanor in the execution thereof . . . then and in every such case it shall and may be lawful for any justice of the peace to commit," &c.

Bovill, Q.C. now appeared in support of the conviction, and contended that the appellant came within the description of "servant in husbandry," and that the conviction was right: (Lilley v. Elwin, 11 Q. B. 742; Ex parte Ormrod, 1 D. & L. 825; Bowers v. Lovekin, 25 L. J. 371, Q. B.)

Huddleston, Q.C., contra, argued that the appellant did not come within the description of servant in husbandry, for that he was in truth a farm bailiff: (Kitchen v. Shaw, 6 A. & E. 729.)

COCKBURN, C. J.—I think this conviction should be quashed. The statute evidently means by the designation used, a person who is to do something with his own hands. I cannot think that the first part of his employment refers to a servant in husbandry; for, first, he is to keep the general accounts of the farm; secondly, to weigh out the food and set the men to work. Now that is the general employment; and in addition he is to lend his hand to anything, and especially to carry out the orders of his employer; this, however, cannot make him a servant in husbandry. I think the conviction is wrong and ought to be quashed.

CROMPTON and HILL, JJ. concurred.

— Conviction quashed.

THE OVERSEERS OF EAST DEAN v. EVERETT.

Poor-rates—Recovery—Overseers succeeding those who made rate—43 Eliz. c. 2, s. 4—17 Geo. 2, c. 38, s. 11.

The power given to "succeeding overseers" by 17 Geo. 2, c. 38, s. 11, to levy arrears to reimburse those who preceded them, is not confined to those overseers who immediately succeeded those who made the rate.

The respondent was summoned by the appellants to the petty sessions for the Newnham division of the county of Gloucester, for poor-rates, one made on the 1st Jan. 1858, for 4s. 5d., and the other on the 16th June 1858, for 9s. 3½d. The overseers who made the rates continued in office until the 25th March 1859, at which time other persons were appointed, who remained in office till the 28th March 1860, when the appellants were appointed.

The summons was for the above-named two rates of 4s. 5d. and 9s. 3½d., and for costs 3s. 6d.

The justices, upon the hearing of the summons, decided that the appellants could not recover the said rate, because they were of opinion that a poor-rate cannot be recovered except by those who made it, or by those who may be the overseers in the year next after that in which it was made.

The said overseers being dissatisfied with the decision, applied to the justices to state and sign a case for the opinion of this court, whether, upon the facts stated, the justices ought to have made an order for the payment of the said rates made on the 1st Jan. and 16th June 1858, and have granted a warrant of distress.

Hopwood for the appellants.—There is nothing in the Acts of Parliament, 43 Eliz. c. 2, s. 4, and 17 Geo. 2, c. 28, s. 11, to limit the recovering of a rate to the overseers immediately succeeding those who made it, (11 & 12 Vict. c. 91, s. 1.)

No one appeared for the respondents.

CROMPTON, J.—But for the 11th section of the 17 Geo. 2, c. 38, there never could have been any difficulty about this question. That section provides "that in case any person or persons shall refuse or neglect to pay to such overseers as aforesaid any sum or sums of money that he, she, or they shall be legally rated or assessed to, it shall and may be lawful to and for the succeeding overseers, and they are hereby required, to levy such arrears, and out of the money so levied to reimburse their predecessors all sums of money which they have expended for the use of the poor," &c. But then in the 4th section of the 43 Eliz. c. 2, there is no such restriction—the word there used is "arrearages." According to that a man who does not pay to one overseer must to a subsequent one, and as that Act stood there could be no difficulty. Then came the 17 Geo. 2, but it is clear that that Act was passed for the relief of outgoing overseers, and that the successors might be enabled to levy rates not levied by them, and to reimburse to them moneys expended by them. That appears sensible and just, and I dare say, when the case was before the justices, the later statute was alone brought to their notice, and not the earlier.

Judgment for appellants. Remitted to justices, with answer in the affirmative that they should issue warrant.

Monday, Jan. 28.

Ex parte McLeod.

Where justices have heard an information and dismissed it, on the ground that they had no jurisdiction, at the same time offering to grant a case, this court refused to grant a rule desiring them to hear and determine.

Collier, Q. C. moved for a rule to show cause why the justices of Southampton should not hear and determine an information laid by Murdock McLeod, one of the metropolitan police force, against a person named John Hammond, for an assault. By statutory enactment the metropolitan police are empowered to do duty in the dockyards, and at the time in question they were on duty at the Clarence-yard at Gosport, the complainant McLeod being one of them; an information was laid by him against Hammond for an assault upon him, and the justices, upon having their attention called to the 10 Geo. 4, c. 44, and the 20 & 21 Vict. c. 64, were of opinion that the assault was proved; but they said they had no jurisdiction, inasmuch as the statutes in question applied only to magistrates in the metropolis; and thereupon they said they had no power to interfere, and declined to adjudicate; but they dismissed the information, and offered to grant a case. [HILL, J.—The justices did adjudicate. CROMPTON, J.—They did what was right—they offered to grant a case; we cannot grant a rule for justices to decide a case in a particular way.] They declined jurisdiction. [WIGHTMAN, J.—They clearly have adjudicated.] It is now too late for a case; and if the justices have erred in law, this court will grant a rule.

Poulden, who appeared to show cause in the first instance, was not called on.

WIGHTMAN, J.—I think there should be no rule; the magistrates heard the case, have determined it, and dismissed the information; it is gone, and they have decided it; we cannot say they are to decide in a particular manner.

CROMPTON, J.—The complainant ought to have taken a case; we cannot interfere; we could not have granted a mandamus before the Act substituting these rules for a mandamus, for here the justices have decided the case.

HILL, J.—I am of the same opinion. I think, if before the recent Act a mandamus had been issued, the facts here stated would have been a good and sufficient return.

BLACKBURN, J.—I am of the same opinion; and even if there were authority to support this application, I think a case so much more convenient a remedy, that I think in our discretion we ought not to interfere.

Rule refused.

REG. v. HENRY SPARROW.

Assault—Verdict of aggravated assault—Grievous bodily harm—Entering verdict.

An indictment contained counts charging an assault, and unlawfully and maliciously inflicting grievous bodily harm, and also a count for a common assault.

At the trial evidence was given that the prisoner inflicted serious bodily injuries upon the prosecutor. The jury found the prisoner guilty of an aggravated assault without premeditation, and that it was done under the influence of passion:

Held, that the verdict was rightly entered on the record on the counts charging an assault and unlawfully and maliciously inflicting grievous bodily harm.

C. CAS. R.]

REG. v. HENRY SPARROW.

[C. CAS. R.]

Case stated for the opinion of this court by the recorder of Birmingham.

The defendant was tried at the Michaelmas quarter sessions of the peace for the borough of Birmingham, on an indictment charging him in one set of counts with an assault on one Saml. Griffiths, and with having thereby unlawfully and maliciously inflicted grievous bodily harm upon the said Griffiths. The indictment contained also a count for common assault.

It was proved in evidence before me, that on the 6th Sept. 1860 the prosecutor was standing in a shop in High-street, Birmingham. The defendant passed and saw the prosecutor there. The defendant came and stood on the step of the shop for a few minutes, till the prosecutor was leaving. The defendant then handed to the prosecutor a letter and asked him to read it. The prosecutor declined to do so, and was going away. The defendant then struck the prosecutor with his fists two violent blows upon the mouth, another blow on the temple, and a fourth on the back of the ear. The prosecutor retreated backwards, the defendant following him up and striking at him. The prosecutor then struck the defendant a blow over the hat with a stick. In retreating the prosecutor's foot slipped against the kerb-stone, and he fell heavily upon his side. The defendant went to him, wrenched the stick from him, and then went away.

The prosecutor and the medical witnesses described the injuries which the prosecutor thereby sustained as follows:—Three of his front teeth and other teeth further up the jaw were loosened, his gums were lacerated, and his mouth was swollen. The pain under which the prosecutor was suffering immediately after the accident was stated by the medical witness to be insufferable. One of the front teeth and the back teeth have since partially fastened, but the two front teeth have not done so, and the prosecutor must lose the same. The mouth and jaw remained sore and stiff so that the prosecutor could not eat solid food for more than a week. His nervous system received a shock from which he suffered so that the medical men at an interval of sixteen days advised his going away from business for a time, and he received an injury on his side from which he had felt, and at the time of the trial (9th Oct.) was still feeling, pain.

I told the jury that the injuries inflicted on the prosecutor, as described by the medical witnesses and the prosecutor himself, fell within the definition of "grievous bodily harm," and that, if they believed the witnesses, there was evidence to support the first count (or set of counts) in the indictment; and in reply to a question from the jury, I explained to them that the question of whether the defendant intended to inflict grievous bodily harm upon the prosecutor did not arise in this case, but that the simple point for their consideration was, did the defendant unlawfully "assault the prosecutor, and thereby inflict upon him grievous bodily harm?"

The jury returned the following verdict:—"We find the defendant guilty of an aggravated assault, but without premeditation; it was done under the influence of passion."

It was contended on the part of the defendant, that that finding amounted to a verdict of guilty upon the count for the common assault only.

I held otherwise, and directed a verdict of guilty to be entered upon the first set of counts; and the question I submit for the consideration of the Court of Criminal Appeal is, was I right in so holding?

M. D. HILL, Recorder.

Huddleston (A. Wills with him) for the prisoner. —The question is, whether the jury found the prisoner guilty of the offence charged in the first set of counts in the indictment. These are framed either upon the 10 Geo. 4, c. 34, s. 29, or the 14 & 15 Vict. c. 19, s. 4. The latter enactment is, "And whereas it is expedient to make further provision for the punishment of aggravated assaults, be it enacted that if any person shall unlawfully and maliciously inflict upon any other person, either with or without any weapon or instrument, any grievous bodily harm, or unlawfully and maliciously inflict, cut, stab, or wound any other person, every such offender shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and, being convicted thereof, shall be liable at the discretion of the court to be imprisoned with or without hard labour for any term not exceeding three years: provided, however, that nothing herein contained shall be deemed or taken to repeal the provisions of the 29th section of the 10 Geo. 4, c. 34." The jury have not found the prisoner guilty of assaulting with intent to commit grievous bodily harm, but only of an aggravated assault. An aggravated assault does not necessarily mean one accompanied by grievous bodily harm—it may mean one of an insulting character, e. g. spitting at a person.

HILL, J.—Why should we assume that the jury have found a verdict contrary to the facts, when the verdict they have found is consistent with those facts? Mr. Archbold, in his treatise on Criminal Pleadings, begins with "aggravated assaults." No one exercising his common sense can have any doubt as to the meaning of the word.

CHANNELL, B.—The statement before us enables us to construe what the jury meant by an aggravated assault.

CROMPTON, J.—We must take the verdict with reference to the subject-matter of the charge, and what was left to the jury.

Huddleston.—The jury may, consistently with the facts, have intended not to find the prisoner guilty of intending bodily harm, but only of an aggravated assault. The recorder did not tell the jury that "bodily harm" and an aggravated assault were the same thing. The jury have not found what is really the ingredient in an assault with intent to do grievous bodily harm; secondly, the jury having found that the assault was without premeditation, and under the influence of passion, the verdict of guilty ought not to be entered on the first set of counts. As malice is the distinction between murder and manslaughter, so here it is the distinction between grievous bodily harm and a common assault. So in arson, malice is necessary to constitute the crime.

HILL, J.—You make no distinction between "premeditation" and "intention," between intentionally doing an unlawful act and causelessly doing it.

CROMPTON, J.—Here I think we must take it that the prisoner intended to do the act.

Huddleston.—The word "maliciously" is used in the statute, which means something more than intentionally.

Ballantine, Serjt. (Adams and O'Brien with him) for the prosecution, was not called upon.

ERLE, C.J.—We are of opinion that the conviction ought to be affirmed. The objection is made to the language in which the jury returned their verdict: "We find the defendant guilty of an aggravated assault, but without premeditation. It was done under the influence of passion." It is very rare indeed to meet with language which cannot be perverted. We must construe the language used by the jury by looking at the circumstances under which the verdict was returned. The question was raised, whether the prisoner committed the assault with intent to do grievous bodily harm. The intent was discussed, and an explanation of what the statute meant given by the recorder, and then the jury say, "We find the defendant guilty of an aggravated assault." It is impossible, to my mind, for any one to have entered any thing on the record in respect of that finding other than what has been entered. It was contended that this finding was a negative of some ingredient necessary to constitute the offence of "grievous bodily harm ;" and that the party must have intended to commit the crime of grievous bodily harm. We are all of opinion that the assault was intentional in the understanding of the law, though the jury have found that it was without premeditation and under the influence of passion. We therefore think that the verdict authorised the recorder in entering a verdict of guilty on the first set of counts.

The rest of the court concurring,

Conviction affirmed.

VAUGHAN (Clerk) v. SOUTH METROPOLITAN CEMETERY COMPANY.

Burial fees—District churches and chapels—Cemetery Act and Church Building Acts considered.

The incumbent of a district chapelry constituted by order in council under the Church Building Acts, is entitled to the fees payable by a cemetery company for the interment of the dead removed from the district attached to such chapelry, where the Act of Parliament incorporating the Cemetery Company has been passed previously to the assignment of such district chapelry.

This was a bill filed by the Rev. Matthew Vaughan, the incumbent of the district chapelry of St. John Angell-town, Brixton, against the South Metropolitan Cemetery Company and their registrar, and also the incumbent of the said district parish, praying that it might be declared that the plaintiff and his successors, incumbents of the said district chapelry of St. John were entitled to the fees payable by the cemetery company in respect of the interment of persons removed for the purpose of interment from the said district chapelry within the consecrated parts of the said cemetery; for an account of the amount of such fees from the commencement of the incumbency of the Rev. N. A. Garland, the incumbent of the said district parish, and for payment thereof.

It appeared that by an Act incorporating the cemetery company (6 & 7 Will. 4, c. cxxix.) it was enacted by sect. 18, that upon the interment of every person within the consecrated part of the cemetery who should appear by the books of the company to have been removed for the purpose of interment from the parish in which the cemetery should be situate, or from any parish in the county of Surrey adjoining thereto, or from any of the parishes of Lambeth, Battersea and Wandsworth, or from any parishes within the cities of London or Westminster, or borough of Southwark, according to the limits therein mentioned, the said company should pay unto the incumbent for the time being of the church or chapel of the parish or other ecclesiastical district or division of the parish from which such person should be so removed, the fees following (setting out these fees).

By the 19th section it was enacted that the company should cause proper books to be kept for the purpose of ascertaining the amount of such fees.

By the 20th section the company was required twice in every year to cause an account to be made up of such fees, and delivered to the incumbents for the time being of the churches or chapels of the several parishes, or of the ecclesiastical districts or divisions of said parishes.

By the 22nd section it was provided that the incumbent should pay to the churchwardens or chapelwardens for the time being of his church or chapel, out of every sum of 20s. received by virtue of the Act, in respect of interments in any vault, catacomb or brick grave in said cemetery, the sum of 12s., and out of every sum of 7s. 6d. in respect of interments in the open ground of said cemetery the sum of 3s. 6d., to be respectively paid and applied by them in the same manner and amongst the same persons (including the incumbents of such churches and chapels) and in the same proportions as the fees or interments which said churchwardens and chapelwardens were entitled to, receive in their respective parishes, districts, or divisions of parishes were and ought by law or custom to be paid and applied."

The subsequent sections provided for various modes of carrying out the above provisions.

In pursuance of this Act the company was formed, and now possess, a cemetery at Norwood, in the parish of Lambeth; St. Matthew, Brixton, was a parish adjoining thereto. Part of the cemetery was set apart for the interment of the dead, and duly consecrated.

The parish of Lambeth was divided into two distinct and separate parishes, the one known as St. Mary, Lambeth, the other as the district parish of St. Matthew, Brixton.

In 1853 a church called the Church of St. John, Angell-town, in the district parish of St. Matthew, Brixton, was duly consecrated, but no burial-ground is attached to such church.

In 1853 a district was assigned to such consecrated church at St. John, Angell-town, by an order in council of the 8th Aug. of that year.

The plaintiff has been the incumbent of such district chapelry of St. John from the said 8th Aug. 1853.

The defendant N. A. Garland is the incumbent of the district parish of St. Matthew, he having been appointed in 1855. He claimed the burial fees provided by the Cemetery Act, from such appointment.

The plaintiff submitted that he and his successors were entitled to them.

Cur. adv. vult.

The VICE-CHANCELLOR said:—The question in this case turns upon the mode of distribution of certain sums payable by the defendants the South Metropolitan Cemetery Company under the provisions of their Act, to the incumbents of certain parishes from which the dead who are buried by the cemetery company shall be removed. The Act contains nothing in the recital which assists in the determination of the question before me. It simply recites that it is convenient that a general cemetery company should be established, reciting nothing with reference to the payments to be made, or the conditions upon which the privilege is to be conceded by Parliament of forming this cemetery company; the question arising between the incumbents of districts which have now been severed pursuant to various Acts of Parliament. These are numerous; but it is sufficient to say that one existed anterior to the passing of the Cemetery Act, the 58 Geo. 3, c. 43, one of the earlier Acts authorising the division of parishes into districts. The cemetery company's Act provides for the payment of the incumbents of parishes and ecclesiastical districts by a certain fixed sum of money with reference to every one whom they may inter, whose corpse shall be removed from such parishes or districts. It then provides for the appropriation of the money so to be received by the incumbents. The question arises in this way. Out of the large parish of St. Mary's,

VAUGHAN v. SOUTH METROPOLITAN CEMETERY COMPANY.

[V.C. W.]

Lambeth, a district parish called St. Matthews was severed, anterior to the passing of the Cemetery Act, from the general body of that parish. After the passing of the Cemetery Act another district was severed out of St. Matthew, which district is called the district of St. John, Angell-town, and of that district the present plaintiff the Rev. Mr. Vaughan is incumbent. The point in dispute therefore lies as between the incumbent of St. Matthew, namely, the Rev. Mr. Garland, the defendant, and the Rev. Mr. Vaughan, the incumbent of this district of St. John, Angell-town. Now the 18th section of the Act provides this: It is enacted "that upon the interment of every person within the consecrated part of the said cemetery, who shall appear by the books of the company to have been removed for the purpose of interment from the parish in which the cemetery shall be situated, or from any parish in the county of Surrey adjoining thereto, or from any of the parishes, of Lambeth, Battersea, and Wandsworth, in the said county of Surrey, or from any parish within the cities of London and Westminster, or the borough of Southwark, according to the limits thereof settled and described in an Act passed in the second and third year of the reign of his present Majesty, intituled 'An Act to settle and describe the divisions of counties, and the limits of cities and boroughs in England and Wales, so far as respects the election of members to serve in Parliament,' the said company shall pay unto the incumbent for the time being of the church or chapel of the parish or other ecclesiastical district or division of the parish from which such person shall be so removed, the fees following; that is to say, in case such person shall be interred within any vault, catacomb or brick grave, the fee of 20s., and in case such person shall be interred in the open ground, the fee of 7s. 6d." So far as anything appears by that section, there is nothing to point out that this is to be confined to things as they then stood at the existing period of the Act. The provision is, "that whenever any corpse shall be removed from any parish," &c., and Acts had been passed at the time which authorised the subdivision of parishes into ecclesiastical districts. The possible existence of such a case, therefore, is distinctly recognised by the provision I have read, which states that when a corpse is removed for the purpose of interment from the parish in which the cemetery is situated, or from any parish in Surrey adjoining thereto, or from any of the parishes of Lambeth, Battersea and Wandsworth, or from any parish within the city of London and Westminster or the borough of Southwark, the company shall pay to the incumbent of the church or chapel of the parish or other ecclesiastical district or division of the parish from which the corpse shall be removed, the fees of 20s. and 7s. 6d. respectively. Then the 22nd section contains this provision: "And be it further enacted that every such incumbent shall pay to the churchwardens or chapelwardens for the time being of his church or chapel, out of every sum of 20s. that he shall receive by virtue of this Act in respect of interments in any vault, catacomb, or brick grave in the said cemetery the sum of 12s., and out of every sum of 7s. 6d. in respect of interments in the open ground of the said cemetery the sum of 3s. 6d., to be respectively paid and applied by them in the said manner and amongst the same persons (including the incumbents of such churches and chapels), and in the same proportions as the fees on interments which the said churchwardens and chapelwardens are entitled to receive in their respective parishes, districts, or divisions of parishes are or ought by law or custom to be paid or applied." Now, certainly there is some little difficulty created by that section of the Act, as to what the distinct intention of the Legislature was. The provision points, in a certain degree, to some existing state of things, speaking of churchwardens who happen to be entitled at the time to receive these payments. And they are to be distributed in such a manner in the several parishes and districts, as are, or ought by law or custom to be applied. The question, therefore, that arises is, whether this affords sufficient indication to show that the Act, when it directed payments to be made to the incumbents of churches or chapels or other ecclesiastical districts, is to be confined to the existing parishes and the existing ecclesiastical districts, or is to be extended to all cases which might hereafter occur of fresh divisions or fresh ecclesiastical districts being constituted. Now, the way in which the defendant put the case is this: this is a provision which is evidently intended by the Legislature as a compensation to the clergyman for work and labour done with reference to interring the corpse in the churchyard; or, otherwise, with reference to his duties which he had performed with regard to the deceased during the time of the parishioner's residence. I make the last observation because it applies to the view stated by Gibson in his learned work, namely, viz, that upon his view of the case the clergyman is entitled to a fee upon the burial of any person out of the parish who has been an actual parishioner resident in the parish, and "communicating" in the parish church. That view seems to have been somewhat shaken, although not overruled by the case in the Q. B. to which reference was made, where the court held that the alleged custom that a fee should be paid to the clergyman upon every person dying in the parish and buried elsewhere was a bad custom. And the reason assigned was twofold: first, they said it was an unreasonable custom; as, for instance, that a person who accidentally died at an inn should pay two fees, one in the parish where he was buried, and another to the incumbent of the parish where he died; secondly, they put it upon the ground of work and labour done. With reference to that last ground, I may observe that one cannot look upon it as standing upon this view alone, because it is well known and certainly it was an argument used successfully with reference to many Cemetery Acts, and especially with reference to the general Act which compelled parishes under certain circumstances to provide burial-grounds, and yet provided a fee for the clergyman who no longer assisted in the interment; the argument used was, that the provision being very mean in most large towns, and happening to be concentrated in two or three payments, the clergyman of the parish being paid nothing whatever but Easter offerings and the surplice fees, that is the marriage and burial fees, these being the whole remuneration for the performance of all the duties incumbent upon him, it was not reasonable that because you removed once source of income to which a duty happened to be attached, therefore you should deprive him of all the income arising from it; because that is applicable not merely to the duty attached to it, but is one mode by which he is to be compensated for the performance of all his duties. One cannot therefore rely upon this provision, there being no recital to help me or rely upon as being concerned simply with the ground of compensation for work and labour done. That is borne out by the 22nd clause, because it seems to provide for fees more especially connected with burials, leaving the incumbent a considerable surplus out of what shall be paid to him. He is to pay 12s. out of the pound to be paid to the churchwardens, according to the fees applicable in one case, and 3s. 6d. in another case. That case therefore cannot be regarded as a safe decision in the present case. I do not think that this 12s. 6d. or the 3s. 6d. are to be considered as anything more than what the Legislature thought was reasonable to be paid to the incumbent of the district who attended the deceased, not only through his last illness, when he was in more immediate connection with him, but also ministered in the way in which the incumbent does happily minister for the benefit of the parishioner throughout his course of ministration. It was not thought right that the emoluments attached to this duty should be cut away because the duty was transferred to other persons. That gets rid of a great deal of the argument relied upon by the defendant for giving that limited construction to the Act which he asks the court to impose upon it. But there is another point which the defendant has raised: he says, True it is you have got a district, but it is a district raised by the new Ecclesiastical Commissioners under former Acts of Parliament, among the rest under 9 Geo. 3, and other Acts referred to in the fifth paragraph of the Bill. That paragraph states that her Majesty's Commissioners for Building New Churches in pursuance of the 16th section of the statute of the 59 Geo. 3, c. 134, of the 12th section of the statute 1 & 2 Vict. c. 107, and of the 3rd section of the statute 2 & 3 Vict. c. 49, duly made a representation to her Majesty, bearing date the 23rd day of June 1853, that having taken into consideration all the circumstances of the said district parish of St. Matthew, Brixton, it appeared to them to be expedient that a district should be assigned to the said consecrated church of St. John, situate at Angell-town, in the said district parish of St. Matthew, Brixton, under and by virtue of the power or authority contained in the above-mentioned sections, and that such proposed district should be named or called "The District Chapelry of St. John, Angell-town," and that the boundaries thereof should be as in the said representation mentioned, as the same were more particularly delineated on the map or plan thereunto annexed, coloured green; and that it also appeared to them to be expedient that banns of matrimony should be published, and that marriages, baptisms and churchings should be solemnised or performed in the said Church of St. John, at Angell-town aforesaid, and that the fees to arise therefrom should be paid or belong to the minister or incumbent of such church for the time being, and that the consent of the bishop of the diocese of Winchester had been obtained thereto, as required by the various Acts and sections mentioned, and also the consent of the incumbent of the district parish of St. Matthew, as required by the statute, in order that the subdivision of such parish by forming thereout a district chapelry should take effect from the assignment of such district chapelry, in testimony whereof the Bishop of Winchester and Dr. Vaughan the incumbent, had signed and sealed that representation. And then, by an order in council dated 8th Aug. 1853, it is stated that her Majesty having taken the representation into consideration, did approve of such representation, and ordered that the proposed assignment of a district chapelry to the church of St. John, at Angell-town, in the district parish of St. Matthew, Brixton, should be accordingly made, and that the recommendation of the commissioners in respect to the publication of banns, and the solemnisation of marriages, baptisms and churchings in the said church, and the fees to arise therefrom, should be carried into effect agreeably to the provisions of the said Acts, and directed that order should be forthwith registered by the registrar of the diocese of Winchester; which was accordingly done. There is, I admit there the argument expressio unius est exclusio alterius, and therefore that burial fees were never intended to be included in this particular instance. But the first argument that arises upon that is, that it is not to be treated as a compensation for burial fees, but as a proper payment to be made to the clergyman in respect of the general provision of the Cemetery Act, and in order to provide a new provision for the several incumbents, so that whether they might or might not hereafter have the power of burying, this provision should be duly secured, first to the mother church, and then to the incumbents. If I am correct in that view, then the question whether burial fees are specially mentioned is not of much importance, and the conclusion is sustained upon the statutes to which I was referred, that this district parish has every privilege, in consequence of its being a district, and by virtue of the Acts themselves, every privilege which the mother church has, including the burial fees; and therefore, whatever might have been stated in that order or petition, there is nothing to take away from the incumbent any privilege vested in him. It is quite true, no doubt, that no burial has been solemnised in the parish, and, under existing circumstances, is never likely to be; since the passing of the Metropolis Arrangement Bill it is probable that it is not at all likely. It is not likely the Legislature would permit, or those entrusted with the duty of carrying the Act into effect would permit, interments to take place in any new district. Such a state of things and such an effect could not have been contemplated by the Cemetery Act of the 6 & 7 Will. 4, and could not have been foreseen; nobody would have thought of arguing that anything contained in the South Metropolitan Cemetery Act could be affected by any subsequent Act of Parliament, enacting as it has done with respect to many parishes that there shall never be another burial in the parish; nor would it liberate the South Metropolitan Cemetery Company from making payments in respect of those interments which are now made in their cemetery. It does not appear that any great reliance is to be placed upon the circumstance of a privilege being given with regard to the celebration of marriages, which is always to be provided for in cases of this description, or that any reliance can be placed upon it as indicating an intention on the part of the Legislature to exclude the burial or any other fees that by law are payable to the incumbent. I find a distinct provision in the 18th section that the incumbents of district churches shall be paid the fees there mentioned, and nothing to say that it shall be the present or the future incumbent; the only indication of its being confined to the present incumbent being that which may be considered as contained in the 22nd section; but even there it is open always to this observation, that very possibly a discussion may arise as to who the persons are that are to receive the fees—whether the churchwardens or the chapelwardens, who are entitled to distribute them. When the time comes of no burial being performed in any parish, that may be a matter for serious discussion. A question may hereafter arise in consequence of the subsequent course of legislation. But I do not think there is sufficient in the 22nd section to show me that the Legislature intended to limit and confine its operation entirely to existing incumbents and existing ecclesiastical districts at the time of the passing of the Act, although in future there might be carried out and created, under the Act of Geo. 3, a number of new ecclesiastical districts, just exactly and with the same provisions as St. Matthew, the district which the defendant holds, was created. Nor do I think that the Legislature, having all that knowledge at the time of passing this Act, and with this knowledge, should be taken to have excluded from the benefit of this provision those who should hereafter occupy future district churches, confining it entirely to existing district churches. Upon the whole, therefore, I am of opinion, and I must hold, that the plaintiff is entitled to the payments which he claims. Decree accordingly. No costs.

WALSBY (appellant) v. ANLEY (respondent).

Master and workmen—Endeavouring to force a master to discharge some of his workmen—Conviction—6 Geo. 4. c. 129, s. 3.

WALSBY v. AXLEY.

A workman has a perfect right to go to his master and say that he will not continue to work for him unless he discharges certain other workmen, but if he combines with others to force his master to discharge certain workmen, by threatening to cease to work for him unless he complies, he commits an offence within sect. 3 of the 6 Geo. 4, c. 129.

This was a case stated under the 20 & 21 Vict. c. 43, upon a conviction by one of the metropolitan police magistrates, under the 6 Geo. 4, c. 129, s. 3, for unlawfully on the 16th May 1860, by threats, endeavouring to force one Philip Anley, then carrying on the trade of a builder, to limit the description of his workmen.

It was proved before the magistrate by Philip Anley the prosecutor, and other witnesses, that the prosecutor carried on the trade of a builder in Whitecross-street, Middlesex; that he employed about 100 workmen.

That in the year 1859 there had been a strike of the workmen employed in the building trade, and that the prosecutor then resolved not to employ, and did not employ for some time, any workmen who declined to work under what was called "The Declaration;" that it was well understood in the trade what this declaration was, being to the following effect:—

"I declare that I am not, nor will I during my engagement with you, become a member of or support any society which directly or indirectly interferes with the arrangements of this or any other establishment, or the hours or terms of labour, and that I recognise the right of employers and employed individually to make any trade engagements on which they may choose to agree."

On the day named in the conviction the prosecutor had in his employment two or more men working under this declaration.

That on that day the defendant and two of the other workmen brought to the prosecutor a paper signed by defendant and about thirty other workmen, of which the following is a copy:—

"At a meeting of the joiners in the employ of Mr. Anley, Tuesday evening, May 15th, 1860, it was resolved—

"That Mr. Anley be given to understand that, unless the men who are working under the declaration in his shop be discharged, and we have a definite answer by dinner-time to that effect, we cease work immediately."

The defendant, in reply to questions put by the prosecutor, said they had no fault to find with him, his foreman, or clerks, or with the wages he (the defendant) received; and when the prosecutor inquired what it was he wanted, he answered, "You must discharge those two men who are working under the declaration, and if you do not we will leave work." The prosecutor answered, "I will not be dictated to, and I will rather close my shop than submit to your dictation." On the same day the defendant and all the workmen who had signed the paper left his employment, and had not returned up to the time of the conviction.

By sect. 3 of the 6 Geo. 4, c. 129, it is enacted, "If any person shall by violence to the person or property, or by threats, or by intimidation, or by molesting, or in any way obstructing another, force or endeavour to force any journeyman . . . to depart from his hiring . . . or if any person shall by violence to the person or property of another, or by threats or intimidation, or by molesting, or in any way obstructing another, force, or endeavour to force, any manufacturer or person carrying on any trade or business, to make any alteration in his mode of regulating, managing, conducting, or carrying on such manufacture, trade, or business, or to limit the number of his apprentices or the number or description of his journeymen, workmen, or servants, every person so offending or aiding, abetting, or assisting therein, being convicted thereof, in manner hereinafter mentioned, shall be imprisoned only, or shall and may be imprisoned and kept to hard labour for any time not exceeding three calendar months."

Giffard appeared in support of the conviction, and argued that the facts stated in the case clearly showed that the appellant had committed an offence under the statute: (Reg. v. Pearham, 29 L. J. 31, M. C.; 1 L. T. Rep. N. S. 91, 106.)

Sleigh, for the appellant, argued that no offence had been committed, for that it was not unlawful for a workman to refuse to work unless his conditions were complied with. He endeavoured to distinguish this case from that of Reg. v. Pearham.

COCKBURN, C.J.—I am of opinion that the conviction ought to be affirmed. Every workman in the service of an employer is entitled to the full exercise of his discretion as to whether he will continue in that employment, so long as he is not bound by any contract, and to give the employer the alternative of either losing his services or discharging obnoxious persons with whom he might not choose to work; and, more than that, several men who might consider other workmen as obnoxious, have a perfect right to put the same alternative to their employer. But if the men go further than that, and seek to coerce the master by the threat of what was likely to operate to his injury, that comes within the meaning of the Act. In the present case it was not one man who went to the employer, but several who adopted the same course; not with the view of giving him an opportunity of exercising his discretion, but, by threatening to leave his employ, to compel and coerce him to discharge the obnoxious persons. At first I entertained some doubts whether this combination amounted to a threat, but I entertained no doubt that it came within the clause which referred to the molesting the master. But, upon reflection, I have come to the conclusion that if done in the honest exercise of his right, the workman might put such an alternative to his master, even if it were done in combination. Yet when I see that the purpose was that of turning the men out of his employ, by molesting the master, it is altogether illegal, and the parties come within the Act of Parliament.

CROMPTON, J.—At first I entertained great doubts, and on first reading the case I certainly entertained a contrary opinion, for I thought that the threats referred to some matter which was of itself unlawful. It was therefore important to see if there was a threat of anything improper or unlawful. I think that any workman may say, "it is my intention not to work with certain people." Then comes the question, whether a number of workmen can combine together that the master shall not employ a particular body of persons? My opinion is, that a number cannot combine together to do what would tend to the mischief of another person. One man may go and say, "I will not work for you unless you turn away such and such persons," but a number could not do that, as it would amount to a threat that they would do an illegal act.

HILL, J.—I am of the same opinion. The word "threat" in the Act must be construed in connection with the words which precede and follow. It may be a threat to do an illegal act, and the question is, whether the act threatened to be done is an illegal act. A man has a perfect right to go to his employer and say all that was said in this case, or several might do it; but if they acted in combination, not honestly and independently, but for the purpose of coercing the master, they are guilty of a conspiracy at common law. The combination and the attempt to carry it out were illegal, and would be indictable at common law. I therefore think that the magistrate was right, and that his decision should be affirmed. Conviction affirmed.

REG. v. THE CHURCHWARDENS OF TIVERTON, DEVON.

Wednesday, Jan. 23.

REG. v. THE CHURCHWARDENS &c. OF TIVERTON, DEVON.

Poor-law—Settlement—Renting a tenement—Payment of rates—Wesleyan minister.

A. B., who was a Wesleyan minister, occupied a house at C., which had been taken for him in accordance with the rules of the Wesleyan body, by the circuit stewards, and paid the rent for the same, which was, pursuant to such rules, afterwards allowed him. He was duly rated to the poor and other rates, which he paid, and the amount of which in like manner was allowed him. He occupied in this way for more than a year :

Held, that he thereby gained no settlement, either by renting a tenement or the payment of rates.

This was an appeal by the parish officers of Tiverton, Devon, against an order of justices adjudging a lunatic pauper, of the name of Benjamin Holmes Worth, to be legally settled in their parish, and adjudging the payment of a sum of money to the parish officers of Mangotsfield for his past maintenance and for his future maintenance. The parties, however, consented to the statement of a case for the opinion of this court, and the order of a judge was obtained accordingly, for that purpose, under sect. 11 of the 12 & 13 Vict. c. 45. The following are the facts :—

The said pauper lunatic, Benjamin Holmes Worth, is the legitimate son of William Worth. The said William Worth was born in the said parish of Tiverton, in or about the month of Jan. 1781. From the year 1832 to the year 1835, both inclusive, the said William Worth was a Wesleyan minister, and the practice of the Wesleyan congregation of which the said William Worth was a minister during that period was as follows: Certain members of the congregation were appointed stewards for a circuit comprised within a given distance, and were called circuit stewards, and one of the duties of such circuit stewards was to take houses within their circuit as residences for their ministers officiating within such circuit, and to furnish such houses with furniture fit and proper for such residences. Sometimes the circuit stewards paid the rents of such houses, and sometimes the ministers; but in the latter case the amount of the rent so paid by the ministers was repaid to them by the circuit stewards; in like manner the amount of the rates and taxes paid by the minister in respect of such house was repaid to the said minister by the said circuit stewards. In the year 1832 the circuit stewards of the circuit within which the parish of Carisbrooke, in the county of Southampton, in the Isle of Wight, was situate, in conformity with the aforesaid practice, bonâ fide took and rented a tenement situate in the said parish of Carisbrooke, such tenement consisting of a separate and distinct dwelling-house and garden, as a residence for their minister officiating in that part of the said circuit, and furnished the said dwelling-house with furniture fit and proper for such residence. And the said circuit stewards bonâ fide took and rented the said tenement so situate in the said parish of Carisbrooke, such tenement consisting of a separate and distinct dwelling-house and garden, for the term of one whole year from the 29th Sept. 1832, at and for the rent of 20*l.* a-year, that being also the yearly value of the said tenement, as a residence for their minister officiating in that part of the said circuit, and on the 29th Sept. 1832 the said tenement having been so as aforesaid taken and rented by the said stewards, the said William Worth having been appointed to officiate as such minister in that part of the said circuit, and continuing to be such minister from that time until and upon the 29th Sept. 1835, with the consent of the said circuit stewards, as such minister came to reside in and occupy, and as such minister resided in and occupied the said tenement, the said dwelling-house being so furnished as aforesaid under the said yearly taking for the term of one whole year, that is to say, upon and from the 29th Sept. 1833, and so on afterwards on the same terms from the said 29th Sept. 1833, until and upon the 29th Sept. 1835. The said William Worth actually paid the said rent of 20*l.* for the said tenement, to the landlord thereof, for each of the said years in which he so resided and occupied the said tenement, but the amount of such rent was afterwards repaid to him by the said circuit stewards.

The said William Worth, in and during each of the said years in which he resided in and occupied the said tenement, was assessed to the poor-rates for the said parish of Carisbrooke, in respect of the said tenement, and paid such rates and resided in and occupied such tenement for forty day and upwards in each of the said years after payment of the said rates.

The amount so paid by him for the said rates was repaid to him by the said circuit stewards, in conformity with the practice aforesaid.

The said William Worth was appointed to officiate as minister at Carisbrooke, in conformity with the custom of the Wesleyans, which custom is to appoint their ministers to officiate in a given place for one year certain.

The appointment is absolute.

During the year a minister cannot be removed from the place of his appointment.

It is also the custom that no minister shall officiate longer than three years in any one place.

The questions for the opinion of the court are—

First, did the pauper lunatic's father William Worth acquire a settlement in the said parish of Carisbrooke by renting the said tenement under the circumstances herein set forth?

Secondly, did he acquire a settlement in the said parish of Carisbrooke by being assessed to and paying the poor-rates for the said parish under the circumstances herein set forth?

Sawyer.—The pauper's father gained no settlement in Carisbrooke by renting a tenement. By the 1 Will. 4, c. 18 which governs this settlement, it is enacted that "no person shall acquire a settlement in any parish or township maintaining its own poor by or by reason of such yearly hiring of a dwelling-house or building, or of land, or of both, as in the said Act expressed" (6 Geo. 4, c. 57) "unless such house, or building, or land shall be actually occupied under such yearly hiring in the same parish or township by the person hiring the same for the term of one whole year, at the least, and unless the rent for the same, to the amount of 10*l.* at the least, shall be paid by the person hiring the same." The facts of the case show that he was not tenant of the premises. There was no renting of the house. [CROMPTON, J.—It seems difficult to say that he was as regards the house anything more than the servant of the stewards.] Nor was any settlement gained by the payment of the parochial taxes, as it is necessary also under that head of settlement, the party must rent the premises.

Kingdon, for the appellants, was called upon.—The minister has a fixed residence and cannot be moved for twelve months. [CROMPTON, J.—That does not make him the more a tenant.] The stewards take the house as agents for him; he is rated to the poor-rate, and is tenant for all practical purposes.

CROMPTON, J.—It is quite clear that the pauper's father did not occupy as tenant. It was certainly not the custom to remove under a twelvemonth, but he may have been removed; if he paid the rent he was repaid it. He therefore gained no settlement.

HILL, J. concurred.

SINDON AND OTHERS v. BANKS.

Friendly society—Treasurer—Action against to recover balance.—Summary jurisdiction of justices.The trustees of a friendly society may sue in the Superior Courts, to recover from the treasurer of the society moneys received by him and not paid over, and they are not confined to the summary procedure before justices, provided by the 18 & 19 Vict. c. 63, s. 40.

This was an action commenced in the County Court and removed by certiorari into this court, brought by the trustees of the Friendly Society of Hastings to recover from the defendant 30*l*, as money had and received for the use of the society.

Plea 3.—That the cause of action was a matter in dispute between the plaintiffs as trustees, and the defendant as a member of the society, and was directed by the statute to be decided by justices of the peace.

At the trial it appeared that the defendant was a member of the society, which was founded in 1815, and whose rules were duly certified by the Registrar of Friendly Societies under the 10 Geo. 4, c. 56. From 1853 to April 1856 the defendant held the office of treasurer of the society, when he ceased to be treasurer, but remained a member until the 12th June following, when for misconduct he was struck off the books of the society, under rule 53; but in 1859 he was reinstated as a member of the society. The moneys in question were received by the defendant in 1853, but the fact was not discovered by the society until 1856, and on the 12th June 1856 a formal demand, in writing, of payment of them was made by the society. The verdict was found for the plaintiffs for 30*l*.

The following are the material rules of the society:—

Rule 29. If any dispute shall arise as to the legality or payment of any fine, money, or allowance; or as to the disqualification of a member at the time of his admission; or between any officer or member, or any nominee or representative laying claim to the effects of any deceased member; the complaining party shall be required by the clerk to attend at the next committee meeting, and all cases shall be decided by ballot; but no member shall be allowed to vote where a brother or other relation is the offending or aggrieved party; and the committee are to demand of the aggrieved person any written document or certificate to be adduced in proof which they shall require; and if the parties complaining do not attend the committee and produce the written evidence required, the case shall be considered as decided against the officer, nominee, or representative; but if after the decision of the committee the member or ex-member, nominee or representative, is not satisfied with such decision, the complaining party shall give notice thereof to the clerk, according to form No. 11, and the matter in dispute shall be referred to and finally decided by two of her Majesty's justices of the peace acting in and for the borough of Hastings; and it shall be lawful for the justices, on complaint being made to them of any refusal or neglect to comply with the rules, orders and regulations of the society by any member, to summon the person against whom the complaint is made, to appear at the time and place named in the summons; and upon his appearance, or in default thereof upon due proof of the service of such summons, it shall be lawful for the justices to proceed to hear and determine the said complaint according to these rules; and if they shall adjudge any sum of money to be paid by such person against whom such complaint shall be made, and if such person shall not pay such sum of money to the person and at the time specified by such justices, they shall proceed to enforce their award by causing such sum, together with a sum for costs not exceeding 10*s*., to be levied by distress, or by distress and sale of the moneys, goods, chattels, securities and effects belonging to the said party: (10 Geo. 4, c. 56, ss. 27 and 28.)

Rule 31 provides that six members shall be chosen as trustees, and that the trustees shall elect one of their own number annually to be treasurer.

Rule 32 provides that the treasurer, trustees, or any officer shall not be liable to make good any deficiency which may arise in the funds, unless such persons shall have declared by writing under their hands, deposited and registered in like manner with the rules, that they are willing so to be answerable; and it shall be lawful for such person to limit his or their responsibility to such sum as shall be specified in any such instrument or writing, when required to give bond or security by the committee; provided that the trustees, treasurer, and every other officer shall be personally responsible and liable for all moneys actually received: (10 Geo. 4, c. 56, sect. 21, 22.)

Rule 53 enacts (among other things) that any member receiving any moneys on account of the society misapplying the same, or any part thereof, or keeping it for his own private use, or otherwise than as herein directed, the member so offending shall be excluded and sued for the deficiency, pursuant to Act 10 Geo. 4, c. 56, s. 25.

The following are the material enactments of the Friendly Societies Acts:—

Sect. 27 of the Friendly Societies Act, 10 Geo. 4, c. 56, enacts, that provision shall be made by one or more of the rules of every such society, to be confirmed as required by this Act, specifying whether a reference of every matter in dispute between any such society or any person acting under them and any individual member thereof or person claiming on account of any member, shall be made to such of his Majesty's justices of the peace as may act in and for the county in which such society may be formed, or to arbitrators, to be appointed in manner hereinafter directed. And if the matter so in dispute shall be referred to arbitration, certain arbitrators shall be named and elected at the first meeting of such society or general committee thereof that shall be held after the enrolment of its rules, none of the said arbitrators being beneficially interested, directly or indirectly, in the funds of the said society, of whom a certain number, not less than three, shall be chosen by ballot in each such case of dispute. The number of the said arbitrators and mode of ballot being determined by the rules of each society respectively, the names of such arbitrators shall be duly entered in the book of the said society in which the rules are entered as aforesaid, &c., &c.

In July 1855 the 18 & 19 Vict. c. 63, was passed to amend the laws relating to friendly societies, and by sect. 1, the 10 Geo. 4, c. 56, was repealed, except as to offences committed, or penalties, or liabilities incurred, &c. before the commencement of that Act, which came into operation on Aug. 1, 1855.

Sect. 22 of the Friendly Societies Act, 18 & 19 Vict. c. 63, enacts, that every such treasurer or other officer, whether appointed before or after the passing of this Act, at such times as by the rules of such society he should render such account as aforesaid, or upon being required to do so by the trustee or trustees of such society, or by a majority of the said committee of management, or by a majority of the members present at a meeting of the said society, as aforesaid, within seven days after such requisition, shall render to the trustee or trustees of the said society, or to the said committee of management, or to the members of such society at a meeting of the society, a just and true account of all moneys received and paid by him since he last rendered the like account, and of the balance then remaining in his hands, and of all bonds and securities of such society, which account the said trustee or trustees, or committee of management, shall cause to be audited by some fit and proper person or persons by them to be appointed, and such treasurer, if thereunto required, upon the said account being audited, shall forthwith hand over to the said trustee or trustees the balance which on such audit shall appear to be due from him, and shall also, if required, hand over to such trustee or trustees all securities and effects, books, papers and property of the said society in his hands or custody, and if he fail to do so, the trustee or trustees of the said society may sue upon the bond aforesaid, or may sue such treasurer in the County Court of the district, or in any of the Superior Courts of Common Law, or in any other court having jurisdiction, for the balance appearing to have been due from him upon the account last rendered by him, and for all the moneys since received by him on account of the said society, and for the securities and effects, books, papers and property in his hands or custody, leaving him to set off in such action the sums (if any) which he may have since paid on account of the said society, and in such action the said trustee or trustees shall be entitled to recover their full costs of suit, to be taxed as between attorney and client.

Sect. 40 of the Friendly Societies Act, 18 & 19 Vict. c. 63, enacts that every dispute between any member or members of any society established under this Act, or any of the Acts hereby repealed; or any person claiming through or under a member, or under the rules of such society, and the trustee, treasurer, or other officer, or the committee thereof, shall be decided in manner directed by the rules of such society; and the decision so made shall be binding and conclusive on all parties without appeal, provided that where the rules of any society established under any of the Acts hereby repealed shall have directed disputes to be referred to justices, such disputes shall, from and after the 1st Aug. 1855, be referred to and decided by the County Court as hereinafter mentioned.

A rule nisi having been obtained to enter the verdict for the defendant on the ground that the action was not maintainable, and that the proceeding before justices pursuant to the 18 & 19 Vict. c. 63, s. 40, was the only remedy,

Denman (Lush with him) showed cause.—The claim by the trustees in this action does not arise upon the rules of the society, but is a matter independent of their provisions, being a claim for money had and received by the defendant to their use. Sect. 40 of the 18 & 19 Vict. only relates to disputes between the society and the members qua members. The proviso at the end of sect. 40 is repealed by 21 & 22 Vict. c. 101, s. 5, which, however, does not apply to this case. Sect. 22 applies to fraudulent misappropriation of moneys, &c., withholding of property of the society; and although there might be grounds for saying that the defendant has brought himself within that clause, yet at the trial this was treated on both sides as a civil matter only. The moneys were received in 1853, and it may be urged on the other side that the 10 Geo. 4, c. 56, is the Act which applies to this case. The 27th section of that statute is the material one on which the other side rely. The object of that provision was to save expense and prevent litigation, but the language of it is not directed to the case of officers ceasing to be such with moneys of the society in their hands: (Crisp v. Bunbury, 8 Bing. 394; Morrison v. Glover, 4 Ex. 430 Doe dem. Morison v. Glover, 15 Q.B. 103; Cutbill v. Kingdom, 1 Ex. 494; Reeves v. White, 17 Q.B. 995.) This was not a dispute between the society and defendant as an individual member of the society at the time the claim arose.

J. Brown and Archibald in support of the rule.—It is not material to decide whether the 10 Geo. 4, c. 56, or the 18 & 19 Vict. c. 63, governs this case, for both Acts are in pari materia, and the corresponding put upon both. This was a dispute between the society and the defendant as a member. Although treasurer, the defendant was at the same time a member of the society. [CROMPTON, J.—Your argument must extend to the case of trustees or other officers who are members.] It does so. There is no reason why the word "member" in sect. 40 of 18 & 19 Vict. should be restricted to mere members who are not officers. It is equally desirable to have cheap and expeditious remedies against the treasurer. The section is wide enough to include the treasurer. The defendant was expelled from the society on the ground of this being a dispute between him and the society.

CROMPTON, J.—I am of opinion that this rule ought to be discharged. The question depends upon the two clauses in the Acts referred to, and the rules of the society cannot alter the effect of them. If the statute directs that the rules of such societies shall contain certain provisions, and they do not, the proceedings must still be regarded in point of law as if the rules did contain such provisions. We have to see whether the common law remedy by action is taken away in this case. The two statutes of 10 Geo. 4, c. 56, s. 27, and 18 & 19 Vict. c. 63, s. 40, are in pari materia. I think we should be straining the enactment if we said that the word "member" in those sections meant "treasurer" or "trustee." Those words are introduced into various sections when it was intended to include such persons within their provisions. Sect. 24 of 18 & 19 Vict. c. 63, is a strong provision for recovering from officers and members by a summary and speedy process before justices, moneys and securities obtained by fraud, or withheld, or wilfully misapplied, but it could not be said that that provision took away the common law remedy by action. The 27th sect. of 10 Geo. 4, c. 56, is, however, the real clause in question, and that is confirmatory of the view that it is expressly restricted to individual members of the society, and it would be strange to say that the word "member" therein includes "treasurer" or "trustee." Sect. 25 empowers justices to hear cases of fraud similar to sect. 24 of 18 & 19 Vict., and to punish by fine or imprisonment, which provision is quite inconsistent with saying that all disputes can only be adjudicated upon according to sect. 27. Sect. 25 gives another mode of proceeding in such cases, and there is nothing in it to prevent parties from taking the common law remedy if they please. Sect. 22, which makes the treasurer and other officers liable for moneys actually received by them, does not contain any restriction as to the mode in which they are to be made liable. Then as to sect. 40 of the 18 & 19 Vict. c. 63, every remark made upon sect. 27 of 10 Geo. 4, c. 56, is applicable to this enactment: but, if anything, sect. 40 is still more free from doubt. Then sect. 27 of 10 Geo. 4, clearly puts "member" in contrast with "trustee, treasurer, or other officer or the committee." Sect. 24 of the 18 & 19 Vict. is an analogous section to sect. 25 of 10 Geo. 4, as to punishment of fraud and withholding of money; and sect. 20 is analogous to sect. 22 of the 10 Geo. 4, as to the responsibility for moneys actually received by trustees. Then comes sect. 22 of the 18 & 19 Vict., which regulates the mode in which the treasurer is to account. It was argued that the proceedings under this section was the only mode in which the treasurer could be proceeded against. That section points out the way in which the treasurer is to render his account, and on failure to pay over the balance, empowers the society to sue, and gives the society costs as between attorney and client. But when no account is required to be rendered, it is idle to say that you cannot sue without adopting the course pointed out by sect. 22. On the whole, it is not made out to my mind that the enactment in question applies to treasurers and trustees, and that should be clearly made out in order to take away the common law right of action, and therefore I think this rule ought to be discharged.

REG. v. AULTON—THORNE v. COLSON.

HILL, J.—I am of the same opinion. The first question that arises is, whether the case depends on the statute of 18 & 19 Vict. c. 63, or the 10 Geo. 4. c. 56. The statute of 18 & 19 Vict. came into operation in Aug. 1855, and by the first section repealed the 10 Geo. 4. c. 56, save and except as to any offences committed or penalties or liabilities incurred, or bond or security given, or proceedings taken under the same before the commencement of this Act. It has been suggested that the right of action in this case was a subsisting right of action when the statute of Victoria came into operation, and that the 10 Geo. 4 was therefore saved as to this case by the above proviso. I do not see that it is clear that this is a liability under the statute of 10 Geo. 4, and if it were necessary to give an opinion upon the point, I should say that the statute 18 & 19 Vict. is the one that governs this case. This, however, is unimportant, because the two statutes are pari materia, and the material sections in each are very nearly the same in point of language. The question to be considered is, was this a dispute between the society and a member thereof, within either the 37th section of 10 Geo. 4, or the 40th section of 18 & 19 Vict. ? In my opinion it was not a dispute within either the one or the other section. The object of the enactment was to protect the property of each societies by providing a cheap and summary remedy, and by extending the remedies of such societies against those who might convert their property. It appears to me that it would be extending the meaning of the sections far beyond the intention to make them applicable to treasurers, or trustees, or officers, who might have become possessed of the property, and misappropriated it or refused to hand over the same when called upon to do so. That does not appear to me to be a dispute between an individual member and the society. The sections referred to show that it was intended to give cumulative remedies against such persons as the treasurer, trustees and similar officers. For these reasons I am of opinion that our judgment should be for the plaintiff, and that this rule should be discharged.

Rule discharged.

REG. v. AULTON.

Weights and measures—5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 63—

Unstamped earthenware cups.

Unstamped cups and vessels of earthenware or other material ordinarily used by persons in the course of their business are liable to be seized if they do not correspond with the Imperial measures.

Welsby (Streeten and Vaughan Richards with him) showed cause against a certiorari to bring up an order of the quarter sessions of Worcester, confirming a conviction of the justices in petty sessions, subject to a case for the opinion of this court.

The appellant, before and at the time of the seizure hereafter mentioned, was a licensed victualler and retailer of beer in Dudley, in the county of Worcester, and sold beer to customers out of the house, and to customers to drink in the house, the beer in the latter case being supplied sometimes outside the bar, sometimes within the bar, and sometimes in the parlour.

The respondent Henry Burton is the inspector of weights and measures for the district of Dudley. On the 23rd Aug. 1859 he entered appellant's house for the purpose of examining the appellant's measures, he there found appellant's wife, and told her that he was come to inspect her measures; she thereupon produced a number of measures, which he examined and found to be correct. On a shelf in the bar, on the left-hand side, apart from those measures, were nine earthenware cups. The inspector said to the appellant's wife, "I must try those also." She said, "They are cups, and we only use them for the parlour; you'll not find them measure." The inspector, however, insisted upon trying them, and they were handed to him. He tested them with the measure found by the sessions to be a copy of the Imperial pint measure, and found them to contain three quarters of a quartern less than the said measure. These cups were without stamp or mark. The same price was charged for the beer sold in them as in the stamped pint measures, but some of the witnesses stated that when beer was supplied to them in those cups they did not suppose that they were receiving a full pint; whilst other witnesses said that when they were served with beer in those cups they meant to have, and thought they were getting, a pint of beer, for which they were paying the usual full price. The inspector seized the said cups as being unjust measures, and caused an information to be laid against the appellant to recover the penalties alleged to have become payable by reason of his having unjust measures in his possession.

The case came on for hearing before the justices on the 5th Sept. then following, when the appellant was convicted and adjudged to pay the penalty of 9s. and costs.

On appeal to the quarter sessions, it was contended for the appellant, first, that the conviction was bad for not stating an adjudication as to the costs and mode of enforcing payment thereof—(this point was now abandoned); secondly, that unstamped earthenware jugs or drinking cups, ordinarily used as measures, are not measures within the meaning of the 28th section of the 5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 63.

The court of quarter sessions overruled the objections and found, that the cups in question had been ordinarily used by the appellant as pint measures, but that he had not otherwise represented them to be pint measures.

If the court should be of opinion that either objection should prevail, the conviction to be quashed; otherwise to be confirmed.

5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 63, ss. 6, 12, 21, 28; and Washington v. Young, 5 Ex. 403, were referred to.

Keane (Chance with him), contra, was called on in support of the rule.—This conviction is not supported by the facts of the case. These earthenware cups do not purport to be measures. The report of Washington v. Young is incorrect; the reference should have been to sect. 28 instead of sect. 21. [CROMPTON, J.—The judgment in that case is conclusive; it is an invariable rule that although we might be of a different opinion, we never interfere with a decision in point; we are confined to the law, and unless you can show there was no evidence, we must hold that the decision is right].

CROMPTON, J.—I am of opinion that the case referred to is exactly in point, and I also think it good law. The words of the Act are large, and we are bound by that decision.

HILL, J.—I think we are bound by that case, and I also think it well decided. I think a person ordinarily using measures which do not correspond with the Imperial measure is liable to the penalty.

Rule discharged—Conviction affirmed. (a)

THORNE (appellant) v. COLSON (respondent).

Stage-plays—Duologue—6 & 7 Vict. c. 68.

A dramatic performance (a duologue) by two persons, is a stage-play, within the meaning of the 6 & 7 Vict. c. 68.

This was a case stated under the 20 & 21 Vict. c. 43, upon a dismissal of an information laid under

(a) But they must be represented as such; that is to say, they must be used as measures. A glass of ale or a cup of beer may be sold as such, although not of the right capacity.

THORNE v. COLSON.

the 6 & 7 Vict. c. 68, for unlawfully keeping a place of public resort for the public performance of stage-plays:—

The case stated that—

At a petty sessions of her Majesty's justices of the peace for the borough of Margate, in the county of Kent, holden at the town-hall in the said borough, on the 21st Aug. 1860, the defendant Jacinth Colson, of Margate aforesaid, professor of music, appeared before us, the undersigned James Standing, Esq., mayor of the said borough, Thomas Blackburne, William Forward Gilder, George Yeates Hunter, and Richard Jenkins, Esqrs., the justices then present, to answer an information of Richard Samuel Thorne, the lessee of the Theatre Royal, Margate, aforesaid, for that the said Jacinth Colson, on the 22nd Aug. instant, in the said borough, did unlawfully keep a certain place of public resort for the public performance of stage-plays and entertainments of the stage, without authority by virtue of letters patent from her Majesty, or licence from the Lord Chamberlain of her Majesty's household, or her Majesty's justices of the peace for the said borough of Margate, within which said borough the said place of public resort is situate (the same place not being a booth or show excepted from the operation of the statute in that behalf), and the said parties respectively being present, the said charge was duly heard by us, and upon such hearing we dismissed the information. And whereas the said Richard Samuel Thorne hath, pursuant to the provisions of the before-mentioned statute, given us notice and required us to state and sign a case setting forth the facts and grounds of our determination at the hearing of the said information, in order that he might take the opinion of the said Court of Q. B.:

Now we, the said justices, pursuant to such notice and the provisions of the statute aforesaid, do hereby state and sign such case as follows:—

It was proved to our satisfaction at the hearing of the said information, that the defendant was the rated owner and occupier, and paid the rates of a place, called the London Bazaar, wherein toys and fancy articles are usually sold, and situate in the High-street of the said borough, and while the alleged stage performance was going on, the walls of the said bazaar were fitted up round with the toys, &c., and which were visible, although they appeared to be put out of the way, and not exposed as at other times.

There was no proof that the defendant, who was in London at the time, had himself let his place to the performers, but his attorney admitted that his client's wife had done so in his absence.

It was further proved that on Wednesday, the 22nd Aug. inst., two of the witnesses, after payment of 1s. each at the door, were presented by the money-taker with a bill of the performance, and admitted to such place; these bills, which are alike, were tendered in evidence by the informant's attorney, and admitted by the defendant's attorney, and to one of them we have marked our names and annexed it to this case, that the court may in its discretion refer thereto. It announces for performance at the London Bazaar aforesaid, on Aug. 16, 17, 18, 20 and 22, "by royal authority and command, a new and fashionable drawing-room entertainment—Not quite so Fast, or Errors Redeemed—A Story of the Heart. Scene 1. Room at the Hotel, Cambridge. Scene 2. The Heroine's Boudoir. Scene 3. A fashionable Drawing-room in London. Scene 4. The wedding characters, personated by Miss Rosina Pennell and Mr. Reginald St. Clair." A descriptive list of these characters, which appear to be fourteen in number, follows, and after setting out some favourable descriptions of criticisms on the entertainment, apparently extracted from newspapers, the bill concluded thus:—"Reserved seats (stalls), 3s.; second seats, 2s.; area, 1s."

It was likewise proved by the evidence of two witnesses that there was then in part of the said place or bazaar a stage, with a curtain across it; that a little music had been played on the piano, a bell rung, and the curtain raised; that the different characters set forth in the bill were personated by two people calling themselves Rosina Pennell and Reginald St. Clair, and that they went off the stage and came on again several times together and separately; that they appeared in several different costumes, and represented several different characters when on the stage, sometimes speaking in soliloquy and sometimes holding a dialogue with each other on the stage for ten minutes at a time; and that a song was sung by the said Rosina Pennell, she accompanying herself on the piano; that about eighty people were present to witness the performance; that Reginald St. Clair, in one of his characters, appeared as the sincere lover of the lady, and in another as one seeking after her money, and that in the course of the performance he proposed marriage to the lady.

One of the witnesses, Thomas MacKnight, who described himself as an author by profession, and in the habit of attending theatres, stated that he had attended the performance on the evening of the 22nd instant, and in his opinion it was an entertainment of the stage, but that he did not consider himself a skilled witness, and that Mr. and Mrs. German Reed's entertainment was much the same as this.

Another witness, Nelson Lee, the lessee of the City of London Theatre, who has been for thirty years engaged as a proprietor or manager of theatres, and who had been present for a short period at the said performance, said that it appeared to him to be the commencement of a farce; that it was what he had always understood to be called duologue, and a performance of the stage; and that duologues are occasionally represented on the stage; that Mr. and Mrs. Howard Paul and Mr. and Mrs. German Reed's entertainments were duologues; that similar entertainments were given in London theatres in Passion-week; that he had seen duologues which were parts of farces cut down.

And whereas upon the evidence before us, we the justices, upon the evidence, considered that the said performance was not a stage-play within the meaning of the Act 6 & 7 Vict. c. 68.

We dismissed the information on the following grounds:

Firstly, that the Act 6 & 7 Vict. c. 68, being a penal statute, requires to be strictly interpreted, and that as the word "duologue" does not appear among the stage entertainments enumerated in the 23rd section, we did not consider it to be a stage-play.

Secondly, that as the witness Nelson Lee had stated that, although he considered such a performance as that given in the defendant's bazaar to be an entertainment of the stage, he admitted that such performances were given in London theatres during Passion-week—a time when we believe it would be unlawful to perform stage-plays thereon—we, the justices, in consequence of such admission, concluded that other managers of London theatres must differ in opinion from the said Nelson Lee, and that they could not consider such entertainments to be stage-plays. A further doubt being thus raised in our minds, we felt it incumbent to give the defendant the benefit of such doubt.

If the court should be of opinion that we the justices were correct in the dismissal of the information, the same is to stand; if not, a conviction is to be returned under the 2nd section of the Act for regulating theatres, or such other proceedings taken as the court shall direct.

By the 6 & 7 Vict. c. 68, s. 11, it is enacted "that, except as aforesaid, it shall not be lawful for any person to have or keep any house or other place of public resort in Great Britain for the public performance of stage-plays without . . . licence from . . . the justices of the peace as hereinafter provided," &c.

By sect. 23 it is enacted "that in this Act the word 'stage-play' shall be taken to include every tragedy, comedy, farce, opera, burletta, interlude, melodrama, pantomime, or other entertainment of the stage, or any part thereof," &c.

Poland now appeared for the appellant, and contended that the justices were wrong, for that a dialogue is as much a stage-play as a performance by a greater number.

Lush, Q. C. contra.—There is a fatal defect in this information, for it is laid against the owner of the premises, and the case itself states that there was no proof that he had himself let the place to the performers. The 2nd section is directed only against the manager. [Poland.—That point is not raised by the case. CROMPTON, J.—It may be doubted whether or not the defendant was liable for the act of his wife in letting the premises. You cannot say, Mr. Lush, that this was not a stage-play within the interpretation clause.] I cannot contend that it is not.

CROMPTON, J.—Then let the case go down again to the justices to be reheard with reference to the liability of the defendant, with our intimation that it is a stage-play within the Act.

To be reheard by the justices.(a)

REG. v. RECORDER OF LEEDS.

The justices of the borough of L. made an order for the removal of a pauper from L. to A., notice of appeal was given by the overseers of A. to the sessions of the county in which L. was situate, instead of to the borough sessions, and on discovering their error a letter was written one day before the holding of the borough sessions, abandoning the notice, whereupon the respondents attended at the last-named sessions, and obtained an order for their costs:

Held, that the recorder for the borough of L. had jurisdiction to make such order, and that under the above circumstances the respondents were entitled to their costs.

Maule showed cause against a rule for a certiorari to bring up an order of the Recorder of Leeds, with a view to its being quashed. The justices of the borough of Leeds made an order for the removal of a pauper from Leeds to Applethwaite in Somersetshire. Notice of appeal was given by the overseers of Applethwaite to the sessions for the West Riding of York, instead of to the borough of Leeds sessions, and on their discovering that the notice should have been given to the borough sessions, a letter was written by them inquiring whether the appeal could be heard by consent between the parties, and if it could not, declaring their intention of abandoning the notice. The notice was given on the 18th July, on the 28th Aug. grounds of appeal were served, and on the 9th Oct. the above-mentioned letter was written. The borough sessions were held on the following day, viz. 10th Oct., and the sessions for the West Riding of York on the 15th Oct. To the letter abandoning the notice of appeal, respondents replied that nothing could be done by consent. Under these circumstances the overseers of Leeds attended at the borough sessions on the 10th Oct. and obtained an order for their costs, which order it was now sought to quash. Reg. v. The Recorder of Liverpool, 15 Q.B. 1070, and Reg. v. The Justices of Buckinghamshire, 4 Ell. & Bl. 259, n., are clear decisions on a notice such as was here given; and with the light thrown on its validity by the judgments in those cases, the appellants might safely have gone to the sessions and had the appeal tried. The respondents were therefore bound to be prepared, and the letter written on the 9th Oct., the day before the borough sessions, was clearly too late to avoid the expense. The notice given by the appellants was a good notice; the borough sessions had jurisdiction, and the respondents were entitled to their costs: (8 & 9 Will. 3, c. 30, s. 3.)

(a) This is a decision of great importance, as seriously affecting a very large class of popular amusements, such as those of Mr. and Mrs. German Reed, some of the Nigger songs, and many others that might be named. In substance this case determines that any dialogue spoken by two or more persons is a dramatic performance. Hence the absurd consequence, that a scene of a play read to an audience in dramatic style, the same voice speaking for all the characters, is not within the law, while the same scene read by two persons is so.

Shaw contra.—The order for costs was made behind the backs of the appellants. The power to give costs is given by the 8 & 9 Will. 3, c. 30, s. 3, and 12 & 13 Vict. c. 45, s. 6. Reg. v. The Justices of Salop, 4 Ell. & Bl. 257, is an authority in favour of the appellants, and is distinguished from the cases cited, in the judgment of Lord Campbell. No doubt the appellants were bound to pay some costs, but not these costs, and the recorder had no jurisdiction to make the order.

CROMPTON, J.—I am of opinion that this rule should be discharged. After the notice given, and looking also to the cases referred to by Mr. Maule, I think that the parties were entitled to suppose that they might be called on to appear at the right sessions, that is to say, the sessions for the borough of Leeds; they had therefore a right to make preparation, and to incur costs. The letter of the 9th Oct. was too late, and cannot interfere with the respondents' right to recover costs incurred before that time. I think it clear that the recorder had jurisdiction, and this rule will therefore be discharged, but without costs.

HILL, J.—I am of the same opinion. We could not make absolute this rule without saying the recorder had no jurisdiction. Now clearly he had; but I think there is good ground for saying that the conduct of the respondents' attorney was disingenuous, and therefore the rule will be discharged without costs.

Rule discharged.

BATTING AND OTHERS (appellants) v. THE BRISTOL AND EXETER RAILWAY COMPANY (respondents).
Railway—Conviction for obstructing the line—Intent to obstruct.

By sect. 211 of the 6 Will. 4, c. 36 (private) (the Bristol and Exeter Railway Company's Act) it is enacted "That if any person . . . shall do any act, matter, or thing to obstruct the free passage of the said railway or any part thereof," he shall be liable to a certain penalty:

Held, that, to render a party liable under this section, he must have intended to have committed the obstruction complained of.

Where therefore a person was crossing the railway at a crossing which he had a right to use with a waggon laden with timber, and the waggon got accidentally hitched with the gate-post, and a collision occurred with it and a train whilst it was so hitched:

Held, that, although the party was guilty of carelessness, yet, as he did not intend to create an obstruction he was not liable to a penalty under the foregoing section.

This was a case stated under the 20 & 21 Vict. c. 43, upon a conviction by justices of the appellants, who were charged with having obstructed the free passage of the Bristol and Exeter Railway, by drawing and placing across the said line at Bramford Speke a waggon loaded with timber, which by the local Act, 6 Will. 4,

Q. B.]

REG. v. GEORGE BRUMMITT.

c. 36, s. 211, is punishable by penalty not exceeding 10*l.* nor less than 5*l.*, and in default of payment to imprisonment not exceeding three months.

The facts as they appeared in evidence were, that the defendant Batting is the occupier of an estate in Bramford Speke, Devon, part of which lies on one side of the railway and part on the other. The only ingress and regress to and from one of his fields is over a level crossing on the railway, at a place appointed for the purpose by the company. Some elm-trees had been felled in this field, and the defendant Strong was employed to draw away the trees. The defendants Osborne and Wickers are Strong's servants.

On the 22nd May Strong and his two men were there for the purpose, with a timber-waggon and horses. They loaded the waggon with two elm-trees, with which they were about to cross the railway at the proper place, when they were informed that a train was due, and were cautioned not to pass. Defendant Batting was present assisting. He sent his son up the line to see if the train was coming, with instructions if he saw it to hold up his hands. The line curves a short distance above the crossing, and on the son's going beyond the curve he saw the train coming on. The two defendants Batting and Strong, however, without waiting for any signal from the son, ordered the two other defendants Osborne and Wickers to take the horses and waggon across the railway, which they began to do, and as they drew it across one of the hind wheels of the waggon became latched in a gate-post at the side of the railway, from which they had proceeded, and the waggon with the two elm-trees on it thus became fixed in a direct line across the railway, taking up the whole crossing. The men were using every exertion to free the waggon, but could not do it, and after some minutes the train came on. It was impossible to stop it, and the driver seeing a collision inevitable, kept up his full speed, and most providentially cut through both the elm-trees, and the train passed on without injury to life or limb, damaging, however, the engine very considerably. It was a passenger train.

It was elicited by the defendants, on their cross-examination of the company's servants, that the trains did not always keep their time; that in fact they were sometimes an hour or more after their time, and it was contended that persons having the right as the defendants had of using this crossing on foot and with carriages, are not obliged to wait the uncertainty of the passing of the trains; and that but for the accidental locking of the wheel of the waggon in the gate-post the waggon would have been drawn across the line before the arrival of the train; and moreover, that the company are bound to keep a man at the gates of the crossing.

On the part of the company it was insisted that the defendants knew the train was due, and that instead of sending Batting the son up the line to see if the train was approaching, they ought to have waited a reasonable time before attempting to draw over so unwieldy and unmanageable a vehicle as a loaded timber-waggon; that the company are not bound to keep a man at the gates of a private crossing; that there was a want of proper caution in the use of the crossing, and therefore the defendants were guilty of obstructing the free passage of the railway within the meaning of the Act of Parliament.

The justices took this view of the subject, and convicted the defendants in the penalty of 5*l.* each.

By the Bristol and Exeter Railway Company's Act (private), 6 Will. 4, c. 36, s. 211, it is enacted "that if any person shall throw, place, or wilfully scatter or drop any gravel, stone, rubbish, or other matter or thing upon any part of the said railway . . . or shall do any act, matter, or thing to obstruct the free passage of the said railway, or any part thereof, he and every person actually or constructively aiding or assisting therein shall respectively forfeit and pay any sum not exceeding ten pounds nor less than five pounds for every such offence."

Kinglake, Serjt. (M. Smith, Q.C. with him) appeared in support of the conviction.—He referred to Reg. v. Holroyd, 2 Mo. & R. 339; 3 & 4 Vict. c. 97, s. 15; 14 & 15 Vict. c. 19, s. 6.

COCKBURN, C. J.—I am of opinion that, upon the facts of the case, the conviction cannot be sustained. The construction of the Act of Parliament is certainly very ambiguous, but I can quite understand that, though a person has a right to cross a line, yet, if he does so at a dangerous time, he may commit a serious offence. The question is, whether or not that offence is set out in that Act of Parliament? Now here the appellants were entitled to cross the line, provided they did so at a reasonable time. Then, did they intend to obstruct the line? It is not so found, and it is clear that they never intended that there should be any obstruction. They intended to get safely across, and with no intention of obstructing. They obstructed by a pure accident, and in consequence, instead of getting across, their waggon remained upon the line. Therefore, notwithstanding in consequence of their act the accident occurred, it was not with any intention on their part. That the act was a negligent one I agree; for, as trains are liable to be late, and there was a curve, it was only common prudence on their part to use great caution; but whether this is a criminal or merely a civil injury is another matter. Although, therefore, they did something which had the effect of obstructing the line, yet, as they never intended it, I think they are not liable under that statute.

CROMPTON, J.—I think the fair meaning of the Act is, that they should do something which they mean to be an obstruction.

HILL, J.—I am of the same opinion. The question is, whether the parties who were exercising a right of crossing the line, but were doing so carelessly, but without any intention of causing an obstruction, were guilty within the meaning of the Act. I am of opinion that they were not. [His Lordship here read the section.] Now I construe the words "or shall do any act, matter, or thing to obstruct the free passage of the said railway" to mean with intent to obstruct, for I think that, if a person were to do such an act with such an intention, he would be guilty, although no obstruction may in fact have taken place.

(a) But although the words of the Act may not be read literally, so as to include every act of obstruction, why should not gross negligence be held as equivalent to intention on the same principle as in manslaughter? The course of argument might be this: The law assumes an intent to do what is done; it is for the defendant to excuse himself by showing that his intent was otherwise; gross negligence is not such an excuse, for a man is bound to use ordinary diligence to avoid an infraction of the law.

title-deeds, upon a count of an indictment for stealing lead, the property of A. B. fixed to a dwelling-house of the said A. B.

Case reserved for the opinion of this court by the chairman at the West Riding of Yorkshire Epiphany sessions 1861:—

The prisoner was tried before me at Christmas general quarter sessions of the peace for the West Riding of the county of York, holden at Wakefield on the 1st Jan. 1861, on an indictment; which charged him on the first count with feloniously ripping, stealing and carrying thirty-one pounds weight of leaden piping, the property of John Hope Shaw and others, then and there being fixed to a dwelling-house of the said John Hope Shaw and others.

On the second count with feloniously receiving the same.

On the third count with stealing thirty-one pounds weight of leaden piping, the property of Thos. Wood, then and there being fixed to a dwelling-house of the said Thomas Wood.

On the fourth count with feloniously receiving the last-mentioned lead.

The jury found a general verdict of guilty, and the prisoner was sentenced to nine calendar months' imprisonment with hard labour; but was admitted to bail until the opinion of the Court of Criminal Appeal could be had on the following case.

John Barff, a justice of the peace, proved that he managed the property from which the lead in the third count of the indictment was stolen for his nephew Thos. Wood, who resided in Patras; that he ordered all repairs, received the rents in his nephew's absence, and let the property to Mr. Waite, the present tenant; that prisoner called upon him on the Thursday morning before the robbery, and said he was repairing Captain Binstead's (a neighbour's) house, and that the spouts of Mr. Waites' house were out of repair, and asked witness's leave to repair them, as he could do it cheaply; that witness refused, and said that he should order his own workmen to do the work if repairs were required.

Counsel for the prosecution proposed to ask Mr. Barff whether Thomas Wood was owner of the premises in question.

The counsel for the prisoner objected to this question on the ground that the ownership would appear from the title-deeds, the best attainable evidence, as the deeds might show the property to be in trust for Mr. Wood, or that the mortgagee had the legal title; in either of which cases Mr. Wood might not be the legal owner, and these inferences were consistent with the evidence of Mr. Barff, or Mr. Wood might be himself an agent merely of a third party, Mr. Barff acting for him in his absence.

The evidence of the ownership of John Hope Shaw and others to the property in the first count mentioned was held by the court to be insufficient. And the court held, that the evidence as to the ownership of Waite's house was sufficiently proved to be in Thos. Wood.

The opinion of the Court of Criminal Appeal is requested, whether the evidence of Mr. Barff was sufficient to prove the ownership of the property in Thos. Wood, the prosecutor. J. G. SMYTH, Chairman.

Campbell Foster, for the prisoner, now applied to have certain evidence given at the trial, which the chairman of the sessions had declined to insert, added to the statement of the case, and which it was contended showed conclusively that the property was not in Thomas Wood.

COCKBURN, C. J.—There is abundant evidence set out to show that the property is well laid to be in Thomas Wood. The objection is purely of a technical nature, and you now ask us to assist you in raising it by an amendment. We refuse to do so.

C. Foster.—The evidence of ownership is not sufficient. There was some evidence at the trial that Wood was not the owner, and that Barff was merely the conduit-pipe through which the rents were received.

WIGHTMAN, J.—Where do you find it in this case?

COCKBURN, C. J.—The objection is altogether beside the merits of the case. The prisoner stole the lead, and there is evidence before us that Wood was the owner.

WILLIAMS, J.—There is enough evidence of title to support an action of ejectment, and why not this conviction?

C. Foster.—In Rex v. Hutchinson, R. & R. 412, upon an indictment for stealing goods from a dissenting chapel, the second count described them as the property of a person who was employed to take care of the chapel, kept the keys of the chapel, and received a salary for so doing; and it was held that the goods could not be considered as belonging to the chapel-keeper, who was no more than a mere servant. So in this case it may be inferred that Barff and Wood were not the owners, but acted only as the agents for the owners.

Waddy, for the prosecution, was not called upon to argue.

COCKBURN, C. J.—It appears to me that there is only one inference to be drawn from the circumstances stated. On the evidence before us the property appears to be well laid in Wood. The receipt of rents is prima facie evidence of a seisin in fee. A man is not bound in such a case to produce his title-deeds. The point is too clear for argument.

The rest of the Court concurring,

Conviction affirmed.

REG. v. PHILIP WILLIAM MAY.

Embezzlement—Clerk or servant—Person collecting orders on commission.

The prisoner was informed by letter from the prosecutors that for all business he did for them, he would be allowed a commission. It was his duty to account to the prosecutors for any money he might receive for them immediately on the receipt of it:

Held, that, upon this evidence, the prisoner was not shown to be a clerk or a servant within the 7 & 8 Geo. 4, c. 29, s. 47.

Case reserved for the opinion of this court by the chairman at the Epiphany Staffordshire sessions 1861.

At the recent Epiphany sessions for the county of Stafford, Philip Wm. May was indicted, for that he being the clerk or servant of the Right Hon. Earl of Granville and others, feloniously embezzled on the 1st Aug. last 94*l.*; and on the 22nd Sept. 37*l.* 15*s.*, the moneys of his employers.

The evidence showed that the prisoner was employed at Newcastle-upon-Tyne, in Northumberland, to obtain orders there for the sale of iron for the prosecutors, who carried on business at Hanley, in Staffordshire, as manufacturers of iron, under the name of the Shelton Bar Iron Company, at a certain commission upon the orders which he should obtain.

This employment took place under a letter from the manager of the prosecutor's works, of which the following is a copy:—

"Shelton Bar Iron Works, near Stoke, Staffordshire, 19th Sept. 1859.

"Mr. P. W. May.

"Dear Sir,—In reply to your letter, we are not disposed to appoint any agent at Newcastle, but for all business you do for us we shall be happy to pay you a commission.

"We expected that after your conversation with the writer a good business would result.

"Yours truly,

"Shelton Bar Iron Company,

"W. P. RODEX.

"15. Lisle-street, Newcastle-upon-Tyne."

The manager of the company, Mr. Roden, was not called as a witness, but the cashier of the company, who had nothing to do with the employment of such persons as the prisoner, said that a person who like the prisoner got orders on commission, was called an agent in their trade, and that he had no doubt but there was some other letter appointing the prisoner an agent for the prosecutors. There was no evidence of, or of a notice to produce any such letter. There was not any evidence to show whether the prisoner was employed for or by any other persons than the prosecutors.

It was his duty to account to them for any money which he might receive for them immediately on receipt of it.

On the 1st Aug. last, at Newcastle-on-Tyne, he received on account of the prosecutors the sum of 94*l.* from persons to whom he had sold iron for them, and on the 2nd Aug. wrote from that place to them a letter of business, in which he did not mention the receipt of this sum, and on the 22nd Sept. last, at the same place, he received another sum of 37*l.* 15*s.* on their account also; and on the 29th Sept. wrote from the same town another business letter to the prosecutors, in which he did not mention the receipt of this second sum. Being soon afterwards applied to on behalf of the prosecutors for these two sums, he wrote from the same place to them two letters which they received through the post-office in Staffordshire, and of which the following are copies:—

"8, Malton-terrace, Newcastle, Oct. 28, 1860.

"W. S. Roden, Esq.

"Dear Sir,—I am truly sorry and ashamed that I have taken such a liberty as to make use of money received on account of the Shelton Bar Iron Company, but shall in a short time be able to remit the amount; therefore pray of you to pardon such conduct, and prevent any unpleasant proceedings, which I own would be my desert, and at same time to myself and family. I should have replied to your several letters, but have delayed, expecting daily to make up the sum. Hoping that you accede to my request,

I remain, dear Sir, yours truly

"P. W. MAY.

"P.S. I inclose Mr. Toward's acceptance, which should have been sent before, but was mislaid on his leaving home, and only returned yesterday."

"8, Malton-terrace, Newcastle, Oct. 31, 1860.

"Dear Sir,—I am sorry that such is the upshot of my connection with you. Pray give me a little longer, and my brothers at Smyd colliery, adjoining you, will no doubt put matters right. If my money does not come in the mean time legal proceedings would spoil it, and prevent me getting anything. Therefore, as my earnest desire is to replace all, I hope you will not pursue the course that you threaten.

"I note your remarks respecting orders in future, and hope that affairs may ultimately show a better aspect. I remain your obedient servant,

"P. W. MAY.

"Messrs. The Shelton Bar Iron Company."

This being the case for the prosecution, it was objected on behalf of the prisoner—

First, that he was not shown to be a clerk or servant to the prosecutors within the meaning of the statute, &c.

Secondly, that no act of receiving or embezzling had taken place within the county of Stafford.

The court overruled both objections; but on the jury returning a verdict of guilty, postponed passing sentence until the next adjourned sessions, in order that the propriety of such ruling may be submitted to the Court for the Consideration of Crown Cases Reserved.

If either objection was valid, the verdict is to be set aside; if not, the verdict is to stand.

The prisoner is in gaol awaiting judgment.

LICHFIELD, Chairman of Quarter Sessions.

COCKBURN, C. J.—The point is, whether the defendant was a clerk or servant within the meaning of the statute. This is the case of a person going about and getting orders for the prosecutors upon which he received a commission. He may be employed by fifty other persons to do the same for them in their business. We will hear the counsel for the prosecution.

Kenealy for the prosecution.—It is submitted that the prisoner was a clerk or servant within the statute. In Carr's case, Russ. & Ry. 198, the prisoner was employed by various houses as a traveller to get orders and to receive debts and had a commission on such orders and debts; he paid his own expenses and did not live with any of his employers or act in any of their counting-houses. S. and Co. were amongst his employers, and he was indicted for embezzlement of moneys he had collected for them. Upon a case reserved the judges held that the prisoner was their clerk within the statute. That case is not distinguishable from the present. There the prisoner was employed by several houses at the same time in a similar manner as defendant was in this case.

COCKBURN, C. J.—In the case of a traveller he is under the control of his employers: he is bound to go here and there, and to do this and that according to orders. Here the prisoner was free to act or not, and not subject to any such control as seems to be involved in the relation of master and clerk or servant. A traveller may be ordered to go to Manchester or Newcastle, and to do this or that. It could not be contended that a person in a country town who procures persons to insure their lives with an insurance company, and receives a commission for so doing, is the clerk or servant of the company. He is an agent, not a clerk or servant. It must be established that the relation of master and servant exists. Here the prisoner was simply a commission agent. A traveller in once sense may be a clerk.

Kenealy.—Spencer's case, Russ. & Ry. 299, decides that it is sufficient to establish the relation of master and servant or clerk, if the prisoner is employed on one occasion only to receive money.

COCKBURN, C. J.—Suppose a merchant living in London writes to another abroad, and says, "Any orders you send will be shipped, and we will allow you commission." Is the latter a clerk of the merchant?

WILLIAMS, J.—On the other hand, if a person is employed to get orders and to receive the money, and is paid a remuneration in respect of both services, I think that would bring the case within the statute according to many of the decisions, but here it is not stated that the prisoner was engaged to receive money.

McMahon for the prisoner.—In Rex v. Goodbody, 8 Car. & P. 665, Parke, B. said, he wished that Carr's case should be reconsidered. In Reg. v. Walter, 27 L. J. 207, M. C.; S. C. 8 Cox's Crim. Cas. 1, the prisoner kept a refreshment house, and was employed by the prosecutors to get orders for a manure, to collect money and pay it over. He was paid by commission. He was to go about among the farmers to get orders, but no definite time was fixed for so doing. He was called the prosecutor's agent for the district. The prosecutors had a store under the prisoner's control from which he supplied the manure upon the orders he obtained. In order to obtain the security of a guarantee society for the prisoner's conduct, it was arranged that the prisoner should have a salary of 1*l.* a year. The prisoner having got into arrears, was treated as a debtor for the amount. The prisoner fraudulently appropriated money which he received from customers, and gave a false account. It was held that the evi-

REG. v. HENRY MOORE.

Larceny—Finding property—Appropriation—Felonious intention.

The prosecutor went to the prisoner's shop to have his hair cut, and he also made a purchase. His purse, containing notes and gold, were in a coat pocket, which was laid on a chair while his hair was being cut, and next morning he missed a 10*l.* note from his purse. The jury found that the note was dropped by the prosecutor in the shop, and that the prisoner found it, and that at the time he picked it up the prisoner did not know, nor had he reasonable means of knowing, who the owner was, but that he afterwards acquired knowledge of who the owner was, and after that converted the note to his own use; that the prisoner intended, when he picked up the note in the shop, to take it to his own use, and deprive the owner of it, whoever that owner might be, and that the prisoner believed at the time he picked up the note that the owner could be found:

Held, that upon this finding the prisoner was guilty of larceny.

Case reserved for the opinion of this Court, by Mr. Commissioner Kerr, at the Central Criminal Court:—

At a session of the Central Criminal Court, holden on the 26th day of Nov. 1860, Henry Moore was tried before me on an indictment charging him in the first count with stealing a Bank of England note for 10*l.*, the property of David McGregor, and in the second count with receiving the same, knowing it to have been stolen.

It appeared from the evidence that the prosecutor went to the shop of the prisoner to have his hair cut, which was done by the prisoner; that the prosecutor before leaving, purchased some hair-oil, and then left the shop. When he went to the prisoner's shop the prosecutor had in a clasped purse in the pocket of his great coat, which he carried on his arm, two 10*l.* notes (one of them the subject of the indictment) and some gold. He folded his great coat and laid it on a chair while his hair was being cut, and he paid for the hair-oil from the purse in which the notes and gold were.

Next morning he discovered the loss of the 10*l.* note, alleged to be stolen, returned to the prisoner's shop, stated to the prisoner his belief that he had lost it in the shop, and offered him a reward of 3*l.* if he would restore it. The prisoner told the prosecutor he knew nothing of the note, but in his statement before the magistrate he explained that he had given gold for the note the same day that the prosecutor lost it, but was afraid to explain this to the prosecutor lest he should be obliged to give up the note to him.

Evidence was called in support of the prisoner's statement, that he had given gold for a 10*l.* note about the time of the loss by the prosecutor to a man in his (the prisoner's) shop, and it was proved that the prisoner, on the same day when the prosecutor inquired after the note, parted with it.

The jury found the prisoner guilty, but recommended him to mercy on the ground that they believed the note was dropped in the shop and found by him there.

Mr. Best, counsel for the prisoner, then contended that if the jury believed the prisoner to have found the note, they ought to acquit.

Whereupon I put certain questions to the jury, in answer to which they found—

First, that the note was dropped by the prosecutor in the shop, and that the prisoner found it there.

Secondly, that the prisoner at the time he picked up the note did not know, nor had he reasonable means of knowing, who the owner was.

Thirdly, that he afterwards acquired knowledge of who the owner was, and after that he converted the note to his own use.

Fourthly, that the prisoner intended, when he picked up the note in the shop, to take it to his own use, and deprive the owner of it, whoever that owner might be.

Fifthly, that the prisoner believed at the time he picked up the note that the owner could be found.

I thereupon directed the verdict of guilty to be entered of record, and reserved for the opinion of this court the question, whether, upon the above findings, the prisoner was properly convicted.

The prisoner remains in gaol awaiting judgment.

R. MALCOLM KERR,

One of the Commissioners of the Central 8th Jan. 1861. Criminal Court.

Sleigh for the prisoner.—It is submitted that this conviction ought to be quashed. In order to convict the prisoner of larceny, it was essential to prove these two ingredients: first, that the prisoner intended at the very time he took up the bank-note to appropriate it to his own use; and secondly, that he had then the means of knowing who the owner of it was. The merely taking up lost property, although with the intention to appropriate it, is not sufficient.

COCKBURN, C.J.—Your difficulty is, that the prisoner knows who the owner is before he converts the note.

Sleigh.—That does not make it a felonious conversion. In Reg. v. Thurborn, 1 Den. C. C. 387, S.C. nom. Reg. v. Wood, 3 Cox Crim. Cas. 453, it was held that the knowledge, or means of knowledge, as to the owner must be co-existent with the fact of finding. A mere belief in the mind of the prisoner that the owner can be found is not enough. In Reg. v. Dixon, 1 Dearsley, C.C. 580, S. C. 7 Cox Crim. Cas. 35, where one question left to the jury was, whether at or after the time of the finding the prisoner believed that there was not reasonable probability that the owner could be traced; and the jury answered that they were of opinion that the prisoner did believe that the owner could be traced; Jervis, C.J., said: "It does seem to me that it was left to the jury to speculate upon what was in the mind of the man, without any facts to support that speculation."

WIGHTMAN, J.—In the present case the prisoner, at the time of finding the note, makes up his mind to deprive the owner, whoever he may be, of the property in it, and he does know who the owner actually is, before he converts the note. In Reg. v. Thurborn, Parke, B., in the course of his elaborate judgment, says: "If the prisoner had taken the chattel innocently, and afterwards appropriated it without knowledge of the ownership, it would not have been larceny, nor would it, we think, if he had done so knowing who was the owner, for he had the lawful possession in both cases, and the conversion would not have been a trespass in either." But here the original taking was not innocent.

Sleigh.—Whether the original taking was innocent depends upon whether the note was marked or not, or

(a) This decision is quite inconsistent with that in Carr's case, 1 R. & R. 198, where a person taking orders and receiving payments on commission was held to be a servant. The judges here appear to have treated it as if the prisoner had been employed simply to procure orders, overlooking the explicit definition of the duty undertaken by him to account for any money he might receive for his employers immediately on the receipt of it. This appears to me to imply much more than the mere relationship of a commission agent. As by far the greatest number of frauds of this kind are committed by persons employed as was the prisoner, this defect in the law should now be amended, and conversion to his own use by the receiver of money for another should be made a misdemeanour.

the circumstances of the finding such that the owner could be traced. It is not like the case where a purse or property has been mislaid, and the owner may probably be expected to come back to look for it. Upon the statement in this case the note is found by the jury to have been absolutely lost. In Reg. v. Dixon the jury found that there was a reasonable probability at and from the time of the finding that the owner could be traced, and that the prisoner believed that the owner could be traced. That finding was stronger against the prisoner than the one in the present case, and yet the court quashed the conviction.

WILLIAMS, J.—In Reg. v. Thurborn, Parke, B. puts the judgment of the court favourably for your client, viz., that whether it is a felony or not does not depend upon what is passing in the mind of the finder at all, but he lays it down that where dominus rerum non apparet, the subject-matter is incapable of being the subject of larceny.

WIGHTMAN, J.—In the present case you must add that the finder took up the note animo furandi.

Sleigh.—Even assuming that the prisoner intended at the time of finding the note to appropriate it to his own use, it is no larceny unless he had then the means of knowing who the owner was. In Reg. v. William Charles Giffard, 52 Central Criminal Court Sessions Paper, 242, the prisoner was indicted for stealing a 10*l.* bank-note, and the defence was that he found it, and that, as there was no mark upon it showing to whom it belonged, his retaining it did not amount to a felony, and Crompton, J. directed the jury that if they considered the prisoner found the note, not knowing whose it was, and not having the means of knowing, it was their duty to acquit him.

COCKBURN, C.J.—Suppose a person finds a valuable diamond necklace—say of 10,000*l.* value in a ball room, and takes it up intending to keep it, whoever the owner may be, would that not be a larceny?

Sleigh.—If at the time of finding, the person had the means of knowledge, it would be larceny; but if he had not then the means of knowledge, it would not be larceny. In Reg. v. Christopher, 1 Bell's C. C. 27, 8 Cox Crim. Cas. 91, the latest case on this subject, it was decided that where a person finds lost property and appropriates it to his own use, it is necessary, in order to convict him of larceny, that the jury should find that at the time he took possession of the property he knew, or had the means of knowing, who the owner was, and took possession of it with the felonious intent to appropriate it to his own use.

WILLIAMS, J.—Suppose a sheep strays into a man's field, and the man kills and eats it, not knowing the owner, is he guilty of larceny?

Sleigh.—No.

COCKBURN, C.J.—In Reg. v. Thurborn Parke, B. uses this language: "To prevent the taking of goods from being larceny, it is essential that they should be presumably lost; that is, that they should be taken in such a place and under such circumstances as that the owner would be reasonably presumed by the taker to have abandoned them, or at least not to know where to find them."

Sleigh.—In Reg. v. Dixon, where Reg. v. Thurborn was cited, the jury found that the prosecutor had not abandoned, and that the prisoner believed he had not abandoned, his right to the money. In Reg. v. Christopher, Channell, B. said: "In Reg. v. Dixon, in which Reg. v. Thurborn was referred to, it was held, that if a man find lost property and keep it, and at the time of finding it have no means—no immediate means—of discovering the owner, he is not guilty of larceny because he afterwards has means of finding him, and nevertheless retains the property to his own use." And Hill, J. said: "Two things must be made out in order to establish a charge of larceny against the finder of a lost article. First, it must be shown that at the time of finding he had the felonious intent to appropriate the thing to his own use. The other ingredient is, that at the time of finding he had reasonable ground for believing that the owner might be discovered, and that reasonable belief may be the result of a previous knowledge, or may arise from the nature of the chattel found, or from there being some name or mark upon it; but it is not sufficient that the finder may think that by taking pains the owner may be found. There must be the immediate means of finding him."

COCKBURN, C.J.—The facts were very different to those in this case. Here the prisoner keeps a shop, a customer comes in, takes out his purse and drops a bank-note out of it; the prisoner must know that the customer will come back to inquire about it. Can it be said that he has not the means of knowing who the owner may be?

Sleigh.—There is no finding in this case to support the view just put. Belief which may be unfounded, and means of knowledge, are different things.

WIGHTMAN, J.—Is there any reported case in which all the facts found in this case have been combined? There are cases in which one or other of them have existed separately.

Sleigh.—No. Here there is no finding inconsistent with the position that this was lost property.

COCKBURN, C.J.—If the findings in this case do not amount to larceny, the law is more lax than I take it to be.

The rest of the Court concurring,

Conviction affirmed.

Ex parte THE DEPUTY CORONER OF MIDDLESEX.

Deputy coroner—Privilege from arrest when in execution of the duties of his office.

A coroner's deputy is privileged from arrest when engaged in the duties of the office of coroner.

Huddleston, Q. C. moved, on behalf of the deputy coroner for Middlesex, who had been arrested by the sheriff this morning when on his way to the office of the coroner, where he was going to get the necessary papers and other documents necessary to enable him to discharge his duty of deputy coroner, for holding certain inquests to-day, that such deputy coroner may be discharged out of custody, on the ground that he was privileged from arrest when in execution of the duty of his office. The applicant was duly appointed deputy coroner under the 6 & 7 Vict. c. 83, "An Act to amend the law respecting the duties of coroners;" and in Jervis on Coroners (2nd edit., p. 88), it is said: "Although there is no express adjudication upon the subject, it would seem from principle that coroners are privileged from arrest while in the execution of their judicial duties. The privilege from arrest of suitors and witnesses connected even with a civil cause is not confined to an attendance upon the Superior Courts of Law, but extends to every tribunal established for or connected with the administration of justice; and the Superior Courts have uniformly manifested an inclination to extend rather than confine this exemption, that parties might not, from the fear of arrest, be deterred from attending the place of trial. The same reason which exempts from arrest the judges and officers of the Superior Courts, would seem equally to apply to coroners, the administration of whose office concerns as well the interest of the prerogative as of the subject, and who ought not, therefore, to be deterred by an apprehension of arrest from executing it openly as occasion may require. In a late case this question arose incidentally at Nisi Prius, in an action against the sheriff of Staffordshire for not arresting a coroner. On behalf of the plaintiff it was proposed to show that several inquests had been held by the coroner between the delivery of the writ by the sheriff and the return of the writ, when Gaselee, J., before whom the cause was tried, expressed his opinion that no coroner could be arrested cundo, morando, vel redeundo for the purpose of taking an inquest." [MARTIN, B. referred to Callahan v. Twiss, 9 Ir. Law Rep. 422, where it appeared that a coroner was arrested while engaged in summoning a jury for the purpose of holding two inquests, and was discharged.] If the coroner is privileged from arrest while in the execution of the duties of his office, so also is his deputy. [MARTIN, B.—Yes; he is entitled to be discharged under the circumstances, and the better course would perhaps be to draw up the rule at once, as the deputy coroner and the officer are now here; or the sheriff may be sued for an escape.]

REG. v. JUSTICES OF SURREY.

Highway—Road made at the expense of a railway company—Proposed dedication to public—Certificate of justices.

Justices, after the parish had resolved that a road proposed to be dedicated to the public was of sufficient utility, were called upon to certify that it was made in conformity to the Highway Act, 5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 50, s. 23. They refused to grant their certificate, being of opinion that it was but a part of a road, which in another part was not of the requisite width:

Held, that the justices were right in their decision.

T. Jones moved for a mandamus to certain justices of Surrey, commanding them to certify, pursuant to the 5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 50, s. 23 (Highway Act), that a highway had been made in a substantial manner and of the width required by the Highway Act.

It appeared that the road in question was made by the South-Eastern Railway Company adjacent to the station at Red-hill, Surrey; that the line of railway at this spot was formed upon an embankment which cut the road in question into two parts; the two parts communicated, however, with each other by a tunnel through the embankment. There was no objection to the width of the two parts of the road on either side of the railway, but the tunnelled part, though a carriage way, was not of the requisite width. The justices, when called upon to certify under the 5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 50, s. 23, as to parts not under the tunnel, declined to give their certificate, being of opinion that the whole of the three parts formed but one road, and the part under the tunnel not being of the requisite width, and doubting their jurisdiction to certify as to part only, although a vestry meeting had been held, and a resolution passed that the road was of sufficient utility to justify its being kept in repair at the expense of the parish.

Sect. 23 of 5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 50. enacts, "That no road or occupation way made, or hereafter to be made, by and at the expense of any individual or private person, body public or corporate, nor any roads already set out, or hereafter to be set out as a private driftway or horsepath, in any award of commissioners under an Inclosure Act shall be deemed or taken to be a highway which the inhabitants of any parish shall be compellable or liable to repair, unless the person, body politic or corporate, proposing to dedicate such highway to the use of the public shall give three calendar months' previous notice in writing to the surveyor of the parish of his intention to dedicate such highway to the use of the public, describing its situation and extent, and shall have made or shall make the same in a substantial manner and of the width required by this Act, and to the satisfaction of the said surveyor and of any two justices of the peace of the division in which such highway is situate in petty sessions assembled, who are hereby required, on receiving notice from such person, or body politic or corporate, to view the same and certify that such highway has been made in a substantial manner, and of the width required by this Act, at the expense of the party requiring such view, which certificate shall be enrolled at the quarter sessions holden next after the granting thereof; then and in such case after the said highway shall have been used by the public and duly repaired and kept in repair by the said person, body politic or corporate, for the space of twelve calendar months, such highway shall for ever thereafter be kept in repair by the parish in which it is situate. Provided nevertheless, that on receipt of such notice as aforesaid the surveyor of the said parish shall call a vestry meeting of the inhabitants of such parish, and if such vestry shall deem such highway not to be of sufficient utility to the inhabitants of the said parish to justify its being kept in repair at the expense of the said parish, any one justice of the peace, on the application of the said surveyor, shall summon the party proposing to make the new highway to appear before the justices at the next special sessions for the highways to be held in and for the division in which the said intended highway shall be situate, and the question as to the utility as aforesaid of such highway shall be determined at the discretion of such justices."

Jones.—The justices were wrong in their decision. The question is, whether or not, by reason of the road under the railway not being of sufficient width, the other roads on either side of the railway which are of sufficient width can be said to be highways within the meaning of the 23rd section? It is submitted that they can, and that the justices ought to have certified as to them.

BLACKBURN, J.—Is it not for the justices to be satisfied that they are highways?

CROMPTON, J.—The justices say that these three parts ought to form but one highway. The railway company cut up what ought to be one highway into two parts, with a narrow part between them. A mere certificate that so much, specifying the part by measurement, was according to the Act, would amount to nothing.

Jones.—There was no road where the way goes under the tunnel.

WIGHTMAN, J.—This was one continuous road, and the middle of it was not of the requisite width. You propose to have the justices' certificate for each end. Is that within the statute?

Jones.—These parts are not the less highways in point of law on that ground. In Bateman v. Bluck, 21 L. J. 406, Q.B., it was decided that a public highway may in point of law exist over a place which is not a thoroughfare.

WIGHTMAN, J.—No doubt it is a highway, but is it such as that the justices are bound to give the certificate contemplated by sect. 23? Can you break up what is really but one highway into several parts, and require a certificate of justices for each part?

CROMPTON, J.—Can you ask them to certify that these parts are two distinct roads? They refuse, on the ground that they are but one road.

Jones.—The company cannot close up the part under the tunnel. It is dedicated. If it were closed up, the justices would be bound to give certificates for the two parts on either side of the railway. The company made the road, which is two miles long, as landowners.

TURNIDGE v. SHAW.

WIGHTMAN, J.—I am of opinion that a rule ought not to be granted. The question is, whether the road is so made as to make it incumbent on the justices to grant their certificate under sect. 23. It is admitted that a certain part of the road is of the requisite width, that a certain other part is not of the requisite width, and that the remaining part is of the requisite width. It is contended that the two parts of the requisite width constitute two distinct roads, but I am of opinion that it was not competent for the railway company to split the road up into fragments such as these, and to call each a separate highway, for the purpose of obtaining the certificate of the justices and making the roads repairable by the parish.

CROMPTON, J.—I am of the same opinion. It does not appear to be any reason why the justices should grant their certificate, that the parish has assented to the proposed dedication. The Act says that, besides obtaining the assent of the parish, the justices are to give their certificate that the new road is made in a substantial manner and of a certain width, and to their satisfaction. The justices very properly go to look at what the road proposed to be dedicated is, and on a view they raise the objection. It was really asking the justices to treat the two ends of the road as the road. I think the justices were quite right. It would be evading the Act if parties could do this.

HILL and BLACKBURN, JJ. concurred.

Rule refused.

TURNIDGE (appellant) v. SHAW (respondent).

Thames Conservancy Act 1857.

By 30 Geo. 2, c. 21, s. 5, for the preservation of the fishery of the Thames and the Medway within the jurisdiction of the mayor of London as conservator; the mayor's deputy, the water bailiff and his assistants are empowered to enter any boat, &c. and seize spawn, fry, brood of fish, &c.; and by sect. 6 persons obstructing them are liable to a penalty of 10*l*., and by sect. 11 an appeal against convictions is given to the Court of Conservancy.

The Thames Conservancy Act, 20 & 21 Vict. c. cxlvii. s. 52, transferred to the new corporation created by that statute, called the Conservators of the River Thames, the powers, authorities, rights and privileges of the Queen and the corporation of London in relation to the conservancy, and the regulation and preservation of the Thames, and the rivers, streams and watercourses within the flow and reflow of the tides of the said rivers. Sect. 76 imposes a penalty of 5*l*. on persons opposing any officer in the due execution of the Act:

Held, that the powers given to the Mayor of London to appoint persons assistants in exercising the powers given to the water bailiff are powers relating to the conservancy of the Thames, and are consequently transferred to the Conservators of the Thames by the 20 & 21 Vict.:

Held, further, that the penalty of 10*l*. imposed by the 30 Geo. 2, c. 21, s. 6, did not attach to persons obstructing the assistants appointed by the Conservators of the Thames under 20 & 21 Vict.:

Held, further, that the penalty of 5*l*. imposed by 20 & 21 Vict. c. cxlvii. s. 76, did attach to the case of persons obstructing such assistants under the 20 & 21 Vict. when engaged in searching boats for spawn, fry, brood of fish, &c., which duty belongs to the conservancy of the Thames.

CASE.

At a petty session holden at Rochford, Essex, on the 26th Jan. 1860, before three of her Majesty's justices of the peace, an information preferred by Thomas Turnidge, assistant river keeper (the appellant), by direction of the Conservators of the River Thames, against Thomas Shaw, fisherman (the respondent), whereby the said T. Shaw was charged for that he did on the 11th Jan. 1860, at the parish of Leigh, in the said county, obstruct and hinder the said T. Turnidge in the execution of the powers vested in him by the statute in such case made and provided, as an officer of the Thames conservators duly appointed, pursuant to the statute in such case made and provided, whereby and by force of the statute in such case made and provided the said T. Shaw had forfeited the sum of 10*l*., came on to be heard by the said justices, and was by them adjourned to the 26th Feb. then next.

The said information came on to be heard pursuant to such adjournment, and the justices did then and there hear and determine the same, and did dismiss the said information.

The appellant being dissatisfied with the determination of the said information, as being erroneous in point of law, applied to the justices in writing within three days next after such determination, to state and sign a case. Whereupon they stated such case accordingly.

By stat. 30 Geo. 2, c. 21, s. 5, it is enacted that for the better preservation of the fishery of the river Thames and waters of the Medway, within the jurisdiction of the mayor of the city of London, as conservator of the river Thames and waters of Medway, (sect. 1), and for preventing as much as may be any abuses from being committed therein, it shall and may be lawful for the deputy of the said mayor for the time being, as conservator as aforesaid, commonly called the water-bailiff, his assistant and assistants, such assistants having been named and appointed to be assistant and assistants by warrant under the hand and seal of the mayor of the said city for the time being, and likewise for all and every other person or persons, who shall for that purpose be specially authorised by any warrant or warrants under the hand and seal of the said mayor, from time to time, and at all times, to enter into any boat, vessel, or craft, of any fisherman or dredgerman, or other person or persons fishing or taking fish, or endeavouring to take fish upon the said river of Thames, or upon the said waters of Medway, within the jurisdiction aforesaid, and there search for, take and seize all spawn, fry, brood of fish, &c. as shall then be in any such boat or boats, vessel or craft, in or upon the said river or waters, and to take and seize on the shore or shores adjoining to the said river or waters of Medway, within the jurisdiction aforesaid, all such spawn, fry, brood of fish, &c., as shall be there be found.

By sect. 6 of the same statute it is enacted, "that if any person or persons shall obstruct or hinder the said water-bailiff, his assistants, or any of the said officers, or any constable, headborough, or other peace officer, in the execution of any of the powers vested in them by this Act, or of any warrants to be issued by the said mayor, recorder, or any alderman of the said city, or justice respectively, in pursuance of this Act, the person or persons so offending therein shall for every such offence forfeit the sum of 10*l*."

Sect. 11 authorises the levy of penalties by distress. "But in case any such offender shall think himself aggrieved by such conviction, and shall within five days enter into a recognisance before such magistrate or magistrates before whom he shall be so convicted (which said recognisance shall be returned within the space of fourteen days to the said court of the mayor and aldermen), conditioned for his personal appearance at some court of the said mayor and aldermen of the said city, to be holden within six weeks after the acknowledging such recognisance, or at the next court of conservancy to be held for the county in which such offence shall be committed, and to stand to and abide such order as shall be made in the premises by such court, the said court of mayor and aldermen, or court of conservancy, is hereby empowered and directed, upon a petition of appeal presented to them by the party or parties so convicted complaining of such conviction, finally to hear and determine the matter of such appeal, and the said courts respectively are hereby empowered to order any penalties to be mitigated, or to set aside such conviction, or to confirm the same, and award such costs to be paid by the appellant as to them shall seem meet; and the said court of mayor and aldermen, or court of conservancy, may, on forfeiture of any such recognisance, estreat the same."

The Thames Conservancy Act 1857 (20 & 21 Vict. c. 147, local) by sect. 50, vests "all the estate, right, title and interest of the mayor and commonalty of the city of London, and all the estate, right, title and interest of her Majesty in the bed and soil and shores of the Thames, in the conservators appointed under that Act; and by sect. 52 enacts that from and after the commencement of this Act all the powers and authorities, rights and privileges, at any time heretofore given or granted to, or which are now vested in, or which have been or may be exercised by the mayor and commonalty and citizens, or by the mayor and aldermen of the city of London, or by the common council, or by the mayor for the time being of the said city, by prescription, usage, charter, or Act of Parliament, or otherwise, with regard or relation to the conservancy and the preservation or regulation of the river Thames, and of the several rivers, streams and watercourses within the flow and reflow of the tides of the said river and port of London, shall be and the same are hereby vested in the conservators by this Act appointed, to be by them exercised in the same manner, and under and subject to the same restrictions as the same are now respectively legally exercised by her Majesty, or by the mayor and commonalty and citizens, or by the said mayor and aldermen, or by the common council, or by the said mayor, save only and except so far as the same may be modified by or be inconsistent with the provisions herein contained."

Sect. 76 imposes a penalty not exceeding 5*l.* on any person who shall resist or make forcible opposition against any person employed in the due execution of this Act, or shall assault any surveyor, or engineer, or agent, or any collector of toll, in the execution of his office.

Sect. 149 provides for the recovery of penalties before any justice.

Sect. 161 gives an appeal to the court of quarter sessions.

At the hearing of the said information the charge was supported by the Conservators of the River Thames, who appeared by counsel and attorney.

On behalf of the appellant it was proved to our satisfaction that on the 11th Jan. last the appellant went on board the respondent's boats, then lying at Leigh aforesaid, within the limits of the jurisdiction of the Conservators of the River Thames, to examine the shrimps caught by the respondent; that he stated the object of his visit, and produced his appointment; that he saw in the respondent's boat a quantity of small shrimps which he considered "brood;" that he endeavoured to seize them, and that thereupon the respondent assaulted him and prevented the seizure.

The appointment of the appellant under the seal of the Conservators of the River Thames was read as follows:—

"Know all men by these presents that we the Conservators of the River Thames have named and appointed, and by these presents do name and appoint, T. Turnidge, of Leigh, in the county of Essex, to be assistant river-keeper during our pleasure; and we do hereby authorise the said T. Turnidge to enter any boat, vessel, or craft of any fisherman, dredgerman, or other person or persons fishing or taking fish, or endeavouring to take fish upon the said river Thames, within our jurisdiction, and there to search for, take and seize all spawn, fry, brood of fish, spat of oysters and unsizeable, unwholesome, unseasonable fish, and also all unlawful nets, engines, and instruments for taking or destroying fish as shall then be in any such boat or boats, vessel, or craft in or upon the said river, and to take and seize on the shore or shores adjoining to the said river, within the jurisdiction aforesaid, all such spawn, fry, brood of fish, spat of oysters, or unsizeable, unwholesome, or unseasonable fish, and also all unlawful nets, engines, or instruments for taking or destroying fish as shall there be found, and after taking or seizing such unlawful nets, engines, or instruments, or any spawn, fry, brood of fish, spat of oysters, or unsizeable, unwholesome, or unseasonable fish, you the said T. Turnidge are to bring, or cause the same to be brought, before the Mayor of the city of London for the time being, or the recorder of the said city, or one of the said aldermen of the said city (if seized within the limits of the said city of London and the liberties thereof), either upon the said river or on shore, or before the mayor of the said city, or the recorder of the said city, or one of the aldermen of the said city, or one of her Majesty's justices of the peace of the county in which such seizure shall be made (if made upon the said river out of the limits of the said city or liberties thereof, but within our jurisdiction as aforesaid), or before one of her Majesty's justices of the peace of the county in which the same shall be seized on shore, in order that all such unlawful nets, engines, or instruments, as also all such spawn, fry, or unsizeable, unwholesome, or unseasonable fish as shall be seized as aforesaid, may be forthwith burnt or destroyed, and the party from whom the same shall be taken punished according to law, and you are to receive no money, gratuity, or reward whatsoever from any person to prevent, delay, or hinder any prosecution, or compound or wilfully conceal any offence which shall be committed contrary to an Act of Parliament made and passed in the 30th Geo. 2, entitled 'An Act for the more effectual preservation of the spawn and fry of fish, and for the better regulating the fishery thereof,' which shall come to your knowledge, under pain to forfeit and lose 5*l.* for each time you shall be convicted of every such offence, and from time to time to apprise us thereof. Given under our seal this 7th Dec. 1859.

"E. BURSTALL, Secretary."

It was contended by the counsel for the appellant that by force of sects. 50 and 52 of the Thames Conservancy Act 1857, the bed and soil of the river Thames, with the fisheries and all the powers relating thereto, given to the Mayor of London, and the protection extended to his officers by 30 Geo. 2, c. 21, s. 5 and 6, were transferred and extended to the Conservators of the River Thames and their officers.

We doubted the correctness of this view, and dismissed the information, first, because it appeared to us that, assuming the powers of 30 Geo. 2, c. 21, s. 5, to be transferred to the conservators, it must also be held that the jurisdiction on appeal under sect. 11 is likewise vested in them, and the respondent, if convicted, would be without appeal, except to his prosecutors. If, to avoid this, we held that the 30 Geo. 2, c. 21, s. 11 (the appeal clause), was modified by sect. 161 of the Thames Conservancy Act 1857, then we consider we must also hold that the 30 Geo. 2, c. 21, s. 6 (the penal clause), is modified by sect. 76 of the Thames Conservancy Act 1857, and the defendant would be liable to be sued only for the reduced penalty imposed by the latter section.

Secondly, because, although the bed and soil of the river Thames, which were in the Crown, are transferred to the conservators by the 50th section of the

Q. B.]

REG. v. BRADLEY.

Thames Conservancy Act, we doubted whether the fishery, which was common to all (1 Mod. 105), was thereby transferred, and we also doubted whether the powers of the 30 Geo. 2, c. 21 (an Act having exclusive reference to the fishery), were powers with regard or relation to the conservancy, preservation and regulation of the river Thames, and as such vested in the conservators by the 52nd section of the Thames Conservancy Act 1857, all the provisions of which appeared to us to have special reference to the navigation of the river and the regulation of the port of London.

The questions of law arising on the above case for the opinion of the Court of Q. B. are, first, Are the Conservators of the River Thames authorised to appoint officers to exercise the powers given to the water bailiffs of the city of London by the 30 Geo. 2, c. 21, s. 5? Secondly, Are such officers entitled to the protection given by the 6th section of the same statute? Thirdly, Is the jurisdiction on appeal given to the mayor and aldermen by the 11th section of the same Act now vested in the Conservators of the River Thames? Fourthly, Is the 76th section of the Thames Conservancy Act applicable to the offence charged against the respondent, and is the penalty thereby imposed cumulative or substituted?

The Solicitor-General (Pulling and Metcalf with him) for the appellant.—All the powers formerly exercised by the corporation of London in reference to the conservation of the river Thames are now vested in the conservators appointed under the statute the 20 & 21 Vict. c. cxlvii. The word "conservancy" implies the care of the fisheries, and in support of this argument the old statutes, 17 Rich. 2, c. 9, and 4 Hen. 7, c. 15, were referred to; and 30 Geo. 2, c. 21; and 4 Inst. 250. No express mention is made in the recent Act of fisheries, and therefore the statute 30 Geo. 2, c. 21, is still in force as to them, except so far as it is modified by the recent Act.

No one appeared to argue the case on the part of the respondent.

Cur. adv. vult.

Jas. 31.—BLACKBURN, J.—In this case a question of considerable difficulty arises on the construction of the Thames Conservancy Act, 20 & 21 Vict. c. cxlvii., which by sect. 52 transferred to a newly created corporation, called the Conservators of the River Thames, amongst other things, "All the powers and authorities, rights and privileges which might be exercised by the Queen, in right of her crown, or by the mayor and commonalty and citizens of London, by prescription, usage, charter, or Act of Parliament, or otherwise, with regard or relation to the conservancy and the preservation and the regulation of the river Thames," to be by them exercised in the same manner, and under and subject to the same restrictions as the same are now respectively legally exercised by her Majesty, or by the mayor, &c., save only and except so far as the same may be modified by or be inconsistent with the provisions contained in the Act. Amongst the powers of the City of London was that of holding a court for the conservation of the water and river of the Thames; and it is said in the 4th Institute, that the mayor of London for the time being hath the conservation and rule of the water and river of the Thames, &c., and authority touching permission for using unlawful nets and other unlawful engines in fishing, and to all correction and punishment there concerning unlawful nets and engines there: (4 Inst. 270.) By stat. 30 Geo. 2, c. 21, s. 5, for the better protection of the fishery, it is enacted that it shall be lawful "for the deputy of the said mayor for the time being, as conservator as aforesaid, commonly called the water-bailiff" and his assistants appointed by warrant under the hand and seal of the mayor, to enter fishing-boats and seize brood of fish found there. Since the passing of the Thames Conservancy Act, the appellant has been appointed assistant river keeper by warrant under the seal of the Conservator of the Thames, and (as far as it can empower him), authorised to exercise the power conferred by the 30 Geo. 2, c. 21, s. 5, on the assistants of the deputy of the Lord Mayor as conservator. The first question asked us is, whether the new corporation were authorised to make such an appointment? There is certainly nothing in the provisions of the Thames Conservancy Act to show that the Legislature had their attention called to the fisheries; but there is nothing to be found restricting the very general language used in the 52nd section, and it seems to us that the powers given to the Mayor of London to appoint persons assistants in exercising the powers given to the water-bailiff as deputy of the mayor as conservator, are powers relating to the conservancy of the Thames, and are consequently transferred to the Conservator of the Thames. The next question is one of much more difficulty. The 6th section of 30 Geo. 2, c. 21, imposes a penalty of 10*l.* on any person obstructing the said water-bailiff or his assistants in the execution of that Act; and by sect. 11 there is an appeal given to the Court of Conservancy. The respondent in the present case had forcibly resisted the appellant in the execution of his duty as an assistant-keeper appointed by the Conservator of the Thames, but exercising the powers originally conferred by the 30 Geo. 2 on the water-bailiff and his assistants, appointed by the mayor. He was summoned before the justices, who refused to impose on him the penalty of 10*l.* under sect. 6 of the 30 Geo. 2, c. 21; and we think the justices were right. The officer appointed by the Conservator of the Thames has, as we think, all the powers and authorities, rights and privileges of the former officer appointed by the mayor, as conservator; and any one obstructing him must take the consequences which at common law would follow from obstructing a person having lawful authority. But it seems to us that the penalties under the common law, which were imposed on those who obstructed the former officers, cannot be extended by mere implication to those obstructing the new officers. In fact, it seems very plain that the question as to what was done with regard to the fisheries was not present to the minds of those who framed the Act, who very naturally thought only of the navigation and conservancy of the Thames, and there are no words in the Thames Conservancy Act that have the slightest tendency to express such an intention. If the Legislature had meant the penal clause to extend to the new officers they would certainly have made some provision as to the appeal which is now made inoperative. It requires something to show that the Legislature intended so to extend them. But we think that the officer employed in exercising the powers originally conferred by the 30 Geo. 2, but which he puts in execution only by virtue of the Thames Conservancy Act, in a person employed in the due execution of that latter Act within the meaning of sect. 76 of that Act, and consequently that the justices had jurisdiction in such a case to impose the penalty of 5*l.* under that Act, subject to the appeal given to the court of quarter sessions. What we have above written disposes of all the questions put to us, and with that expression of our opinion the case should go back to the justices.

REG. v. BRADLEY.

Municipal corporation — Election of aldermen — Voting papers — Form of.

In the voting papers of the councillors for the election of aldermen of a municipal corporation, it is a sufficient compliance with the 7 Will. 4 & 1 Vict. c. 78, s. 14, if the Christian name of the candidate for whom the councillors vote be written with a known and understood contraction thereof. The mere initial letter of the christian name is not sufficient. If the place of abode of the candidate be omitted, the vote is vitiated.

If at the trial of a quo warranto information against a person for exercising a municipal office, issued on the ground that he had not a majority of good votes, it is intended to set up more than one of the defeated candidates as the person who ought to have been declared elected, the whole matter should be opened by the prosecutor in the first instance to the jury.

Information in the nature of a quo warranto, calling upon the defendant to show by what authority he exercised the office of an alderman of the borough of Sheffield. The issue raised was that the defendant was not duly elected.

At the trial at the last spring assizes, before Martin, B., at York, it appeared that on the 9th Nov. 1859 the town council of the borough of Sheffield proceeded to elect seven aldermen in the place of the seven who were retiring from office; that at the close of the poll the mayor declared six persons who had the greatest number of votes duly elected, and the validity of their election was not disputed. The next two candidates highest on the poll were the defendant and a person named Carr, who had each nineteen votes, whereupon the mayor gave the casting vote to the defendant, and declared him duly elected. The affirmative of this issue lying on the defendant, his counsel made out a prima facie case by showing that he was declared by the mayor at the election to have been duly elected, whereupon the prosecutor's counsel proceeded to impeach the election, and he produced the voting papers on behalf of the defendant, and took exception to the mode in which the name of the defendant William Bradley and his address were described in the voting papers of the six following persons:—

Brittan	No place of abode
Elliott	No place of abode
Eyre	W. Bradley
Staniforth	Wm. Bradley
Unwin	Wm. Bradley

The counsel for the defendant then proceeded to object to three of Carr's votes:

Name of candidate for whom he voted.

Cammell	No place of abode

The 7 Will. 4 & 1 Vict. c. 78, s. 14, enacts that the election of aldermen by the council shall be in the following manner; that is to say, every member of the council entitled to vote in that election may vote for any number of persons not exceeding the number of aldermen then to be chosen, by personally delivering at such meeting to the mayor or chairman of the meeting, a voting paper containing the Christian name and surname of the persons for whom he votes, with their respective places of abode and description, such paper being previously signed with the name of the member of council voting; and the mayor or chairman of the meeting, as soon as all the voting papers have been delivered to him, shall openly produce and read the same, and immediately afterwards deliver them to the town-clerk to be kept among the records of the borough, and in case of equality of votes among those entitled to vote, the mayor or chairman shall have a casting vote, whether or not he may be entitled to vote in the first instance.

The learned judge overruled the objections, and the verdict was entered for the defendant, with leave reserved to the prosecutor to move.

A rule nisi having been obtained for a new trial, on the ground of misdirection on the above ruling, Manisty showed cause.—No doubt it has been held in this court that the 7 Will. 4 & 1 Vict. c. 78, s. 14, is obligatory, and until overruled that decision must be held binding, and it must be considered law that the voting papers must contain the Christian name and surname of the party for whom the voter votes, and his place of abode and description. It is admitted, therefore, that two of the defendant's votes, Brittan's and Elliott's, are bad, as they omit the place of abode. The next vote is Eyre's, and the objection is, that there is no Christian name. The letter is "W.," with a mark over it, which the defendant contends stands for "m." R. v. Hartlepool, 21 L. J. 71, Q.B., is an authority to show that the initial letter of a Christian name is sufficient.

WIGHTMAN, J.—This case is distinguishable from Reg. v. Deighton, 5 Q. B. 896. There no place of abode was given; but here you do not altogether omit the Christian name, but you contract it. Here it is like "Wr."

Manisty.—It could not mislead; it is only a badly-written "Wm."

HILL, J.—The question is, does this contain the Christian name?

Manisty.—It does. It must be taken that the jury thought it was Wm. If it was a case of bad writing, it was for the jury. If it was unintelligible to ordinary persons, it would have been bad.

HILL, J.—But would a stranger read it William?

Manisty.—I think so, from its mode of junction with the letter B.

WIGHTMAN, J.—It looks more like Walter. The difficulty is that it looks like Wr.

Manisty.—Then the court hold that it is worse than though it was only W.?

WIGHTMAN, J.—Yes, that is so.

Manisty.—Then we have three bad votes; but we say that Staniforth's, Jones' and Unwin's are good, being Wm. and Willm.

WIGHTMAN, J.—Yes; those would seem to be good.

Manisty.—Then there are three bad votes on the other side. The voting papers for Carr were handed to the jury, and they said one was "Curr," and that the other was written "Cam," and the third had no place of abode. If the other side destroyed three of Bradley's votes, I have destroyed three of Carr's. There is a second objection. They say they ought to have been allowed, when their votes were reduced, to have been at liberty to have shown that Bradley was below Holland. When I had impeached the votes of the other side, I said it ought then to end, and so the judge thought.

CROMPTON, J.—They impeached a number of votes, and there they ended. That would seem to be final.

Overend.—I said, after they had impeached my votes, that Holland, who had seventeen votes, was in a majority over Bradley.

CROMPTON, J.—Then you opened a new case. You didn't offer fresh evidence to impeach Bradley.

Overend.—We said there was another who had more good votes than Bradley—namely Holland.

Manisty.—That was never opened. But the judge said, as you did not go into that in the first instance, you must not go into it now. Besides, two of Holland's votes have no place of abode.

CROMPTON, J.—It was not a surprise, it was a distinct defence, which should have been opened. You should have said, "Carr is above Bradley, and if not, Holland is above him." This additional case does not arise out of the case on the other side.

Overend.—Holland and Atkinson had each seventeen. We said Bradley was badly elected. He was badly elected with reference to Holland.

HILL, J.—When you impeached Bradley you ought to have shown the votes of both Carr and Holland.

Q. B.]

REG. v. PERRY.

[Q. B.]

You could not be entitled, after not succeeding with Carr, to say, "I will now go and set up Holland."

Overend.—I relied upon defeating Bradley with Carr. I opened that Bradley was badly elected as regarded several others. It was a case of convenience, like a scrutiny in the House of Commons.

CROMPTON, J.—But it was not such a scrutiny. If that course had been agreed to, it might have been so.

Overend.—Then I must have gone into each case of seventeen votes.

CROMPTON, J. — You need merely have shown that they were seventeen on the poll. That would have put the other side to have shown that the votes were bad.

Manisty.—Just so. They had all the voting papers there, and only selected six or seven.

CROMPTON, J.—This arises upon your own case.

Overend.—Not till Carr's votes were disposed of, for he had nineteen votes and the others only seventeen. I need not have troubled myself about others.

CROMPTON, J.—By striking off three votes you set up all who had seventeen; but that arises from your own evidence.

Overend.—However, it is now contended Bradley had six bad votes. The question is, what is a signature of the Christian name? The condition of voting is that he must give a voting paper with the Christian and surnames. (He referred to the judgment in Reg. v. Avery, 21 L. J. 428, Q. B.) There are cases, however, in which initials will do: but where the Legislature says he must write the Christian name, it is trifling with words to say that initials will be sufficient. Wm. may mean Wyndham, Wilbraham and others.

HILL, J.—Have you ever known Wilbraham written Wm.?

Overend.—I cannot say I have.

HILL, J.—Does the Christian name require anything more than to be written so as to be commonly known?

Overend.—Wm. means any name which begins with a W. and ends with an m. He referred to 15 M. & W. 283, and Nash v. Calder, 5 C. B. 178, to show that W. cannot be a name of baptism. The reason for strictness is that an alderman is in for six years.

CROMPTON, J.—The less you say about the reason of the thing the better. The reason seems to be the other way when all the voters are present, and here the mayor read out the names.

Overend referred to Allen v. Greensill, 4 C. B. 100. It was not intended that an abbreviation of the Christian name should suffice, but that there should be the Christian name itself. It is not he shall "sign his name," in which case it would be sufficient. But here the Christian name is not given, therefore all the six votes are bad. Wm. is as bad as W.: (3 Bing. 296; 1 Dow. & Ry. 150.)

CROMPTON, J.—There is a well-known contraction of William. Suppose a cockney was to write it "Villiam," would that vitiate the vote?

WIGHTMAN, J.—I am opinion that, as to three of the votes for Bradley, which have been objected to by the prosecutor, the objection cannot be sustained, viz., as to the three votes in which the Christian name is written with a contraction, and not merely with the initial letter. Now, if these contractions are well known and understood as contractions of the Christian name "William," it is quite consistent with the intention of the Legislature, if we hold that they are sufficient for the purposes of the Act, and that it is not necessary to write the Christian name in the voting papers at full length. It certainly appears to me that "Wm." and "Willm." are sufficient to indicate the Christian name "William," and that the three votes to which this objection applies are good. But the mere initial "W." may so far tend to mislead for another name that I think the vote to which this applies is bad; and the votes in which no place of abode was mentioned are bad also, so that there are three of Bradley's votes bad. But then there are three of Carr's votes bad also; which leaves the parties in an equal position and Bradley has the casting vote. Then as to the setting up of Holland's claim, who is alleged to have a majority of one over Bradley. On looking at two of Holland's voting papers I find that they are open to the same objection, of having no place of abode mentioned, and this would reduce Holland's votes to fifteen. It would be idle therefore to grant a new trial as to this case, as no good could result from it. Then Mr. Overend contends that he has a right to insist on the claims of other candidates, who were higher than Mr. Bradley, but it does not appear that there was any definite proposal made by him to go into the other cases at the trial. It seems to me, therefore, that as far as Holland's case is concerned, which was the only case pressed on the judge's attention at the trial, it would be useless to go to a trial, because he has equally objectionable votes, which would reduce his good votes below both Carr's and Bradley's. The rule must therefore be discharged.

CROMPTON, J.—I am of the same opinion. The statute requires that the voting papers should contain the Christian and surnames of the party. It has been held that this is to be treated as imperative; and that decision is not to be impeached in this court. I think that means that there shall be something in writing to show everybody what the Christian name of the party is. A contraction does not prevent them from knowing that. A single initial letter might stand for several names, but "Win." and "Willm." are contractions which are known ordinarily to mean "William." A misspelling of the Christian name would not vitiate the vote. In my opinion the judge at the trial acted rightly in rejecting the evidence as to the claims of the other candidates. The prosecutor if he had intended, to rely on them, ought to have put in all the poll in the first instance. It was really an attempt to set up a new case in answer to that made by the other side.

HILL, J.—I am of the same opinion. I think that although the initial letter of the name is not sufficient, yet a known contraction of a Christian name which could not be mistaken, is the Christian name within the meaning of the statute, just as much as if it had been written at full length. As to the other point, I think that it was a matter for the discretion of the judge at the trial. The prosecutor ought in the first instance to have gone into the whole case, and if he declined to do that, then it was a matter for the discretion of the judge as to whether or not he would allow Holland's case to be set up. If he had exercised an unwise discretion we might have corrected it and granted a new trial, if the ends of justice required it; but in this case that is not so, for the voting papers show that a new trial is not required.

Rule discharged.

REG. v. PERRY.

New Parish Acts—Appointment of churchwardens— 1 & 2 Will. 4, c. 38, s. 16—6 & 7 Will. 4, c. 85, s. 38—6 & 7 Vict. c. 37, ss. 15, 17—19 & 20 Vict. c. 104, ss. 11, 14.

A new district church was built and endowed, and had a district assigned to it, and a fund provided for repairs, under 1 & 2 Will. 4, c. 38; in 1840 the bishop, under the provisions of the 6 & 7 W. 4, c. 85, granted his licence and authority for the publication of banns and solemnisation of marriages there, and for taking the usual fees, to which the fees for christenings, baptisms and burials were afterwards added. This licence is revocable by the 32nd section of the Act. The 16th section of 1 & 2 Will. 4, c. 38, provides for the appointment of two churchwardens, one to be chosen by the incumbent, the other by the pew-renters. The 19 & 20 Vict. c. 104, s. 14, provides that when banns of matrimony, marriages, &c., are authorised to be published and performed in any church or chapel to which a district shall belong, such district or place shall become and be a separate and distinct parish for ecclesiastical purposes, such as contemplated by the 15th section of 6 & 7 Vict. c. 37, and all the provisions of that Act relative to new parishes shall apply; and the 17th section of the last-mentioned Act provides that one churchwarden shall be elected by the incumbent and the other by the inhabitants:

Held, that the authority contemplated by the 14th section of the 19 & 20 Vict. c. 104 was not a revocable licence by the bishop, but an irrevocable authority under an order of the commissioners under the 11th section of the Act, and that the church in question was therefore not one in which banns of matrimony, marriages, &c., were authorised to be published and performed within the 14th section of 19 & 20 Vict. c. 104, and therefore the appointment of churchwardens remained in the incumbent and pew-renters.

This was a mandamus directed to Frederick Perry, clerk, minister and incumbent of the church or parish of Christchurch, Rotherhithe, in the county of Surrey. It recited that the parish of St. Mary, Rotherhithe, is an ancient parish, and the church thereof a rectory within the diocese and subject to the jurisdiction of the Bishop of Winchester; that in the year 1839 the population of the same parish then amounting to more than 2000 persons, and the existing churches and chapels within the same parish not affording accommodation for more than one-third of the inhabitants thereof for the attendance upon Divine service, according to the rites of the United Church of England and Ireland, a certain additional church called and known by the name of Christchurch (the site whereof had been duly conveyed to the commissioners for building new churches), was erected within the said parish, under and by virtue of the provisions contained in the statute 1 & 2 Will. 4, entitled "An Act to amend and render more effectual an Act passed in the seventh and eighth years of the reign of his late Majesty, entitled 'An Act to amend the Acts for building and promoting the building of additional churches in populous parishes,'" and which said additional church was afterwards, that is to say, on or about the 26th June 1839, duly consecrated by Charles Richard Lord Bishop of Winchester for the performance of Divine service according to the rites of the said United Church of England and Ireland, the same having been theretofore endowed with a sum of 1000*l.* secured upon money in the funds, in addition to the pew rents and profits intended to be taken and to arise from the same church, and a fund having also been provided for the repairs of the said church to the amount and in the manner required by the said statute, and one-third at least of the sittings in the said church having been also set apart and appropriated as free sittings according to the said statute, that afterwards, that is to say, on the 7th April 1840, the said Lord Bishop of Winchester, under and by virtue of the said statute, by a certain indenture by him duly executed under his hand and seal, assigned a separate and distinct district to the said church called Christchurch and caused a description of the boundaries of the said district so assigned to be registered in the episcopal registry of his diocese, such district then forming part of the said parish of St. Mary, Rotherhithe; and in and by the said indenture the said bishop, under and by virtue of the statute of the 6 & 7 Will. 4, entitled, "An Act for marriages in England," and with the consent of the patrons and the rector or incumbent of the said church or rectory of the said parish of St. Mary,

Rotherhithe, then duly testified under their respective hands and seals, granted his licence and authority for the publication of banns of matrimony and the solemnisation of marriages in the said church called Christchurch by the minister or incumbent thereof for the time being, of persons residing within the district so assigned to the same church as aforesaid, and he also and with the like consent ordered and directed that all such accustomed fees, dues and other emoluments as would have been otherwise paid or payable for or in respect of such banns and marriages to the said rector or incumbent of the said rectory and church of St. Mary, Rotherhithe, aforesaid, should thenceforth be paid and payable to the minister or incumbent of the said church called Christchurch; and the bishop also then caused his said order and direction as to the several offices to be performed in the said church called Christchurch as aforesaid to be registered in the said episcopal registry of the said diocese; that by a certain indenture dated the 6th April 1840, and then made by and between the Rev. Edward Blick, clerk, then being the rector or incumbent of the said rectory or church of St. Mary, Rotherhithe, of the first part, the said Lord Bishop of Winchester of the second part; the Master, Fellows and Scholars of Clare-hall in the University of Cambridge, the patrons of the said rectory or church of St. Mary, Rotherhithe, of the third part, and the Rev. John Saunders, then being the minister and incumbent of the said church called Christchurch, of the fourth part, and duly executed by the said parties respectively under their respective hands and seals, reciting amongst other things that the said church called Christchurch had been so erected, and that a district had been so assigned to it as aforesaid, but that the same church was not intended to become, under or by virtue of the statute passed in the 58th year of the reign of King George 3, for building and promoting the building of additional churches in populous parishes, the parish church of a district parish, the said Edward Blick, under and by virtue of the said statute so made in the Parliament holden in the said first and second years of the reign of King William 4, as aforesaid, and by virtue of any other statutes, or of any other powers by which it was competent for him so to do, and, with the consent of the said bishop and of the said master, fellows and scholars of Clare-hall respectively, granted and declared that one equal fourth part of all such Easter offerings and oblations as should from time to time become due or payable, or, but for the same indenture, would become due or payable to or for the benefit of the rector or incumbent of the said rectory or church of St. Mary, Rotherhithe, and also that all fees, dues and emoluments for or in respect of the churchings, baptisms, marriages and burials as had been theretofore due to or received by the said Edward Blick as such rector or incumbent as aforesaid, and should from time to time thereafter become due or payable from or by any person or persons whomsoever for or in respect of any services, ceremonies, or duties performed in the said church called Christchurch, or in any burial-ground belonging thereunto, should be for ever thereafter annexed to the said church called Christchurch, and should from time to time thereafter be receivable and received by or on behalf of and for the sole and exclusive use and benefit of the minister and incumbent for the time being of the same church; and the said fees, dues, offerings and emoluments respectively were by the said bishop, in and by the said indenture, duly assigned to the said minister and incumbent of the said church called Christchurch, who, under and by virtue of the said indenture and the statute aforesaid, then became and was entitled to the same for his own sole and exclusive use and benefit, without any reservation thereout; and every such minister and incumbent hath ever since, and is hereby so entitled to the same; which said indenture was duly registered in the episcopal registry of the said bishop. That by means of the several premises aforesaid, the said church called Christchurch, before and at the time of the passing of the Act of Parliament made and passed in the nineteenth and twentieth years of her present Majesty, c. 101, entitled "An Act to extend the provisions of an Act of the sixth and seventh years of her Majesty, for making better provision for the spiritual care of populous parishes, and further to provide for the formation and endowment of separate and distinct parishes," had become and was within the meaning of the said Act, a consecrated church to which a district belonged, and wherein banns of matrimony and the solemnisation of marriages, churchings and baptisms, according to the laws and canons in force in this realm, were authorised to be published and performed (the district aforesaid not being, at the time of the passing of the same Act, a separate and distinct parish for ecclesiastical purposes), and the incumbent of which, by such authority, entitled for his own benefit to the entire fees arising from the performance of such offices without any reservation thereout, and whereby and by means of the said last-mentioned Act, immediately after the passing thereof, the said district became and was, and now is, a separate and distinct parish for ecclesiastical purposes, as is contemplated in the 15th section of the statute made in the sixth and seventh years of the reign of her present Majesty, entitled, "An Act to make better provision for the spiritual care of populous parishes;" and the said church called Christchurch, being the church of the said district, then became and was, and now is, the church of such parish; that all and singular the provisions of the said last-mentioned statute (as then amended) relative to new parishes on their becoming such, and to the matters and things consequent thereon, became and were, and now are, under and by virtue of the said Act of the nineteenth and twentieth years of the reign of her present Majesty, extended and made applicable to the new parish of Christchurch, and by reason thereof two fit and proper persons duly qualified in that behalf, as required by the said statute so made in the sixth and seventh years of the reign of her present Majesty, ought in every year to be chosen churchwardens of the same parish, one being chosen by the minister and incumbent of the same parish and the other by the inhabitants residing therein, and having a similar qualification to that which would entitle inhabitants to vote at the election of churchwardens for the said parish of St. Mary, Rotherhithe, and such election ought to take place at the usual period of appointing parish officers, at a meeting summoned in such manner as the minister and incumbent of such parish of Christchurch shall direct. That although one churchwarden for the said parish of Christchurch, Rotherhithe, has been duly chosen by the said Frederick Perry, being the minister and incumbent of the same parish as aforesaid, nevertheless no other churchwarden for the same parish has been chosen by the inhabitants residing therein, and having the qualification aforesaid, and that no meeting of such inhabitants for the purpose of choosing such churchwarden has been duly summoned by the said Frederick Perry as such minister and incumbent as aforesaid according to the said statutes, but that on the contrary thereof the said Frederick Perry, though requested as such minister and incumbent as aforesaid by divers of the said inhabitants to convene and hold such a meeting of the said inhabitants so qualified to vote as aforesaid for the purpose of choosing such other churchwarden according to the said statutes in that behalf, has wholly neglected and refused, and still does neglect and refuse so to do, whereby the said parish of Christchurch, Rotherhithe, has been and is wrongfully deprived of the benefit of having such other church-warden, and the inhabitants of the said parish have been and are prevented from choosing a fit and proper person to fill the said office of churchwarden, although the usual period of appointing parish officers and a proper time for so choosing such as aforesaid to fill the said office of churchwardens has long since elapsed, to the great prejudice and injury of the said parish and of the said inhabitants thereof. The writ then commanded the said Frederick Perry, being such minister and incumbent as aforesaid, to convene and hold a proper meeting of the inhabitants of the said parish of Christchurch, Rotherhithe, duly qualified according to law as aforesaid to vote at the election of churchwardens for the said parish for the purpose of electing a fit and proper person to serve the office of churchwarden for the said parish of Christchurch, Rotherhithe, for the current year, or such part thereof as may remain unexpired, so that such person may be then and there duly elected to serve the said office according to the laws and statutes in that behalf made and provided, or that he show cause to the contrary thereof.

To this writ the said F. Perry duly made his return, which stated that the said church called Christchurch had not at the time of the passing of the said Act passed in the Parliament holden in the nineteenth and twentieth years of the reign of her present Majesty in the said writ mentioned, become, nor was it within the meaning of the said Act, a consecrated church to which a district belonged, and wherein banns of matrimony and solemnisation of marriages, churchings and baptisms according to the laws and canons in force in this realm, were authorised to be published and performed, or the incumbent of which was by such authority entitled for his own benefit to the entire fees arising from the performance of such without any reservation thereout. That the said district did not by means of the said last-mentioned Act of Parliament become a separate and distinct parish for ecclesiastical purposes, such as is contemplated in the 15th section of the statute made in the sixth and seventh years of the reign of her present Majesty in the said writ mentioned. That before and at the time of the passing of the said Act of Parliament made in the nineteenth and twentieth years of the reign of her present Majesty, the said district of Christchurch had and enjoyed, and now has and enjoys, the special right and privilege that the churchwardens for the church or chapel of Christchurch should and shall, at the usual period of appointing parish officers in every year, be chosen one by the incumbent of the said church or chapel for the time being, and the other by the renters of pews in such church or chapel, and that such special right, privilege and liability was not, nor is the same taken away, altered, or in anywise affected by the said last-mentioned Act, but still exist in full force and effect, and that on the 12th April 1860, being the usual period of appointing parish officers, two churchwardens were duly chosen in such manner as aforesaid, one by the said Fredk. Perry, and the other by the pew-renters of the said chapel or church of Christchurch, to act as churchwardens for the same for the then current year which is not elapsed, and that they have since then acted and now act as such churchwardens as aforesaid, under such special right, privilege and liability as aforesaid.

To this return the prosecutors demurred.

The prosecutors' points were:—First, that the return made to the writ is wholly insufficient, as it shows no compliance with the writ, nor any valid excuse or reason for noncompliance; secondly, that the return, while it admits the facts set forth in the writ whereby the district of Christchurch, Rotherhithe, became a separate parish for ecclesiastical purposes under the statute 19 & 20 Vict. c. 104, ss. 14 and 15 by merely denying that it did so become such separate parish, traverses a conclusion of law necessarily resulting from the facts so admitted, without showing any other facts which obviate or even qualify that conclusion; thirdly, that the alleged right of the renters of pews in the church of Christchurch to choose a churchwarden, as stated in the said return, is not a "special right, privilege, or liability" of the said parish or district of Christchurch, within the meaning of the 29th section of the said statute, and if such right existed at the time of the passing of the said statute, it has wholly ceased to exist ever since the said statute was passed, being utterly inconsistent not only with the letter, but also with the spirit and object of the said statute; fourthly, that the return is inconsistent and repugnant, inasmuch as it admits facts which show a public right vested in the general body of the parishioners, but alleges a supposed private right vested in a few individuals who are not even shown to be and may not be parishioners at all, incompatible with such public right; fifthly, that the return is further inconsistent and insufficient, inasmuch as it admits facts which show a right, vested in the parishioners by the rules of the common law, as well as by the said statute of the 19 & 20 Vict. c. 104, but alleges no legal custom or usage which controls or affects that right, nor explains by reference to any rule of the common law, or to any canon, or to any statute, the existence or origin of any supposed "special right, privilege, or liability" on which reliance is placed as an answer to the writ.

The defendant's points were:—First, that if the writ is to be understood to allege the matters traversed by the return as conclusions of law, the writ is insufficient, inasmuch as no such conclusions of law result from the other matters to afford any ground for the defendant's complying with the requisition of the writ; secondly, that if the writ is to be understood to allege the matters traversed by the return by way of substantive allegations of fact, the writ is sufficiently answered by the traverse; thirdly, that on either of these suppositions the return is sufficient in law; fourthly, that the return shows a special ground of exemption within the meaning of statute 19 & 20 Vict. c. 104; fifthly, that the record shows other valid reasons for the defendant's not complying with the requisition of the writ.

Badeley (Hawkins, Q.C. with him) for the prosecutors.—The question here arising is, are the pew-renters entitled to elect churchwardens, or the parishioners at large, as provided by the common law and by statute? It is not the right or privilege of a parish, district, or place which is here claimed, this right might be confined to a few, who need not necessarily be inhabitants, but even if it were such a right it is not one protected by the 29th section, for here there is other provision made. But without that the right and incidents of a parish became incident to this parish as soon as it was created. It was clearly the intention of the Legislature that the two Acts should be read together, and their scope and spirit show that it was intended whenever a new parish was formed that the election should be with the parishioners and not in pew-renters: (1 & 2 Will. 4, c. 38, s. 16; 6 & 7 Will. 4, c. 84; 6 & 7 Vict. c. 37, ss. 15, 16, 17; and 19 & 20 Vict. c. 104, ss. 14, 15, 29, were referred to.) This is not a chapel authorised to celebrate marriages, &c., in the sense of the 14th section of the 19 & 20 Vict. The word "authorised" has a particular statutable meaning. [CROMPTON, J.—But you must deny it in its general meaning.] It is denied. When the 19 & 20 Vict. was passed this was a chapel wherein marriages might be performed. Then is it a separate parish? If it is the appointment fails.

Dr. Phillimore (F. Ellis with him) contra.—The churchwardens were chosen under 1 & 2 Will. 4, c. 84, s. 10. This is not a district chapel, it is a district simpliciter. It is not a chapel authorised under the 14th section of 19 & 20 Vict. c. 104. The authority contended for by the prosecutors is only a revocable licence; that referred to in the Act is that which is mentioned in 6 & 7 Vict. c. 37, s. 9. The authority of the ecclesiastical commissioners, by order of council, that is the authority referred to in all these instances. The Act refers to a permanent authority, and not to a revocable licence, and that not a licence to the chapel but a personal licence to the minister. This chapel has never been so authorised: (1 & 2 Will. c. 84, s. 4, 10; 19 & 20 Vict. c. 104, ss. 2, 9, 11, 14; 6 & 7 Vict. c. 37; 6 & 7 Vict. c. 85, s. 26.)

Badeley.—The incumbent was authorised to perform marriages in this place, and even if revocable it had never been revoked, and that is within the words of the Act, and the mandamus so recites.

Cur. adv. vult.

Feb. 12.—WIGHTMAN, J.—We are of opinion that the defendant is entitled to our judgment upon this demurrer. It is clear that unless the district of Christchurch has become a separate and distinct parish for ecclesiastical purposes, by virtue of the provisions of the 19 & 20 Vict. c. 104, the mandamus cannot be supported, and we think that the district of Christchurch had not at the time of passing that Act the requirements necessary to convert it into a parish of itself by virtue of that statute. The new church called Christchurch was built and endowed, and had a district assigned to it, and a fund provided for the repairs of the church, in the years 1839 and 1840, under the provisions of the 1 & 2 Will. 4, c. 38, and in 1840 the bishop, under the provisions of the 6 & 7 Will. 4, c. 85, granted his licence and authority for the publication of banns and solemnisation of marriages in the new church called Christchurch, and for taking the same fees in respect thereof as were taken in the mother church by the minister or incumbent thereof for the time being, to which the fees for christenings, baptisms and burials were afterwards added. The bishop's licence may, however, as expressly enacted by the 32nd section of the last-mentioned Act, be revoked by the bishop with the consent of the archbishop, and by the proviso at the end of the 26th section of the same Act, marriages could only be solemnised in the new district church until the licence should be revoked. By the 16th section of 1 & 2 Will. 4, c. 38, under which the new district church, called Christchurch, was built and endowed, two churchwardens are to be chosen, one by the incumbent of the new church, and the other by the renters of pews in the church. The church and district of Christchurch having been thus created under the provisions of 1 & 2 Will. 4, and publication of banns and the solemnisation of marriages having been authorised by the bishop, under the 6 & 7 Will. 4, as before mentioned, things remained in the same state, the renters of pews choosing one of the churchwardens, until the present question was raised; and it was said that immediately upon the passing of the 19 & 20 Vict. c. 104, the district of Christchurch became a separate and distinct parish by the force and operation of the 19 & 20 Vict. c. 104, sect. 14, by which it is enacted that wheresoever, or as soon as, banns of matrimony, and the solemnisation of marriages, churchings and baptisms, according to the laws and canons in force in this realm, are authorised to be published and performed in any consecrated church or chapel to which a district shall belong (such district not being at the time of the passing of that Act a separate and distinct parish for ecclesiastical purposes, and the incumbent of which is by such authority entitled, for his own benefit, to the entire fees arising from the performance of such offices, without any reservation thereof), such district or place should become and be a separate and distinct parish for ecclesiastical purposes, such as contemplated by the 15th section of the 6 & 7 Vict. c. 37, and all the provisions of that Act relative to new parishes, upon their becoming such, should apply to the said parish as if it had become a new parish under the 6 & 7 Vict. c. 37. By the 17th section of the last-mentioned Act, one of the churchwardens of the new parish is to be elected by the incumbent and the other by the inhabitants. It was said for the prosecution that the bishop having authorised the publication of banns and the solemnisation of matrimony in the new church called Christchurch, the condition required by the 14th section of the 19 & 20 Vict. c. 104, was fulfilled, and that the district became a distinct parish immediately upon the passing of that Act. We are, however, of opinion that the authority contemplated and intended by that section of the Act was not a revocable licence by the bishop, but an authority under an order of the commissioners under the 11th section of the Act, which expressly empowers the commissioners, if they think fit, to authorise the publication of banns and the solemnisation of matrimony and baptisms, churching and burials, and all the fees payable for such offices to be paid to the incumbent of the district. This authority, if it had been granted by the order of the commissioners, would be of a permanent and irrevocable character, but it has not been granted, and we are of opinion that the revocable authority or licence of the bishop is not enough to bring this district within the 14th section of the 19 & 20 Vict. c. 104. We may observe that the 15th section of the 6 & 7 Vict. c. 37, does not appear to us to be applicable to this case, of a district not constituted under that Act, but under the 1 & 2 Will. 4, c. 38, with a licence by the bishop under the 6 & 7 Will. 4, c. 85. Upon the ground, therefore, that the new church called Christchurch was not one in which banns of matrimony and the solemnisation of marriages, churchings and baptisms, were authorised to be published and performed within the meaning of the 14th section of the 19 & 20 Vict. c. 104, we think that the mandamus cannot be maintained, and that the defendant is entitled to succeed upon this demurrer. Another point arose upon the effect to be given to the 29th section of the Act, upon which we do not think it necessary to give any opinion, as upon the other ground we think there should be judgment for the defendant, with costs. Judgment for defendant with costs.

APPEAL FROM A DECISION OF THE QUEEN'S BENCH.
Nov. 27 and 28, and Jan. 12.

(Before MARTIN, B., WILLES, J., CHANNELL, B., KEATING, J. and WILDE, B.)

REG. on the prosecution of DIMSDALE v. THE SADDLERS' COMPANY.

Corporation—City company—Charter—Assistant—Mandamus to restore—Admission—Misrepresentation—Insolvency—Notice of removal—Validity of removal—Bye-law—Validity of—Construction.

*Mandamus to the Saddlers' Company to restore the prosecutor to the office of assistant of the company.
The writ recited the charter incorporating the company, which (amongst other things) gave power to appoint assistants by election and admission, to remove them for ill-conduct, and to make bye-laws.
The defts. returned that the charter was not fully or correctly set forth in the writ, and that it contained a provision that elections of assistants contrary to its provisions should be void; that the prosecutor was not duly qualified or elected an assistant;
that he had ill-conducted himself and was not entitled to hold office; that the company had considerable property; and that according to the usual course an* assistant would be called upon to hold the office of renter-warden and other offices of greater trust; that a bye-law had been passed pursuant to the powers given by the charter, by which it was resolved, "That no person who has been a bankrupt or become insolvent, shall hereafter be admitted a member of the court of assistants, unless it be proved to the satisfaction of the court that such person, after the bankruptcy or insolvency, has paid and satisfied his creditors the whole of his debts, or shall have established a fair and honourable character for seven years subsequent to such his bankruptcy or insolvency, to the satisfaction of the court;" that the prosecutor procured his election and admittance by fraudulently representing himself solvent, whereas he was in fact insolvent and a bankrupt, and that thereupon at a meeting of the court duly convened he was removed.

*Pleas:—1. Traversing the allegations in the return.
2. That the prosecutor was not summoned to, nor had he any notice of the meeting at which he was removed.*

A special verdict found that the prosecutor after his election, but before it was communicated to him, in answer to a question of the clerk of the company, represented that he was solvent, that thereupon he was summoned to attend a court, and was sworn in, and acted, and that he was afterwards adjudicated bankrupt.

*Held (reversing the decision of the court below), that the bye-law was valid, inasmuch as under the circumstances of the company and of the offices of trust to which an assistant might be admitted, bankruptcy or insolvency was not an unreasonable
disqualification;*

That it did not restrict the class eligible for assistants, but only ascertained a criterion of fitness;

That the bye-law was good, although it had not been approved in pursuance of stat. 19 Hen. 7, c. 7;

That a bye-law is to be construed so as, if possible, to make it good and effectual; that so viewing it, the bye-law in question meant that a person should be excluded from becoming a member by any of the means conducive thereto, whether by election, admittance afterwards or otherwise; and that read in this sense the present bye-law rendered the prosecutor's election and admittance invalid;

That the prosecutor was, from the beginning, disqualified by the bye-law, under which the court of assistants was bound to expel him, and that, therefore, he was not entitled to a peremptory mandamus to restore him;

That the effect of his admittance was defeated by the falsehood whereby it was obtained, because, since the bye-law was valid, the statement of solvency was material, and not the less material from the fact that at the time the prosecutor did not know of his election, and that the admittance was made void by fraud;

*Held, further, that on the first plea, prosecutor was entitled to have the verdict entered for him on the traverse that the charter was not correctly set forth, and the traverse as to his having been duly elected;
but that as to the residue of that plea, and as to the second plea, the defts. were entitled to judgment.
Form of special verdict.*

This was a mandamus directed to the wardens and assistants of the Saddlers' Company, commanding them to restore the prosecutor Kay Dimsdale to the place of an assistant upon the court of the company.

The writ recited the charter of King Charles the Second, incorporating the company, which gave, inter alia, power to appoint future wardens and assistants by election and admittance, both of which proceedings are expressly mentioned in the charter; power to remove assistants for "ill-government, or ill-conducting themselves, or for any other just or reasonable cause ;" and a power to make such bye-laws as should seem good, useful, honest and necessary, according to their sound discretion, for the good rule and government of the wardens, or keepers, and freemen and commonalty of the mystery or art, and officers and ministers of the same mystery for the time being, and to declare in what way or order the aforesaid wardens, or keepers, freemen, and commonalty, and other men of the mystery should use and conduct themselves in the office, ministry, artifice and business of their said mystery or art, and otherwise for the public good, and general utility, and safe and quiet government of the said mystery and art, which bye-laws were to be observed so as they should not be repugnant nor contrary to the laws and statutes of the kingdom of England, nor the provisions of the charter, nor to the custom of the city of London, nor the liberties, jurisdiction, or privileges of the mayor and commonalty and citizens of the said city.

The writ further recited that the prosecutor Kay Dimsdale was duly qualified to be, and on the 20th Oct. 1849 was, duly elected and admitted as an assistant, and was afterwards by the defendants wrongfully removed.

The return in substance alleged that the charter was not fully nor correctly set forth in the writ, and that it contained a provision that elections of assistants of the said corporation contrary to the direction or restriction of the charter should be void and of no effect to all intents and purposes whatsoever; that this prosecutor was not duly qualified to be elected an assistant, and that he was not duly elected, nominated, or constituted an assistant; that he had ill-conducted himself, and was not duly in or entitled to hold his office of assistant; that there was just and reasonable cause for his removal therefrom before and at the time of the alleged removal, and for which he was removed; that he was not wrongfully or unlawfully, or contrary to the tenor of the said letters patent, or without just cause, removed, or wrongfully or unlawfully kept removed or dispossessed; that the said corporation has considerable property, real and personal, and the care and distribution of various charity and other estates; that the wardens are elected annually by ballot by the court of assistants, and from the members of such court; and that, according to the usual course and custom, a person coming upon the court would be elected to the office first of renter-warden—an officer who is treasurer of the company, and has the receipt of the rents, and the charge and custody of them and other moneys and property of the company, and performs the duties of the office bonâ fide and in person, and receives into his hands, and has the sole custody or charge of all the rents, dividends, plate, linen and other effects belonging to the said corporation, accounting to the auditors therefor; next that of quarter warden—an officer who receives the quarterage, which he pays over to the renter-warden; afterwards that of key-warden, who has the care of the common seal and archives of the company; and finally that of prime warden or master, who presides at meetings of the court, and has a casting vote, after which the member falls back with the court; that the assistants manage the affairs of the company and control the expenditure, and the grant of pensions and relief to decayed members, and have the general government of the corporation and the trade, possessing and exercising, inter alia, a right of search for, and seizing of deceitful wares; that the election of assistants, in case of vacancy, is made from the livery according to seniority; in case of solvency and good character and repute the office is held for life; but that in case of any misconduct causing unfitness or other sufficient cause, or receiving parochial aid, or petitioning the court for relief, the assistant would no longer receive a summons to attend the court; that should an assistant come to decay and petition for relief out of the company's funds, he is considered, as a matter of course, to cease to be a member of the court upon the receipt of his first quarter's pension; and the vacancy so caused is at once filled up, and the decayed member falls back with the livery, and that the same course has been pursued in the case of misconduct amounting to unfitness or incompetency; that on the 23rd April 1799 a bye-law was made in pursuance of the power in the charter, which bye-law has since remained in force, and is in these words: "Resolved, that no person who has been a bankrupt or become otherwise insolvent, shall hereafter be admitted a member of the court of assistants of this company, unless it be proved to the satisfaction of the court that such person after his bankruptcy or insolvency has paid and satisfied his creditors the whole of their debts, and shall have established a fair and honourable character for seven years subsequent to such his bankruptcy or insolvency, to the satisfaction of the court or the majority of them;" and that such bye-law remained in force; that the prosecutor procured his election and admittance by falsely and fraudulently representing himself to be solvent and able to pay his creditors 20s. in the pound, whereas he was in fact insolvent, and unable to pay his creditors 20s. in the pound or any dividend, as he well knew, and his creditors have never received payment except of a dividend of 2s. 8d. in the pound under his bankruptcy; that he afterwards was adjudicated a bankrupt in respect of a debt existing at the time of his false representation of solvency, which bankruptcy remains in force; and that he was at a subsequent meeting of the court duly convened and held on the 20th Dec. 1849, and whilst he was a bankrupt and before the issuing of the mandamus, lawfully removed and discharged from being an assistant, and that for these reasons he ought not to be restored.

The prosecutor pleaded to this return two pleas: the first traversed the statement in the return as to the letters patent being insufficiently set forth, it also alleged in effect that the prosecutor was duly qualified, duly elected, nominated and constituted an assistant, and that he had not misconducted himself as in the return alleged; that he was duly in and entitled to the office, that there was no just or reasonable cause for his removal therefrom before or at the time of his alleged removal; that the removal was wrongful and unlawful, and contrary to the tenor of the letters patent, and without just or reasonable cause; and that he is wrongfully and unlawfully kept removed and dispossessed; that no such bye-law was made or in force at the times when, &c.; that the prosecutor did not make the false and fraudulent statement alleged; that he was duly elected and admitted, and not through any fraud; that the meeting of the court on the 20th Dec. 1849 at which he was removed, was not duly convened, and that he was not removed, and did not cease to be, but at the time of the teste of the writ was, and still is, an assistant of the said art or mystery, and entitled to be admitted thereto. The second plea alleged that the prosecutor was at the time of the holding of the court at which he was removed an assistant and entitled to be summoned, but that he was not summoned thereto and had not notice nor any opportunity of attending thereat. Upon these pleas the defendants took issue.

The return, in so far as it stated the manner and routine in which the wardens are elected, their duties with respect to the moneys of the company and the insolvency and bankruptcy of the prosecutor, was not traversed, and those statements, if material, were therefore to be taken as admitted for the purposes of this cause.

At the trial a special verdict was found for the plt., the material points of which may be stated as follows:—It finds the charter, a copy of which in the Latin is annexed, and also the bye-law in the terms stated in the return. It states that a person holding the office of assistant might by reason of his being in such office be elected to the office of renter-warden, which last-mentioned office was an office of trust, and the person for the time being holding the said last-mentioned office might by virtue of such office receive large sums of money belonging to the said wardens or keepers and assistants, and which moneys had to be applied for charitable purposes and otherwise. It further appeared from the verdict that the prosecutor was on the 23rd April 1849 in due form elected an assistant by a preliminary resolution which was in due form confirmed on the 25th July following; that on the 24th Sept. he made a representation to the clerk and agent of the company that he was solvent; that in consequence of such statement he was on the 16th Oct. informed of his election and summoned to attend a court on the 20th of the same month, which he did accordingly, and was then sworn in and acted and received his fee as an assistant, and that he was again summoned to attend and attended a court on the 6th Nov., when he also received his fee and acted as an assistant; that on the 30th of the same month he was adjudicated bankrupt; that on the 28th Dec., at a meeting of assistants, held without any summons or notice to the prosecutor, or opportunity of his attending, but in other respects regular, he was expelled. As to the qualification of the prosecutor for the office, the verdict found that at the time of the first resolution for his election, and from thence continually up to and at the time of his alleged removal, the said Kay Dimsdale was in insolvent circumstances, and unable to pay his creditors 20s. in the pound, and during all such time the said Kay Dimsdale then owed large sums of money, on judgments and otherwise, to divers persons, which debts have always remained unpaid and unsatisfied, but he was in other respects duly qualified to be elected an assistant. As to the alleged fraud, the verdict finds that the prosecutor did, after the passing of the resolution of the 23rd April, but before it was communicated to him, to wit, on the 24th Sept. 1849, in answer to an inquiry which Giles Clarke, then being the agent in that behalf of the defs., made of him as to his solvency, represent and state to the said Giles Clarke, then being the clerk and agent as aforesaid of the defs., that he was then quite as solvent as any man of the court, and able to pay his creditors 20s. in the pound, whereas in truth he then was, and thence hitherto has been insolvent, and he was then largely indebted to divers persons in large sums of money, and was wholly unable to pay his creditors 20s. in the pound, as he then well knew; and the said creditors never were paid their said debts, or any part thereof, except a small dividend of 2s. 8d. in the pound, which, and no more, after great delay, was paid to the creditors under the bankruptcy mentioned in the return; and that by means of the said false and fraudulent representations, the said Kay Dimsdale induced and procured the said then wardens or keepers and assistants to admit him to the said office aforesaid. That the said Giles Clarke, as such clerk and agent as aforesaid, after the making of the said representations, and in consequence thereof, caused the prosecutor to be summoned to attend the meetings which it is alleged he attended, and caused the fact of the election to be communicated to him. That the said representations were not communicated by the said Giles Clarke to the court of the company until the 28th Oct. 1849, which was the first court held after they were made, and was the court at which the prosecutor was admitted. Upon this special verdict, the Court of Q.B. gave judgment for the prosecutor, and awarded a peremptory mandamus to issue. Whereupon the case was brought into this court by writ of error.

Knowles, Q.C. for the appa.—The first question is, is the bye-law, as set out, a reasonable bye-law? The court below appears to have acted upon the case of Rex v. The Mayor of Liverpool, 2 Burr, 723. There it was held that bankruptcy was not a cause of amotion from the office of a common councilman; and Lord Mansfield said (p. 732), "A man may be able to pay above 20s. in the pound, notwithstanding his being in strictness a bankrupt." That case, therefore, is not applicable to this bye-law, and it may be questioned whether the decision in that case is now law, for the 5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 76, s. 52, makes bankruptcy or insolvency a disqualification for continuing to hold the office of mayor, alderman, or councillor; that enactment is sufficient to show the reasonableness of this bye-law. The case of Rex v. The Mayor of Liverpool was not taken to a court of error, and the object of the present writ of error is to have the judgment of this court whether the judgment of Lord Mansfield in that case is to be held as law, seeing that the Legislature has acted contrary to that decision; but even were that not so, that judgment might well stand, and yet not affect the present question; and with reference to the observation of Lord Mansfield above referred to, the bye-law provides for that. It is found that every one is liable to hold office as a renter-warden, whose duty it is to receive all the rents and moneys of the corporation. Here is a body of tradesmen having power to make bye-laws to regulate themselves and their corporation. What can be more reasonable than that they should say that no one should hold office who could not pay 20s. in the pound? Surely they are the persons best able to judge. They think that a man who is insolvent is not an independent agent, and not so desirable as a member as one who is solvent, and there is nothing unreasonable that they should object to put him in a position to receive and deal with large sums of money. Then it is said that you cannot limit the number of parties out of whom the person eligible shall be elected. It is true a bye-law cannot exclude a class or section of the constituency, but bye-laws continually impose disqualifications which limit the number of persons eligible; for example, it would not be unreasonable to disqualify a blind man, if the duties of the office required that he should see. Any disqualification of this sort is reasonable if founded on common sense: (Green v. The Mayor of Durham, 1 Burr. 127; Rex v. The Masters and Wardens of the Company of Surgeons, 2 Burr. 892; Rex v. The President of the College of Physicians, 7 T. R. 282. [MARTIN, B. referred to the case of R. on the prosecution of M. Scales v. The Mayor and Aldermen of London, 3 B. & Adol. 255.] The effect of the cases is, that a bye-law which merely restricts the right to be elected is good. Now to apply that rule to the issues before the court. Dimsdale, it is said, was not summoned to the meeting at which his election was declared void; but in fact he never was elected at all, for his election was absolutely null and void, and therefore he had no right to be summoned. If the bye-law is good the prosecutor was never in office, and therefore the defs. are entitled to judgment, notwithstanding the verdict on the issue on the fifteenth plea that the prosecutor was not summoned. Then as to the first issue raised, that the letters patent are truly set forth in the writ, and that no material portion thereof is omitted; the proviso that every election "contrary to the direction or restriction in these presents in that respect mentioned shall be void and of no effect, to all intents and purposes," is not set out in the writ." The words are very material, and that issue therefore ought to have been found for the defs. As to Dimsdale's qualification, the bye-law does not mention the election of an assistant, only his admission; and looking at the charter, it is clear that it meant that no person should be admitted contrary to the charter. The prosecutor was elected

REG. v. THE SADDLERS' COMPANY.

[EX. CH.]

contrary to the charter, because as soon as a bye-law is passed it becomes part of the charter. Tucker v. Rex, 3 Bro. Ch. Ca. 310. The second and third issues, therefore, ought to be found for the defts. As to the fourth issue, that the prosecutor had not conducted himself as alleged, this ought to be found for the defts., because before the prosecutor knew of his election, and before he accepted the office, he made the false statement which obtained him admission. Moreover issue is not joined in the language of the return, and this might bind the defts. hereafter, if they were advised to proceed against Dimsdale in any other manner. The manner of his removal must not be confounded with the question of his qualification. There may have been ample reason for removing him, but the defts. may have proceeded badly to remove him by omitting to give him notice. A man is not considered in until he has been finally admitted by taking the oaths, and he was not sworn in until after the fraudulent statement, and if the election is void he is not entitled to hold. If it be contended that the election can only be questioned by information in the nature of a quo warranto, that assumes a void election. The charter contemplates removal for ill-conduct and other reasonable cause, "by the warden and assistants," not by quo warranto. As to the seventh plea, it is admitted that there was good cause for removal; the false and fraudulent statement was sufficient misconduct. The eighth and ninth issues depend on the manner of the removal without a previous summons, which it is admitted made it informal. The great question is the validity of the bye-law. If that be a good bye-law and incorporated with the charter, and the expression "admitted" means "admitted to claim title," that is the principal question. [MARTIN, B.—Suppose we hold the bye-law good, and that there was a false representation subsequent to the election, still the prosecutor having been elected, the fraud does not arise till afterwards. Can you exclude him without giving him notice, even though the election be void? The word "void" means void when it has been ascertained in a proper manner.] The fraud was after the election, but before he was sworn. If he were not duly elected, there was no occasion to summon him. [MARTIN, B.—The fraud being after the election, would not affect it, though it might the admission. CHANNELL, B.—Is he not entitled to be heard on that point?] If, being disqualified, he is elected, he can have no claim to be summoned. The election is void, and the law does not recognise him in the office.

Adjourned.

Nov. 28.—Gibbons (Lush, Q.C. with him) contra.—The bye-law is bad by reason of its imposing that as a disqualification, which is not a disqualification either in law or reason. First, as to the law of the case; the case of Rex v. Liverpool is precisely analogous with the present case; that case has remained to the present day unquestioned in a court of law, and has always been acted upon. [WILDE, B.—Your difficulty is that that decision does not go the whole length of the present case.] The judgment then is applicable to this case, and has been acted on since 1759. It is said that an assistant might be appointed renter-warden, and so have the receipt and appropriation of the funds of the corporation. It is true that might be so, but it is not so of necessity: he might be passed over; there is nothing in the charter to prevent it. In the case of Reg. v. Owen, 15 Q. B. 476; 19 L. J. 490, Q. B., the clerk of a County Court had been removed, and on a quo warranto information the jury found that the alleged inability on the part of the clerk, for which he had been removed, consisted solely of great pecuniary embarrassment and want of money to pay his debts; and in his judgment Erle, J. said: "The full effect of the finding is, that neither in respect of mental qualities nor bodily powers had there been any disability; but circumstances existed which made it probable that such might be the case;" and further, his Lordship said: "I cannot say that by the mere fact of insolvency his faculties are rendered in such a state, and his principles so impeached, as to lead us to decide that he has in consequence forfeited his office. I cannot say that, because a man is in an extremely embarrassed pecuniary state, he should therefore be deprived of every office in the discharge of which sound sense and firm integrity are required." As to the effect of the Municipal Corporation Act, 5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 76, the case of Rex v. Chitty was decided on that Act, and that case is that an uncertificated bankrupt is not disqualified from being elected a councillor for a borough, and holding the office, unless he became bankrupt while holding; that is a very significant case to show how the court interpreted that statute. [MARTIN, B.—That was a decision on the statute, and according to its terms.] Then as to the reason of this case. It would be as reasonable to object to a man because he had red hair. There was in the city of London a bye-law that no brewer should be a member of the common council, because they were believed to be rude and violent men. Would that be held a good bye-law? [MARTIN, B.—Suppose a bye-law said a convicted felon should not be an assistant.] That would be good: (Bagge's case, 6 Coke Rep. 11, 98 a.) [MARTIN, B. that was after election.] The plt. had an inchoate right; the act here complained of was after election. [WILDE, B.—But he was insolvent at the time of his election.] Reg. v. Tappenden, 3 East, 186, 191, is a case in point; this bye-law imposes a qualification not required by the charter. In Rex v. Attwood, 4 B. & Ad. 481, 502, Lord Denman said, "The other point taken, namely, that the body elected from is narrowed, would undoubtedly be fatal to any bye-law;" here by the present bye-law the body is narrowed. Reg. v. Powell, 3 E. & B. 377, 390; 23 L. J. 199, Q.B., is another authority to the same effect. [MARTIN, B.—The case I have already put, of a convicted felon being ineligible, might go to narrow the body elected from.] Sir Thomas Earle's case, Carth. 173. The case of Green v. The Mayor of Durham, cited for the defts., is not applicable, there was no right to be elected; here there was an inchoate right, and a vested right, which cannot be divested. In the case of R. v. The College of Surgeons the requirement was reasonable, having regard to the learned character of the body; but in the present case all that is necessary is that the members should be saddlers. In the case of R. v. The College of Physicians there was no inchoate right; all those cases differ from the present. Then as to the issues. A person applying for a mandamus is not bound to set out the charter; it is in the custody of the company, and if anything is omitted it is for them to set it out in their return. There is nothing to show that this election was void; that bye-law is not a part of the charter, and if the election were bad according to the bye-law, still it is good according to the charter. The return that the prosecutor was not duly elected is bad, it is too general: (R. v. Lyme Regis, 1 Doug. 79.) The bye-law was meant to apply to the election, not to the admission; and here inquiry was not made into the prosecutor's circumstances until after his election. The election gives him a right to the office, and the admission gives him a right to execute the duties of the office, and any disqualification must be an entire disqualification. The only method of ousting the prosecutor, if he be wrongly in, is by quo warranto. The alleged fraud was an answer given to a question by the clerk of the company, and can have no effect. If the bye-law is bad, a gratuitous statement cannot affect him: (Vernon v. Keys, 12 East, 632.) The ground of that decision was, that the man was not under any obligation to disclose the truth. So here, if the company were induced to admit him in consequence of that statement, it was their own fault for not making other inquiries: (Feret v. Hill, 15 C. B. 207; White v. Garden, 10 C. B. 919; Stewart v. Ashton, 8 Ir. C. L. Rep. 35; 19 Hen. 7, c. 7.)

R. Clarke, by the permission of the court, replied—This is a reasonable bye-law, and R. v. Liverpool is not in point. Then 20s. in the pound was not paid. The rule with respect to diminishing the number of persons eligible to be elected means that you shall not exclude a class. As to the misrepresentation, it must be made with reference to an existing fact, to avoid a contract: (5 Rep. 63 b; 6 Rep. 531 b; Com. Dig. "Bye-law," c. 1; 11 Coke, 54 b.) The bye-law is not necessarily bad because it is not signed; if the corporation neglect to get their bye-laws confirmed, they are liable to a penalty; the word "admitted" in the bye-law is to be read as "allowed:" (R. v. Axbridge, 2 Cowp., was also cited.)

Cur. adv. vult.

Jan. 12.—MARTIN, B., after stating the writ, return, pleas and special verdict, proceeded:—The first and great question is as to the validity of the bye-law. The objections made to it were, first, that it was beyond the power of the court of assistants; secondly, that it was void because of the provisions of the 19 Hen. 7, c. 7; and, lastly, that if not, it was bad in form, as being directed against admittance only, and not election. The first objection, if valid, must be so either because of the bankruptcy or insolvency of a freeman being in itself an unreasonable ground of disqualification for the office of assistant, or because of a violation of the charter in unduly limiting the class from whom the selection of assistants is to be made. Upon full consideration, however, we are of opinion that the bankruptcy or insolvency does not constitute an unreasonable ground of disqualification for the office of assistant. Not only is the office in itself one of trust and confidence, but it leads almost as a matter of course to the office of renter-warden, the holder of which is the treasurer and keeps the purse; and it seems to us but reasonable that persons interested in the prosperity and honour of the company should desire that the custody of its money should be not only trustworthy, but safe, beyond the risk of temptation, and that the conduct of its affairs should not be in the hands of those who have shown themselves to be presumably incompetent to the prudent management of their own. It is true that persons do sometimes become bankrupt and insolvent without misconduct, and even without imprudence, but the great mass of bankruptcy and insolvency is to be traced to one or other of these causes; and bye-laws must be considered as subject to the general maxim that laws ought to be adapted to meet cases of ordinary occurrence, and ought not to be pronounced bad because in rare and exceptional instances they may work a hardship. With respect to the authorities cited on this point they do not, in our opinion, touch it. That of Rex v. The Mayor of Liverpool arose upon the common law and not upon a bye-law, which must necessarily superadd something to the common law, otherwise it would be idle. Indeed, bankruptcy was unknown to the common law, and is the creation of comparatively modern statutes. The other cases turned upon the construction of particular statutes, relating one of them to municipal corporations, and the other to County Courts, and they have equally no application. Next, as to the question whether the bye-law unduly restricts the eligible class in violation of the provisions of the charter, we must observe that there is a distinction in this respect between bye-laws which exclude a class of persons from an office to which by the charter they are eligible, and those which only ascertain a criterion of fitness, such as, having regard to the object of the charter, is a just and reasonable one. The former class is void, the latter valid; and it is within this class that the bye-law in question, in our opinion, falls. The law in this respect is correctly stated in Mr. Frazer's learned note to the case of Corporations, 78 a: see also Green v. The Mayor of Durham, 1 Burr. 127; Rex v. The College of Physicians, 7 T. R. 282. The second objection, founded upon the stat. 19 Hen. 7, c. 7, is disposed of by reference to the decisions upon the construction of that statute, stated in 2 Kyd, 108, from which it appears that although a penalty may be incurred by the persons who make a bye-law without the approval therein directed to be obtained, yet the bye-law itself made without such approval is not invalid. We proceed to consider whether the last objection pointed to the form of the bye-law is fatal. That objection is, that the bye-law professes to invalidate the admittance only, and therefore impliedly permits the election, by which it is alleged that the right of admittance is vested, and after which it is said that the admittance is merely ministerial. The whole weight of this argument rests upon the assumption that the bye-law uses the words "be admitted a member of the court of assistants" in the same restricted sense in which the phrase "ad executionem officii sui admittatur" is employed in the charter as pointing to an admittance after election. Now, assuming, for argument sake, that the bye-law, if so read, would be inoperative (as to which we give no opinion), still the question whether it is to be so read depends upon whether any other reasonable construction can be put upon its language so as to make it operative; and if so, whether the court ought to construe a bye-law like a plea in estoppel, or whether we ought not to put upon it such a construction as, if possible, to make it effectual. Now, the bye-law is certainly capable of a different construction from that put upon it by the prosecutor's counsel; for, according to the ordinary use of language, a law that a person shall not "be admitted a member" means that he shall be excluded from becoming so by any of the means conducive thereto, whether by election, admittance after election, or otherwise. Indeed, when it is considered that in this case the functions of election and admittance are performed by the same body, it seems unreasonable to draw a distinction between a rejection thereby at the election, and a refusal thereby of admittance after election; both processes taken together constituting, in fact, the person being "admitted a member." It is sufficient, however, to say that the construction above suggested is one of which the bye-law is capable, and which it ought to receive according to the familiar rule of construction, that instruments should be so construed as that they may stand good rather than be defeated. That this rule is applicable to bye-laws sufficiently appears from the case of The Poulterers' Company v. Phillips, 6 Bing. N.C. 314. The bye-law, read in the sense thus explained and enforced, rendered invalid both the election and admittance of the prosecutor, by reason of his insolvency; and if this were a proceeding against him by quo warranto, we must have given judgment for the Crown, by reason of such his disqualification. It was, however, argued, that the question raised by the present proceedings was different from that which would have arisen upon a quo warranto, because the prosecutor had actually been admitted, and had seisin of the office before his removal, and that, inasmuch as the removal took place without his having an opportunity of being heard in his own defence, it was inoperative, and so that he is entitled to be restored, and can only be removed, if at all, either by quo warranto, or by a regularly constituted meeting of the court of assistants, at which he may have an opportunity of being heard. We assent to this argument in so far as it asserts that the proceedings at the meeting of the 20th Dec. were inoperative to remove the prosecutor, as for a corporate offence adjudicated upon by dismissal, pursuant to the charter. We also think that the learned counsel for the prosecutor was well founded in his contention that a corporate offence not constituting a disqualification de facto, committed after election, could not be relied upon in the return to a mandamus to restore without showing an expulsion in consequence of such offence after the prosecutor had had an opportunity of being heard. This is obviously reasonable; because the person accused might, if heard, put forward an excuse which the court of assistants, proceeding to consider the question, it may be less vigorously than would a strictly judicial tribunal, might in their judgment deem sufficient; or he might prove such circumstances as would induce them to overlook the offence and abstain from removing him. Such a course of reasoning is, however, inapplicable to a case like the present, in which the prosecutor appears to have been from the beginning disqualified by a bye-law forming as much a part of the constitution of the company as does its charter, and where the court of assistants could not, consistently with their duty, waive that disqualification, or do otherwise than expel him. The distinction between such a case and that first put is obvious. It is also plainly distinguishable from that which arises where, upon a mandamus to elect, the corporation returns that the office is already full so as to put it upon the applicant to try the question in a proceeding against the person really interested. We should be very slow to allow the prerogative writ of mandamus to issue, ordering the restoration to office of a person not qualified to hold it, or to discharge its duties, who ought never to have been elected, and who never would have been elected but for a mistake of fact on the part of the electors. It might well be held, and not inconsistently with any authority cited, that the maxim error facti non nocet governs the case, and decides it in favour of the defs. It is, however, unnecessary to dispose of the case on this ground, because the only circumstance which could be plausibly relied upon as making a proceeding by quo warranto necessary, was the admittance de facto, it being clear that the insufficiency after election would be a good answer to a mandamus to admit, even if it be not so to a mandamus to restore (as in the case of Rex v. Williams, 8 B. & C. 681); and in our opinion the argument for the defs. was successful to show that any effect of the admittance in this case was defeated by the falsehood whereby it was obtained. To this argument several answers were put forward on the part of the prosecutor. First, it was said that the misrepresentation was a mere falsehood as to something collateral or immaterial. This depends upon whether the bye-law was valid, and it is disposed of by our decision in the affirmative. In each of the cases referred to under this head, except Stewart v. Aston, the court held that the misrepresentation was not of a fact dantis causam contractui, but of collateral matter. In the case of Stewart v. Aston, the marginal note of which is incorrect, a consideration had actually passed and was retained by the def., so that he was not in a position to avoid the deed upon the ground of fraud: (see Clarke v. Dickson, 1 E. & B. 148.) In the present case, as the bye-law was valid, the statement of solvency was relevant and material to the question of admittance, and was the direct cause and occasion thereof. Next it was said, that the finding in the special verdict that the admittance was procured by means of a representation which the verdict designates as "false and fraudulent," ought not to be acted upon, because at the time of making it the prosecutor did not know of his election. To this, however, the answer is plain, that he knew he might be elected, and made the statement, knowing it to be false, to the agent of the electoral body, and that when that statement was reported to them at the court of the 20th Dec., when he was admitted, he accepted and acted upon the admittance, which, as he must then have known, proceeded upon the faith of his statement being true. These circumstances simply warrant the conclusion that he procured his admittance by falsehood and fraud. Lastly, it was argued that, even assuming the admittance to have been procured by fraud of the prosecutor, yet the office became vested in him, and could not be divested by reason of the fraud. For this proposition were cited the cases of Feret v. Hill, where the misrepresentation was held to be collateral, and not to go to the root of the contract; and Stewart v. Aston, where, as already pointed out, it was impossible to place the parties in statu quo. In neither of those cases was it decided that fraud may not invalidate a transfer of land equally as one of goods, where the parties can be put in statu quo, by simply avoiding the transaction, and the election to avoid it is made by the party defrauded within a reasonable time after the discovery of the fraud, and before a right has been created in any third party; and in whatever manner the question thus stated ought to be decided, there is a wide difference between a conveyance of land which by the policy of law must be vested in some one, and the creation of a personal right incapable of transfer, such as the office of assistant. A much closer analogy is found in the case of judgments, and other proceedings in courts of justice obtained by fraud upon the court. These might be treated as void, in a collateral proceeding, without any writ of deceit, where that process existed, and without any application to the court to set them aside. Instances of this will be found, as to a fine, in Fermor's case, 3 Rep. 77a; as to a judgment, Philipson v. Lord Egremont, 6 Q. B.; and as to a decree, Lord Bandon v. Beecher, 3 Cl. & F. 479. We are therefore of opinion that the objection as to the effect of the admittance is not open to the prosecutor; and in so deciding we act upon the plain principle that "it is not reasonable that a man should take advantage of his own wrong, and if the law should give him such power, the law would be the cause and occasion of such wrong." We have thus disposed of all the questions affecting the merits of the case, and it only remains for us to direct how the verdict should be entered upon the issues in point of form. It is right here to notice that the special verdict is drawn in the old form, with much unnecessary prolixity, instead of in a simpler and more compendious form, after finding the facts, stating that the jury are ignorant how, upon such facts, the issues ought to be found, praying the advice of the court, and stating that they find, according to its judgment; or if it be decided to narrow the question for opinion of the court, the form adopted in Lord Londesborough v. Mowatt, 4 E. & B. 1, may be resorted to. We impute no blame to the gentlemen who prepared the special verdict in the present form, for which there are no doubt common precedents; but we trust that in future a shorter form will be adopted in practice. As to the first plea, the substantial part of it must, according to our judgment, be found for the defs. The traverse as to the charter being insufficiently set out in the mandamus ought to be treated as a distinct issue in denial of the charter, and found for the prosecutor. So ought the traverse as to the prosecutor having been duly elected, because upon these pleadings the issue as to the election is simply whether it was done in point of form; the disqualification of the prosecutor being the subject of distinct averment in the mandamus, return, and plea. We must, for this purpose, treat the issue as divisible; for the second C. L. P. A. puts the pleadings in mandamus after the return upon the same footing as those in an ordinary action. As to the residue of the first plea, the judgment of Lord Wensleydale in Lush v. Russell, 5 Ex. 203, is conclusive to show that, in our view of the substantial question, the finding must be for the defs. As to the second plea, it is either substantial in point of law on the ground that the prosecutor was an assistant and entitled to attend the meeting of the wardens, or as an implied traverse of that part of the return which we have held to be an answer to the mandamus, and as that averment is disproved the plea fails; or if that averment is not to be so construed, the plea is insufficient in point of law, and then in order to entitle the prosecutor to a verdict thereupon, it was necessary to prove all the averments. In either view the verdict upon that issue must be for the defts. The result is, we reverse the judgment of the Q.B., and give judgment for the defts.

Judgment reversed.

EVANS v. McLOUGHLAN.

Habeas corpus—Excise Act, 7 & 8 Geo. 4, c. 53, ss. 33, 79—Statutory power to arrest, detain and take before a justice—What is a reasonable detention—Jurisdiction—Certiorari.

M. being found assisting in illicit distillation was arrested in the evening by E. an excise officer and two police constables. E. left M. in charge of the police, and went to find a justice of the peace before whom the prisoner could be taken, under 7 & 8 Geo. 4, c. 53, s. 33. Several justices refused to act, but at length, on the second day after the arrest, one was found, who, after hearing the charge, convicted M. There was no information or conviction, but only a warrant of commitment granted to E., after the prisoner failed to pay the fine imposed. M. having moved for his discharge on the ground of the detention by the police having been illegal:

Held (reversing the judgment of the Court of Session in Scotland), that E. was justified, under sect. 33, in leaving M. in charge of the police while seeking a justice; and whether there was unreasonable delay or not in taking the prisoner before a justice (and sem- ble, there was none), the justice had jurisdiction, and the Superior Court could not interfere, as the writ of certiorari, &c., was taken away by the 79th section; that the arrest was an immediate arrest, and no information in writing was necessary; and there was no substantial irregularity in the proceedings.

This was an appeal from the Court of Session in Scotland, the court having discharged the resp. under a writ of habeas corpus, on the ground that he was illegally convicted of illicit distillation under the Excise Act, 7 & 8 Geo. 4, c. 53, s. 33.

The circumstances of the arrest and detention were as follow:—The resp. M'Loughlan was a miner, living near Airdrie, and was apprehended by the app., an excise officer and two police constables, on the evening of 22nd March 1858, near Airdrie, beside a still, which was running spirits or low wines. The prisoner and other men were engaged in superintending the running of the spirits or low wines when they were apprehended. The excise officer and the police officers, after the apprehension, conveyed the prisoner to the police-office at Airdrie. After lodging him there, the excise officer immediately proceeded to endeavour to find a justice of the peace to hear the cause. He first applied to — Kidd, Esq., justice of peace in Airdrie, on 22nd March 1858, and requested him to hear the case. Mr. Kidd declined to do so, and referred the excise officer to Mr. Watt, the justice of peace clerk at Airdrie. The officer applied to Mr. Watt to procure a justice to hear the case, but that gentleman stated that it could not be done on the evening of the 22nd, and requested the officer to attend next morning, when a justice would be pro- vided. In these circumstances the prisoner was detained, along with the other persons apprehended, during the night of the 22nd, in the county police-office. The officer attended next morning at Mr. Watt's office, and again requested that the case should be taken up. He was informed that it would be so taken up during the course of the day, when a court which was then being held by the sheriff-substitute was over. The officer waited till said court was over, and again applied for a hearing, but he was informed by the Procurator-Fiscal, Mr. Steel, that none of the magistrates present would hear the case, because the officer had not exhibited informations and served summonses upon the prisoners; which things were not necessary. The officer then proceeded to his superior officer, the supervisor at Hamilton, and informed him of the circumstance. The supervisor came in with the officer from Hamilton to Airdrie, on the morning of the 24th March, and having seen Mr. Thomas Torrance, justice of the peace, the supervisor induced him to hear the case on the 24th March. Up to the time of hearing, the prisoner and the other persons apprehended were kept in the county police-office.

The excise officer laid before the magistrate the statute above quoted, and then made an oral complaint against the prisoner, to the effect that he discovered him in and about a private and unentered place, at the time and place mentioned in the warrant of commitment, where there was in the course of manufacture spirits from a still, which was at the time running the said spirits, and where there were certain materials in preparation for manufacturing such spirits, and that the prisoner was knowingly aiding, assisting, and concerned in the manufacture of such spirits, contrary to the said Act 7 & 8 Geo. 4, c. 53, sect. 33.

Evidence on oath in support of the complaint was then given, namely, that of the officer Robert Evans, being one credible witness in terms of the statute. After hearing the officer's evidence, the justice of the peace convicted the prisoner of the offence charged against him in terms of the statute, and imposed the penalty set forth in the warrant of commitment. No conviction was written out or signed by the justice, as it is not, and has never been, the practice in any part of the United Kingdom, to write out convictions for offences under this section of the statute when the penalty is not paid. The only writing which is then signed or issued is the warrant of commitment, and that warrant was so signed and issued in the following terms, the penalty not being paid:—

“County of Lanark, to wit.—To Mr. Robert Evans, and to the keeper of the house of correction at Airdrie, in the county of Lanark.—Whereas John M'Loughlan, of Coathill, in the county of Lanark, is and stands convicted this day before me, Thomas Torrance, Esq., one of her Majesty's justices of the peace in and for the said county of Lanark, for that one Robert Evans, being an officer of excise, did, on the 22nd day of March in the year of our Lord 1858, at Bell's Stane, in the said county of Lanark, discover and find, in a certain private and unentered place, manufacturing, and in the course of manufacturing, certain goods and commodities for and in respect whereof a duty of excise is imposed, to wit, a still which was running spirits and certain materials and preparations for manufacturing such goods and commodities, to wit, low wines, and did at the same time discover, in and about such private and unentered place, the said John M'Loughlan knowingly aiding, assisting and concerned in the manufacturing of such goods and commodities, contrary to the form of the statute in that case made and provided, whereby the said John M'Loughlan hath forfeited and lost the sum of 30*l*. And whereas the said John M'Loughlan hath refused and neglected to pay the said sum of 30*l*. into the hands of the said Robert Evans, being such officer of excise as aforesaid, and who conveyed the said John M'Loughlan before me in pursuance of the said statute, charged with the offence aforesaid. These are therefore to require you, the said Robert Evans, to convey the said John M'Loughlan to the House of Correction at Airdrie, in the said county of Lanark, and to deliver him to the keeper thereof, together with this warrant. And I do hereby command you, the said keeper, to receive the said John M'Loughlan into your custody in the said house of correction, there to remain and to be kept to hard labour for the space of three calendar months, to be reckoned from the date hereof, or until (during the said three months) he shall have paid the said sum of 30*l*., and for so doing this shall be your sufficient warrant. Given under my hand, at Airdrie, in the said county of Lanark, the 24th day of March in the year of our Lord 1858.

(Signed) "THOMAS TORRANCE, J.P."

The statute 7 & 8 Geo. 4, c. 53, s. 33, enacts as follows:—"That when any officer of excise shall at any time find, in any private or unentered place, manufacturing, or in the course of manufacturing, any goods or commodities for or in respect whereof any duty of excise is or shall be imposed, or any materials or preparations for manufacturing any such goods or commodities, and shall at the same time discover in or about such private or unentered place any person knowingly aiding, assisting, or in anywise concerned in the manufacturing of such goods or commodities, every person so discovered shall forfeit and lose the sum of 30*l*. over and above all other penalties to which the proprietor of the same, or the person in whose custody or possession the same shall be found, or by whom the manufacturing of such goods or commodities may be carrying on, is or may be subject and liable; and it shall be lawful for any officer of excise, and all persons acting in his aid and assistance, to arrest and detain every person so discovered, and to convey him or her before one or more justice or justices of the peace for the county, shire, division, city, town, or place wherein such person shall be so discovered as aforesaid; and it shall be lawful to and for such justice or justices of the peace, on confession of the party, or by proof on the oath of one or more credible witness or witnesses made of such offence, to convict every such person so discovered as aforesaid, and every person so convicted shall, immediately on such conviction, pay the said sum of 30*l*. into the hands of the officer who shall have conveyed such offender before such justice or justices of the peace, to be paid to the commissioners of excise, or the commissioner or commissioners and assistant commissioners of excise in Scotland or Ireland respectively, or to such person or persons as they may respectively appoint, to be applied in such manner as other excise penalties are by this Act directed to be applied; and on any such offender refusing or neglecting to pay the said sum of 30*l*. the justice or justices so convicting as aforesaid shall and may, by warrant or warrants under his or their hand or hands, commit the said offender to the house of correction, or other prison for the said county, shire, division, city, town, or place respectively, there to remain and to be kept to hard labour for the space of three calendar months, to be reckoned from the day of such conviction; and the person so convicted and committed shall not under any pretence or by reason of any authority or order other than as hereinafter mentioned be discharged until he or she shall have paid the said sum of 30*l*., or until the expiration of the said three months," &c.

By sect. 79 it is also enacted, "That no writ of certiorari or other writ or process shall be issued at the suit of any def. out of any of his Majesty's courts of record in England, Scotland, or Ireland, nor shall any bill of suspension, advocacy, or reduction, be passed, nor shall any letter or letters of suspension, advocacy, or reduction, or any other proceeding, be issued out of the Court of Session or Court of Justiciary in Scotland to supersede, sist, stay, remove, or in anywise affect any information or judicial proceeding before the Commissioners of Excise or Commissioners of Appeal in this Act after mentioned, or before any justice or justices of the peace in the United Kingdom in pursuance of this Act, or any other Act or Acts of Parliament relating to the revenue of excise, or any judgment thereupon, and that every such information shall be tried and determined, and every such judicial proceeding shall be had and completed, and every such judgment executed, any such writ of certiorari or other writ or process or letter or letters or bill of suspension, advocacy, or reduction, or other proceeding notwithstanding: provided always, that nothing herein contained shall extend, or be deemed or construed to extend, to any writ of certiorari, sued or issued in such cases in behalf of his Majesty out of his Majesty's Courts of Exchequer in England, Scotland, or Ireland respectively."

The prisoner, after being in prison, applied to the Court of Session for a suspension of the sentence and liberation, equivalent to a writ of habeas corpus. The Court of Session held the conviction bad, on the ground that the justice had no jurisdiction, inasmuch as this was not the case of an immediate arrest, there having been a break in the custody by reason of the prisoner being committed to the custody of the police and kept in prison forty-eight hours, which the statute did not warrant. The excise officer now appealed against that decision.

The Lord Advocate (Moncreiff), Welsby and F. Russell, for the app., contended that the jurisdiction of the Superior Court was entirely taken away by sect. 79 of the Excise Act, 7 & 8 Geo. 4, c. 53, in all cases where there was jurisdiction in the justice who convicted. Here there was jurisdiction, for the prisoner was found aiding in the illicit distillation. The statute, sect. 33, gave power to the excise officer, and all persons aiding him, to arrest, detain and carry such offender so discovered before a magistrate. The power to detain must mean to detain a reasonable time until a justice could be found. It was true that here the excise officer had given the prisoner in charge to the police constables while he went in search of the justice, and some time elapsed before a justice could be found; but the time which so elapsed was not caused by any unreasonable delay of the officer, but by the circumstance of one justice after another refusing to act. The delay was not due to the negligence of the excise officer. Not only the excise officer had power to detain, but all persons assisting him, and here the police constable, in keeping the prisoner, was acting in aid of the excise officer, and therefore under the authority of the statute. There was no unreasonable delay therefore, and even if there had been, still the justice would have had jurisdiction. Thus, in Van Bowen's case, 9 Q. B. 669, though a week had elapsed, this was held to be so. It could make no difference here that the police officer kept the prisoner in a cell, as it would have been equally an imprisonment or detention if the prisoner had been kept in an inn or a private house. The justice had nothing to do with the delay in bringing the prisoner before him, but the offence and the arrest gave him jurisdiction, and there was one continuous detention throughout. As to the objections urged, there was no necessity for an information in writing, as the statute did not require it.

M. Chambers, Q.C. and Neesb, for the resp., contended that the jurisdiction of the Superior Court to interfere by habeas corpus was not taken away by the 79th section, for it was the right of the subject in all cases of illegal imprisonment to apply for his discharge. There was no jurisdiction in the justice, as it was only in cases of summary or immediate arrest that the excise officers could proceed as they had done. The usual course was to apply for leave of the Excise Commissioners to proceed by information against the prisoner under the 61st section, and the privilege of proceeding under the 33rd section was confined to cases where the offender was taken immediately, that is, without any delay, before a justice. Here there was a breach in the detention by the excise officer committing the prisoner to the custody of the police, which he had no authority to do. His powers under the 33rd section must be strictly interpreted, and he had no right to commit the offender to prison before taking him to a justice of the peace. The illegal custody commenced the moment the prisoner was handed over to the police.

EVANS v. McLOUGHLAN.

[Lord CHELMSFORD. — Could not the excise officer have left the prisoner in a room under the charge of somebody while he went in quest of a magistrate, and then returned and carried him before the magistrate?] No, he could not leave the prisoner in a room, but might carry the prisoner about with him.

[Lord CHELMSFORD. — Surely, if a man is apprehended in this country so late that he cannot be taken before a magistrate, he may be detained till next morning; that is reasonable, and it has been decided.] Yes, but though the prisoner may be detained, he cannot be put in an ordinary prison.

[Lord CHELMSFORD. — Call it a lock-up house, or a cage; it is in fact a gaol. The prisoner might have been re-arrested, under 4 & 5 Will. 4, c. 51, s. 25, but could not be detained in the manner he was.

The LORD CHANCELLOR. — The whole question turns on this, whether the excise officer was not all the while bonâ fide pursuing the object of the Act, in bringing the party before the magistrate, and whether there was any unreasonable delay.] The first duty of the magistrate was to ask if there had been any delay in bringing the prisoner before him; if there was, he had no jurisdiction, under the 33rd section of the statute, and he ought to have declined to hear the case. In Hay v. Linton, 2 Irv. 333, a Scotch case, under the Reformatory Schools Act, 17 & 18 Vict. c. 74, a girl was put in the police cell by the magistrate till they could make inquiry about her, and it was held the magistrate had no right so to detain the child in that manner, for that was not in pursuance of the Act. There are other objections to this conviction. There was no written information, as there ought to have been. There was no record of the conviction; the justice ought to have taken notes of the evidence: (Paley on Convictions, 84, ed. 1838.)

The LORD CHANCELLOR. — My Lords, notwithstanding the able argument which we have heard at your Lordships' bar from the counsel for the resp., I must say that I entertain a clear opinion that the decree appealed against, which was pronounced in the court below, ought to be reversed, but not at all on the ground that the Court of Session has no jurisdiction over such matters. The Court of Session had jurisdiction over such matters, and no Act of Parliament has been passed to deprive that high tribunal of the jurisdiction which it once enjoyed. And although the Scotch Court of Ex. would have co-ordinate jurisdiction in such a matter, it does not at all follow that when it was brought into the Court of Session it would have been coram non judice. If this proceeding could have been impeached on the ground that the justice had no jurisdiction over the offence with which the resp. was charged, I am of opinion that in that case the Court of Session would have had jurisdiction, and would have been fully entitled to hear the objections that were raised. But, upon looking at the Act of Parliament, it appears to me quite clear that the 79th section takes away any jurisdiction from the Court of Session in this case. It lies upon the resp. to show that the writ of habeas corpus was regularly sued out. By the 79th section of the 7 & 8 Geo. 4, c. 53, it is enacted, "That no writ of certiorari (that would apply to England) or other writ or process shall be issued at the suit of any def. out of any of his Majesty's courts of record in England, Scotland, or Ireland, nor shall any bill of suspension, advocacy, or reduction be passed, nor shall any letters of suspension, advocacy, or reduction, or any proceeding be issued out of the Court of Session or Court of Justiciary in Scotland to supersede, sist, stay, remove, or in anywise affect any information or judicial proceeding before the Commissioners of Excise, or Commissioners of Appeal in this Act after mentioned, or before any justice or justices of the peace in the United Kingdom in pursuance of this Act." Therefore, if the justice before whom M'Loughlan was brought was acting in pursuance of the Act, and had jurisdiction in the matter, the suspension was incompetent and the Court of Session had no jurisdiction. Now it seems to me that the learned counsel for the resp. have utterly failed in showing that the justice had not jurisdiction. For it is enacted by the 33rd section of the same Act that created the offence that it "shall be lawful for any officer of excise, and all persons acting in his aid and assistance (and in this case I know not whether the officer of police might not be considered as acting in aid and assistance of the officer of excise if it were necessary to consider that), to arrest and detain every person so discovered, and to convey him or her before one or more justice or justices of the peace for the county, shire, division, city, town, or place wherein such persons shall be so discovered as aforesaid." Here there is power given to the excise officer, and to all who are acting in his aid, to arrest, detain and convey the offender before a justice. Then come the words which give jurisdiction to the justice: "And it shall be lawful to and for such justices of the peace, on confession of the party, or by proof on the oath of one or more credible witness or witnesses made of such offence, to convict every such person so discovered as aforesaid." Now it is not at all disputed that the magistrate who acted in this case would have had jurisdiction if he had been the magistrate to whom the resp. was taken in the first instance, on the 22nd March, in order to make the complaint before him. If the resp. had been immediately conveyed before that magistrate, and that magistrate had proceeded to hear and decide, no question could have been made about the jurisdiction. But it so happens that the arrest being on the 22nd March (I believe there is some doubt about the date), it was not, according to the statement in this case, till the 24th March that the hearing took place. And it is said during that interval the resp. could not be considered as having been detained under the authority of the Act. Now it is allowed by the counsel for the resp. that all that is reasonable may be done by way of detention for the purpose of having the matter adjudicated. And it is not disputed, I presume, that if M'Loughlan had been taken to the house of a justice, and the justice had been at dinner, he might lawfully have been detained in the hall, or introduced into the drawing-room, or into a picture-gallery, to amuse himself until the repast was over, and the matter might then be heard. Indeed, it is admitted that the excise officer might have taken the prisoner to his (the officer's) house and detained him there. But the objection is that, instead of being in the officer's house, he was taken to a prison, and a police officer was asked to take care of him. Well, I say again, referring to these sections of the Act of Parliament, that the police officer in doing that might be considered as acting in the aid of the excise officer; at all events he was acting for the excise officer, and the excise officer must be considered as the party who is detaining him: qui facit per alium facit per se. Here the excise officer did detain him, and it is allowed that there was no detention whatsoever beyond what was essentially necessary for the matter being adjudicated. There was no malice, no violence, no harsh treatment, and no time at all was wasted. The excise officer does his best to find a justice to hear the case. He goes first to one man and then to another, and then he consults the officer who represents the Government at Airdrie, and he advises him, I think, to go to Hamilton. He goes to Hamilton. He does his best to find a justice down to the 24th, when Mr. Torrance is found, and the proceedings are consummated. Now those being the facts of the case, it seems to me quite clear that it must be considered that there was a continuity of detention, and that it was always either by the excise, or by some person acting in aid of the excise officer; and there is no doubt that if a justice could have been found sooner the detention would have been abridged. It was said by the counsel for the resp. that this was not in the heart of the Highlands—that Airdrie is a very populous place, and that there are a great number of magistrates there. But if it be admitted that in the heart of the Highlands where magistrates are rare, the resp. might have been detained till a magistrate could be found, then, if in any other part of the country there are twenty magistrates applied to, and each of them improperly refused to hear the case, it is clear that the man must be detained till some magistrate is found who will administer the law. Under the circumstances it appears to me that Mr. Torrance had jurisdiction, just as much as if he had been present at the time when the unlawful distillation was discovered, and had sat at the outset of the proceedings to hear and adjudicate. Van Bowen's case is, I think, in point, because it shows that even although the detention be for an unreasonable time, that does not affect the case. I do not think that the detention in the present case was for an unreasonable time, and if a jury had had to try that question, I think any jury would have said that there was no detention for an unreasonable time. One noble and learned lord has intimated his opinion, in commenting on Van Bowen's case, that that would not have interfered with the jurisdiction of the justice when the hearing actually took place. In that case the Act of Parliament gave power to detain for a reasonable time, and the jury expressly found that he had been held in custody for an unreasonable time, but still the determination was that that did not interfere with the jurisdiction of the magistrate. That being so, all other questions disappear. The Court of Session having no jurisdiction to suspend the proceedings before the justice, because the justice had jurisdiction in the matter, and the suspension being incompetent, the other questions that have been discussed at the bar do not arise. I am almost ashamed to refer to some of the objections that have been made, such as that there was only one witness examined, for the Act of Parliament says that the proof of one witness shall be sufficient; and again, that the officer filled up a blank warrant. Although those objections received a certain countenance from the Lord Ordinary, I must say that they seem to me to be wholly frivolous, and sorry that they should have received countenance in that quarter. The only further objection that I think it right to take notice of is, that there was no written information, and that consequently there was not any jurisdiction. If this had been a proceeding under a different clause of the Act of Parliament—not where there has been an arrest and an immediate procedure for obtaining an adjudication and the infliction of a penalty—I think there might have been good reason for such an objection; but it is quite clear that the Legislature meant that this festinum remedium of arresting parties taken in flagrante delicto, and having an immediate conviction, contemplated that it should be done without the formality of a regular conviction. Those steps may be necessary, and often are necessary and proper, when there is a regular proceeding which is supposed to take place before a magistrate; but this is a special proceeding to be adopted for the purpose of putting down an offence which it is very difficult to meet, namely, the offence of unlawful distillation; and it seems to me that if parties were allowed to raise such objections as these, the very object of the Act would be defeated. All that it appears to me judicially necessary for us to decide is, whether this suspension was competent or not. I say that it was incompetent. I must advise your Lordships that the decision of the Court of Session should be reversed.

LORD CRANWORTH.—My Lords, I entirely concur with my noble and learned friend. The 33rd section of the statute in question makes it the duty of any officer of excise, upon finding a person in flagrante delicto engaged in illicit distillation, to arrest and detain him, and bring him before one or more justice or justices of the peace, in order that he may there be dealt with. And the duty then imposed upon the justice is to hear and determine the case and to fine the party 30*l.* if he is convicted, either upon his own confession or by the evidence of one witness, and in default of his payment, then to commit him for a certain period to prison. Now, what happened here was this: The officer of excise, Evans, did find M'Loughlan engaged in illicit distillation, did arrest him, did detain him, and bring him before a justice of the peace; and the first point that was argued was, that it was the duty of the justice of the peace to inquire whether he had been brought up quam primum before him. Now, in my opinion, the justice of the peace not only had no obligation to make such an inquiry, but he would have been doing that which he would not have been justified in doing had he stopped to make such an inquiry. He might just as well have inquired whether the arrest had been unnecessarily harsh, as to have inquired whether the detention had been unnecessarily long. The justice of the peace had no duty to perform, except to proceed upon the case as a case of a person taken in flagrante delicto having been arrested and detained by the officer and brought before him. That, therefore, I think, disposes altogether of the question about unreasonable detention. But I must say that, looking at it as a question of fact, if I had to decide it only as jurymen, I should say that there was no unnecessary detention at all. The man was taken, and for aught that appears would have been immediately brought before the justice that same evening if a justice could have been found. But, for some reason not explained, the officer of excise goes first to one justice of the peace and then to another, and none of the justices chooses to entertain the jurisdiction, till at last forty-eight hours after the man had been taken the excise officer does find a gentleman of the name of Torrance who does entertain the jurisdiction and convicts him. It appears to me, therefore, that this unreasonable detention, which seems to have been the only ground on which the Court of Session proceeded, entirely falls to the ground. It was not a question that could come into contest before the justice even if the facts had warranted it; and in truth the facts would not warrant it if it had come before the justice. That may be considered as a question of substance: all the other questions are questions really and entirely of form. I had at one time a doubt whether the conviction was drawn up in the proper form; but I think that what was pointed out by my noble and learned friend is unanswerable on that subject, namely, that the substance being right, the authority of the Court of Session to inquire into the form is taken away by the 79th section of the statute. That the court had jurisdiction to inquire into such matter if it had appeared on the face of the proceedings that the justice was acting without jurisdiction, I can entertain no doubt. I do not think that the statute meant to give exclusive jurisdiction to any justice of the peace or to any tribunal, to imprison one of her Majesty's subjects, without its being distinctly shown on what ground he was imprisoned, and that he was lawfully imprisoned; but all the rest being entirely a matter of form, the right of suspension is taken entirely away. Upon the whole, therefore, I think that the Court of Session have certainly come to an erroneous conclusion, and that the decision must be reversed.

EVANS v. McLOUGHLAN.

LORD CHELMSFORD.—My Lords, I agree with my noble and learned friend upon the woolsack, that the general jurisdiction of the Court of Session is not taken away by any of the provisions of the Acts to which reference has been made. If, therefore, the magistrate had been acting without any jurisdiction, I apprehend that it would have been competent to the Court of Session to have entertained these proceedings. But supposing the magistrate has jurisdiction, then, according to the opinion of my noble and learned friend upon the woolsack, in which I entirely agree; the 79th section of the 7 & 8 Geo. 4, c. 53, took away from the Court of Session the power of granting a note of suspension. Therefore, in this case, the real substantial question is, whether the magistrate had or had not jurisdiction under the circumstances over the particular case. Now I confess that, upon the question of the magistrate's jurisdiction, I am unable to agree either with the conclusion at which the Court of Session arrived, or with the reasons which they have given for that conclusion. They thought that the proceeding under the 33rd section of the 7 & 8 Geo. 4, c. 53, was incompetent, in consequence of what they regarded to be an illegal detention of the resp. because he was not brought before the justice in the manner prescribed and authorised by the statute; that it ceased to be a proceeding, an immediate arrest under the Act, from the nature of the detention, the resp. not being conveyed before the justice by the excise officer, but being brought up as a prisoner in the hands of the gaoler. It is to be observed that, upon this single point, upon which the Court of Session decided, the Lord Ordinary seemed rather to be of opinion that the detention or imprisonment, or whatever it is to be called, was not sufficient in itself to make out the conviction bad; and I think it is perfectly clear that it could not have that effect. For, let us look to the object and to the words of the 33rd section of the Act, upon which the question turns. The object of that section of the Act was to provide for the immediate apprehension of offenders who were likely to escape from justice. And, accordingly, it empowers the officer, where any person is discovered assisting in the illegal manufacture, that is the illicit distillation of spirits, to arrest and detain every person so discovered, and to convey him or her before one or more justice or justices, &c.; so that the officer is empowered to arrest and detain. Arrest and detention are here in a certain sense synonymous terms. But inasmuch as the officer is to convey the offender before a magistrate, there must necessarily be some detention following the arrest, in order to enable him to perform his duty in that respect. Now, detention is of various kinds. It may be by the officer keeping hold of the person that he has so arrested and detaining him in that manner. It may be by locking him up in a room under the charge of some persons who are intrusted to watch over him, while the officer goes for the purpose of finding some justice of the peace. And it is admitted on the part of the resp. that such detention would be lawful in every case where the room, or the parties who were watching that room, were under the control of the officer. But it is said that in this particular case, the man having been lodged in a gaol, from that moment the detention ended in the sense of the Act of Parliament, and that the new species of custody in the nature of an imprisonment changed the character of the detention, and made the party no longer under the control of the officer. Now, it appears to me that you cannot, by using the term incarceration or imprisonment, alter the nature of the thing. It may still be detention, although the detention is in a gaol or lock-up house, and not in a private house, in which it is admitted that the detention would be lawful under the Act of Parliament. Because, after all, the persons have the control over and the custody of the offender. It is not a change of custody as long as they are holding him upon the authority of the officer and further purpose of detaining him under the Act of Parliament. Now, when the party under these circumstances is brought before the magistrate, I quite concur with my noble and learned friend (Lord Cranworth) that the magistrate has nothing to do with the mode in which the party has been dealt with after he has been arrested. When he is discovered, and immediately arrested by the officer, then the jurisdiction of the magistrate would attach, and it would be no part of the duty of the magistrate to inquire, when he found that there had been a delay, as in this instance, of two days, why it was that the party arrested flagrante delicto was not immediately brought before him. The whole of his duty is to ascertain whether the offence has been committed, whether the party was discovered assisting in the illegal distillation, and if he were so discovered, and immediately arrested, that is quite sufficient to give the magistrate jurisdiction, and the magistrate has no duty to inquire further or to ascertain whether since his arrest he has been actually in the immediate keeping of the officer, or whether he has been in some other custody, but still under the charge of the officer, and under his control. This case was likened by the Lord Justice Clerk to the Scotch case of Hay v. Linton, and yet it is impossible to conceive any one thing more distinguishable from another than the case of Hay v. Linton from the present case. What was the case of Hay v. Linton? It was a proceeding under an Act of Parliament which authorised constables to bring before a magistrate any child under fourteen of years of age found wandering in the streets without any home, proper guardianship, or visible means of subsistence, and the magistrate was authorised, if no person appeared after intimation being given to provide for the child and find security to that effect, to order such young person forthwith to be transmitted and received at any reformatory school. Now, when a destitute child is brought before a magistrate under the provision of that Act, it is quite clear that when intimation has been made, the child is to be taken care of in the mean time until it can be ascertained whether any person will appear and give the requisite security. But in that case, instead of taking care of the child in that manner, the magistrate granted a warrant to detain the child in the cells of the police office. Therefore, when the child was brought up after the period of intimation had expired, it was insisted, or rather it was afterwards insisted, when the child had been sent to the reformatory, that the jurisdiction of the magistrate had ceased, because the character and condition of the child had altogether changed; and so the Lord Justice Clerk puts it very clearly. When the order was afterwards pronounced, the child was no longer before the magistrate in the position contemplated by the statute—that is, brought before him immediately upon being found in the streets in a state of destitution—but, on the contrary, was brought up as a prisoner from the cells of the police. Now, what possible analogy can there be between that case and the present? The character of the immediate arrest changed in this case by reason of the subsequent detention. Is there any change in the evidence to prove that the party was discovered in the act of illicit distillation? It is clear that the analogy between the two cases altogether fails, and that there was nothing whatever in the circumstances of the detention, even supposing it had been an illegal detention, which would take away from the magistrate that jurisdiction which attached to him under the Act by reason of the discovery which was made of the party and the immediate arrest upon that discovery. I wish that it may be understood that I do not intend to express any opinion which might countenance the delay which took place upon the present occasion in carrying the offender before a magistrate. My noble and learned friend (Lord Cranworth) thinks that there was no unnecessary delay, and we may be right in that respect. But I am bound to say that, even if there was an improper delay, the officer was placed in a situation of great difficulty and embarrassment in consequence of the refusal of one or more of the magistrates to hear the case. However, I am so perfectly clear with regard to the question as to the jurisdiction of the magistrate not being taken away, that I could not have entertained any doubt whatever upon the subject, if it had not been for the very high respect which I entertain for the judgment of the learned judges of the Court of Session who have decided this question. With regard to the other objections which have been raised, in my opinion they are really very frivolous. I entirely concur with the opinion which has been expressed by my noble and learned friends, and I think that upon the present occasion the decision ought to be reserved. Decision reversed.

V. C. STUART'S COURT.

Reported by JAMES B. DAVIDSON, Esq., of Lincoln's-Inn, Barrister-at-Law.

Wednesday, March 13.

CARDINALL v. MOLYNEUX.

Scheme for fitting up the interior of a church certified to and approved by the court—Incumbent ordered to take and concur in proceedings for obtaining a faculty—Injunction.

The deft. M., who was the incumbent of a perpetual curacy, without the consent of the churchwardens or parishioners, and without having obtained a faculty, employed the deft. G., a builder, to remove the pews, sittings, and a gallery from the parish church. This was effected by the deft. G. on the 30th March 1859. On the same day another deft. (R., an auctioneer) advertised the materials so to be taken out of the church for sale on the following day. A bill for an injunction was filed by the plt., one of the churchwardens, on behalf of himself and all the other parishioners, on the 31st March; and an injunction was obtained and served on the defts. the same day. On the 4th April a supplemental bill was filed by the plt. against the incumbent M. and the deft. G., stating that the deft. G. was now proceeding to take up the floor of the church, and to place brickwork there, with the view of substituting chairs and benches for pews. On the 21st April the motion came on for hearing, but was adjourned. On the same day, a number of chairs, about 200, were placed in the church, and divine service was resumed on the 24th April. On the 12th May an injunction was granted, restraining the defts. from altering the floor, &c., with liberty to both parties to lay proposals before the judge in chambers, for fitting up the interior of the church, and providing proper accommodation therein for the minister and parishioners, such proposals to be subject to the approbation of the bishop and archdeacon of the diocese. Proposals were sent in by both parties, and returned with the bishop's observations. The bishop said he had the strongest objection to chairs. The whole papers were sent to the chief clerk, who prepared a scheme, which was approved by the bishop and archdeacon, and finally by the judge:

On motion to make the injunction perpetual, a perpetual injunction was granted; the defts. were decreed to take and concur in all necessary proceedings for the purpose of obtaining a faculty; and the costs of the suits were ordered to be paid by the defts.

This was a motion on behalf of the plt. for a perpetual injunction against the defts. the Rev. John William Henry Molyneux and George Grimwood to the effect prayed by the first and second paragraphs of the original bill, and by the second paragraph of the supplemental bill; and that the defts. in the two suits, or some or one of them, might pay the costs of the two suits respectively.

The original bill was filed by George Cardinall on behalf of himself and all other the parishioners of the parish of St. Gregory, in the borough of Sudbury, against the Rev. Mr. Molyneux, William Rowland Rolfe and George Grimwood. The statements in the original bill were to the following effect:—The plt. Mr Cardinall was one of the churchwardens of the parish of St. Gregory, Sudbury, which was a perpetual curacy, of which Mr. Molyneux was the incumbent, the number of inhabitants being more than 1000. About nine months before the filing of the bill, Mr. Molyneux caused the church to be closed for the purpose of effecting certain repairs in the roof. This proceeding was taken without the consent of the plt. or of the parishioners, and without the immediate authority of the bishop. The bishop's surveyor afterwards reported the repairs, and it was then considered that Mr. Molyneux was no longer acting without the bishop's authority. On the 30th March 1859 Mr. Molyneux caused the pews of the church, and also a large gallery at the west end, to be cut down, severed, and removed. For this purpose he employed the deft. George Grimwood, who was a builder; and on the same day the deft. Mr. Rolfe, who was an auctioneer, published a placard in Sudbury advertising for sale on the following day a quantity of building materials, consisting of doors, door-frames, sashes, casements, two staircases, panneling, &c., arising from the repairs of the church of St. Gregory. Mr. Cardinall and other parishioners on the morning of the 31st March served Mr. Grimwood with a notice addressed to all three defts., not to remove, sell, or dispose of the pews and sittings, or the materials thereof, and that it was his intention to apply for an injunction. The bill was filed on the same day.

It prayed (para. 1 and 2) that the defts. Molyneux and Grimwood, and their respective agents, &c., might be restrained by injunction from further destroying, cutting down, severing, or removing the pews and sittings of or in the said church, or any of them, or the gallery of the said church, or any of the other internal fixtures and fittings of the said church, or any of the materials or pannelled work forming the said pews, sittings, gallery fixtures and fittings respectively, or of which the same respectively are or were composed; and that the said defts. might be restrained from selling, or disposing of, or putting up, or exposing, or offering for sale, or holding any sale by auction, of the building materials and pannelled work mentioned in the said published notice or advertisement or particulars of sale before mentioned, or any of them, or the said pews, gallery fixtures and fittings respectively, or any of them, or any of the materials or pannelled work of which the same respectively was composed.

An injunction restraining the sale was granted by Stuart, V.C. on the same day, the 31st March. In the afternoon of that day a telegraphic despatch, containing notice of the order, was served upon Mr. Rolfe, at about half-past four o'clock, whilst he was actually selling lot 84 on the Market-hill, at Sudbury. The plt.'s evidence went to show that Mr. Rolfe disregarded the notice, and went on with the sale for about half an hour afterwards; also that George Grimwood was standing by; that he knew of the contents of the dispatch, but nevertheless assisted to continue the sale. Mr. Grimwood denied that he knew of any telegraphic message whatever having been sent till seven o'clock in the evening. Mr. Rolfe said he did not believe that lot 84 contained boards from the church. He said he did not know the contents of the paper till he had sold lot 84, and that none of the other lots, which were ten in number, contained any materials from the church. Regular notice of the injunction was served on all the defts. in the course of the evening, but there was some conflict of evidence as to the time of service. Mr. Drew, the clerk, whose evidence was confirmed by Mr. Gooday, the plt.'s solicitor, said he served it on Grimwood at a quarter past five, on Mr. Molyneux at about twenty minutes to six, and on Mr. Rolfe about eight. Mr. Grimwood said that no notice was served on him until at least half-past six. Notice of motion on the 4th April ensuing, to commit the defts. Grimwood and Rolfe for contempt, was served on them the same evening.

CARDINALL v. MOLYNEUX.

[V.C. S.]

On or about the 4th April 1859 the plt. George Cardinall filed a supplemental bill on behalf of himself and all the parishioners of St. George's Sudbury, against the Rev. Mr. Molyneux and George Grimwood. It stated that, notwithstanding the order of the 31st March, Mr. Molyneux having removed the pews and sittings, was then taking or pulling up the floor of the church, and placing brickwork there with the intention of raising portions of the floor, and substituting chairs and benches for pews, and was, in fact, so altering the floor of the church and the materials of which it was formed, as to render the same unsuitable for pews. Mr. Molyneux was also about to remove the west window of the church and to place a new window in lieu thereof. He was also causing a hole to be cut in the brickwork of the outer wall on the south side of the church for the purpose of effecting some alteration the nature of which was unknown to the plt. The deft. Grimwood was the person employed in carrying out these alterations, which were being made without the consent of the plt. as one of the churchwardens, without the consent of the parishioners, or of the bishop, and without any licence or faculty in that behalf. The supplemental bill prayed that the defts., their agents, &c., might be restrained from taking up or altering, or causing to be taken up or altered, the floor of the said church, or altering or causing to be altered, any of the walls or brickwork of or in the said church, or executing or causing to be executed any works or alterations affecting the floor, walls, or brickwork of the said church, or affecting the internal arrangement or structure of the said church or any of the pannelled work, fixtures, or fittings pertaining thereto (and further by amendment on the 26th May 1860), "until a faculty for the purpose had been duly obtained."

The supplemental bill also prayed (par. 2) that the defts., or one of them, might be decreed to account for and pay to the parishioners of the said parish or the churchwardens of the said parish, for and on account of the parishioners, the value (to be ascertained in such manner as the court should think fit) of the said pews, sittings, gallery fixtures and fittings so destroyed or removed as aforesaid, and of all and every other the materials and effects belonging or pertaining to the said church which had been destroyed, removed, or taken away by or under the direction of the defts. or either of them, and should replace or restore, or pay the costs and charges of replacing and restoring, the said pews, sittings, gallery fixtures, fittings, materials and effects.

On the 20th April an interim order for an injunction against the two defts. Mr. Molyneux and Grim-wood in the terms of the first paragraph of the prayer of the supplemental bill, i.e. restraining them from altering the floor of the church, &c., was granted until the following day; and on the 21st April the injunction was enlarged till the 5th May, and the motion on behalf of the plt. to attach the defts. Grimwood and Rolfe for contempt of the injunction of the 31st March, was also ordered to stand over to the same date.

From the evidence it appeared that on the same day, the 21st April, Mr. Molyneux and Mr. Hasell his churchwarden issued handbills to the effect that, notwithstanding the incomplete state of the repairs of the church, in order to carry out the original intention, and to prevent disappointment to the parishioners, it was determined to use the church in the afternoon in its present rough and disordered state. On the same day a large number of chairs, about 200, were placed in the church; and divine service was held in the church in the afternoon of Easter Sunday, the 24th April following.

The two motions again stood over from the 5th to the 12th May. On the latter day the V.C., after hearing the evidence, granted an injunction restraining the defts. Mr. Molyneux and Grimwood in the terms of the first paragraph of the prayer of the supplemental bill, and ordered that the plt. and defts., and any of the churchwardens of the parish, should be at liberty to lay before the judge in chambers proposals for filling up the interior of the church and providing proper accommodation therein for the ministers and parishioners of the parish, for the performance of divine service, such proposals to be subject to the approbation of the bishop and archdeacon of the diocese of Ely.

On the motion to attach the defts. Grimwood and Rolfe, his Honour, after observing that there appeared to have been no deliberate intention to break the injunction, and remarking upon the conflict of evidence as to the time of service, said, that the conduct of the defts. had been improper, and in contempt of court; and ordered the defts. Messrs. Grimwood and Rolfe to pay 15*l.* each towards the costs of the motion; and on their expressing their contrition, made no further order on the motion.

In compliance with the above order, the plt. and the defts. each sent in proposals. The main point of difference was as to the pews. The plt. proposed that the pews which had been removed should be replaced. The defts. proposed to find benches for seating the congregation, as far as the present seating by chairs and benches was insufficient. As to the gallery also, at the west end of the church, the plt. proposed that it should be replaced on a plan to be approved by the bishop, and the organ restored therein. The defts. proposed to erect the organ at the east end of the north aisle, and to open and glaze the west window, which was partially bricked up. These proposals were laid before the bishop, who made several observations thereon. As to the pews, he said he had the strongest objection to chairs. He was not averse to a gallery with an organ therein, but not having a plan of the church before him, he could form no opinion whether it should be on the old site. He repeatedly and strongly urged that nothing could be carried into effect without a faculty. Further replies were sent by the plt. and observations returned by the bishop, and the whole of the documents were laid before the chief clerk. The matter stood over for a time to enable Mr. Molyneux to apply for a faculty.

In May 1860 the deft. Mr. Molyneux and James Hasell, churchwarden, presented a petition to the chancellor of the diocese of Ely, praying for a faculty to perform the works set forth in the petition; and a citation was issued under the seal of the chancellor of the diocese. It recited the petition, alleging that the following further works were required to complete the restoration of the church: the floor of the church to be completed, the pulpit to be re-erected in its former position, and the sounding-board to be removed; a new reading-desk to be erected; the font to be placed at the north-west end of the nave; the organ to be placed at the east end of the north aisle. In addition to the present accommodation, to complete the seating of the church with benches similar to the best of those now in the church, the bricks which at present block up part of the west window to be removed, and glass substituted, and the windows of the church generally repaired, and where necessary re-glazed, and the walls repaired. The petition alleged further that a meeting of the incumbent, church-wardens, parishioners and inhabitants of the parish was held in vestry on the 10th May 1860, at which the said proposed works were approved; and that the cost, estimated at 270*l.*, was intended to be raised, and was for the most part already raised, by voluntary subscription, without a church-rate. The citation then recited the prayer for a faculty, and cited the parishioners to appear and show cause against the faculty before the surrogate at St. Mary's Church, Cambridge, on the 26th May.

The "present accommodation" referred to in the petition was the providing of loose chairs instead of benches or pews.

The court was adjourned until the 9th June. On the 7th June Mr. Gooday, the plt.'s solicitor, as he deposed, called with the plt. George Cardinall upon Mr. Molyneux, for the purpose of endeavouring to come to some terms or arrangement respecting the fitting up of the church, but Mr. Molyneux declined any such arrangement. On Saturday the 9th June Mr. Gooday attended the hearing of the application for the faculty on behalf of the plt. and other inhabitants. He stated in his affidavit that he opposed the granting of such faculty, except in strict accordance with the decision and approval of the bishop. Mr. Molyneux also attended, and refused to modify or alter his application. Thereupon, after hearing both sides, the Court refused to decree the faculty, on the ground, as Mr. Gooday alleged, that the deft. "did not propose to carry out the refitting of the said church in accordance with the bishop's suggestions and approval."

The chief clerk made his certificate, dated the 3rd Dec. 1860, whereby he certified that, in pursuance of the order of the 12th May 1859, the plt. and the deft. Mr. Molyneux had each laid before the judge proposals for fitting up the interior of the church and providing better accommodation, &c.; and that it would be fit and proper that such interior should be fitted up, and such accommodation provided according to the plan thereto annexed; which plan had been approved of by the bishop and archdeacon of the diocese of Ely, as was admitted by the plt. and defts. The plan was as follows:—"1. The church to be properly floored and fitted up with single pews, according to the plan of pews in modern churches, or with open benches. The question of the general style and character of the pews or benches to be settled in the proceedings requisite for obtaining a faculty. 2. The font to be placed at the west end of the church. 3. The pulpit to be lowered, and a new reading-desk erected, as shown on plan; and the sounding-board to be removed. The pulpit and reading-desk to be in character with the general fittings of the church. 4. The organ to be placed as shown on the plan (i. e. between the north aisle and the chancel). 5. The west window of the church to be opened, and properly glazed."

The V. C. approved the certificate on the 10th Dec.

Bacon, Q.C. and T. H. Terrell now supported the motion in the terms above mentioned.

Malins, Q.C. and Surrage appeared for the defts.—

The only question remaining was as to the costs of the suits. They contended that Mr. Molyneux's proposals were reasonable in themselves, and were supported by the views of a large portion of the inhabitants of the parish.

The VICE-CHANCELLOR said he thought he could not refuse the plt. his costs. There would be one order in both suits. The injunction to be made perpetual in the terms of the notice of motion. The defts. must be decreed to take, and concur in, all necessary proceedings for the purpose of obtaining a faculty for repairing and restoring the church, according to the scheme set forth in the schedule to the chief clerk's certificate, with liberty to all parties to apply. The costs of the suit, other than the costs of the motion to commit, must be paid by the defts.

GRUBB v. THE INCLOSURE COMMISSIONERS.

Inclosure—Setting out private roads over lands allotted by Inclosure Commissioners, no mention of such roads being made in the provisional order.

The Inclosure Commissioners having by their provisional order apportioned certain lands to the plaintiff, the valuer proceeded to set out a private road over part of it, which was objected to by the plaintiff, who contended that the valuer had no right to do so, as no mention was made in the provisional order of such road:

Held, that under sect. 68 of 8 & 9 Vict. c. 118, and sect. 4 of 11 & 12 Vict. c. 99, the valuer had power to set out such road, notwithstanding there was no mention of it in the provisional order.

This was a rule calling on the plaintiff to show cause why a prohibition issued out of the Petty Bag-office against the Inclosure Commissioners, ordering them to cease operations in the inclosure of lands in the parish of Hughenden, in the county of Buckingham, should not be set aside. The commons and waste lands being about to be inclosed, by the provisional order certain lands were allotted to the plaintiff, over which the valuer set out a private road, and the question was whether under the Inclosure Acts the valuer had such power, no mention of the road having been made in the provisional order.

Lush, Q.C. (Couch with him) showed cause.—The question is, as to whether the commissioners in setting out this road have exceeded their jurisdiction and acted in violation of the provisional order. I maintain that, inasmuch as no mention was made in the provisional order which allotted this land to the plaintiff of any road to be made over such land, the valuer had not power to set it out.

Bovill, Q.C. (White with him) appeared in support of the rule.—The 68th section of 8 & 9 Vict. c. 118, and the 4th section of 11 & 12 Vict. c. 99, give the valuer discretionary powers in setting out roads, and he has done no more than these sections authorise him to do.

ERLE, C. J.—I am of opinion that the rule to set aside this prohibition should be made absolute, as I do not think, as has been contended for, that the commissioners have exceeded their authority by setting out a private road over the close allotted to the plaintiff, he having taken the close subject to the provisions of the Inclosure Acts. The 8 & 9 Vict. c. 118, seems to have contemplated the setting out of private ways, and has given the commissioners power to do so, when in their discretion they may consider that they are required. In sect. 34 it is said that the instructions to the valuer are to be "not inconsistent" with the provisional order; sect. 61 also provides that what is done by the valuer is not to be inconsistent with the conditions and instructions hereinbefore mentioned; and sect. 62 says that the valuer shall and may, before making allotments of the land to be inclosed in pursuance of, or in any manner not "inconsistent" with the instructions given to such valuer, as aforesaid, set out and make public roads and ways; but in sect. 68, which relates to the power of the valuer to set out private roads, the words "not inconsistent" are omitted, the words being "as he shall think requisite for the use of the persons interested in such lands or any of them." I am of opinion that the plaintiff has had this allotment assigned to him subject to these provisions. The words in sect. 4 of 11 & 12 Vict. c. 99, giving the valuer power to set out private roads, are very wide, and give the commissioners a jurisdiction which I do not consider they have exceeded.

WILLIAMS, J.—I am entirely of the same opinion, and as at present advised, giving the true construction to the provisional order, I think that the commissioners had power under sect. 68 to subject this allotment to have a private road made over it. It is said that the valuer has not acted according to the provisional order, but I do not think so, and I see nothing in the order which precludes him from dealing with this allotment in the same way as with the others. It has been said that the valuer having so much power he might do something which would be unjust, but we must deal with this case in the same way as the case of Stockdale v. Hansard, 8 Dowl. 669, and assume that he would not abuse his power.

KEATING, J.—I also am of opinion that the commissioners have not exceeded their jurisdiction in setting out this private road. It is of great importance that the terms of the Act should be strictly adhered to; and as to this provisional order, I think the meaning of it is, that the plaintiff was to take the lands allotted to him subject to the provisions of the Act, and therefore this rule must be made absolute. Rule absolute.

THE TRUSTEES OF THE MERSEY DOCKS v. CAMERON.
Non-liability to pay poor-rate by reason of the occupation not being beneficial—Exemption is a ground of appeal, and an action in respect of a levy made to enforce the rate cannot be maintained.

Where property has been rated to the poor-rate, and it has been decided that such property is exempted by reason of the occupation not being beneficial, the party so rated cannot maintain an action of replevin for a levy made to enforce such rate, but he must seek his remedy by an appeal to the quarter sessions.

This was an action of replevin brought by the plts. against the defts. for the taking and detaining of certain goods and chattels of the plts., and by the consent of the parties a case was stated for the opinion of the court, which, however, it is not necessary to set out, as the main question, which was whether the plts. had such a beneficial occupation of the dock estate as to render them liable to be rated to the relief of the poor, has been already decided by the court in the negative in the case of The Mersey Docks and Harbour Board v. Jones, 3 L. T. Rep. N. S. 212.

Another question was, however, left to the court, viz., whether if the plts. were not liable to be rated they could maintain their action.

On behalf of the defts. it was contended that, even if the plts. were not liable to be rated by reason of their occupation not being beneficial, this exemption furnished only a ground of appeal to the court of quarter sessions against the rate, and not for an action in respect of a levy made to enforce the rate.

ERLE, C. J.—When the case of The Mersey Dock Trustees v. Jones, 8 C. B. 114, was before us, we thought ourselves bound by the authority of the decision of Reg. v. The Inhabitants of Liverpool, 7 B. & C. 61. The present case involves the same point, and if no other question had been raised we should have deferred giving our judgment until the Court of Ex. Ch. should have affirmed or reversed our decision. But a second point has been raised on the part of the defts., viz., that even if the plts. are not liable to be rated by reason of their occupation not being beneficial, this exemption furnishes only a ground of appeal to the quarter sessions, and not for an action in respect of a levy made to enforce the rate. In support of this contention the cases of The Overseers of Birmingham v. Shaw, 10 Q. B. 868; Reg. v. Bradshaw, 29 L. J. 176, M. C., were cited. It cannot be denied that these deliberate decisions of the Court of Q. B. are directly in point in favour of the defts., and we think it is our duty to defer to them, and to leave all further argument respecting them for the consideration of a court of error. Possibly the two points may resolve themselves into one, viz., whether there can ever be an exemption from the liability to rate where there is an actual occupation by the person rated; in other words, whether the true ground on which an occupation for public purposes has been held an exemption be not that in such cases the occupation was that of the public, and there was not an occupation at all by the person rated, and whether, therefore, the principle is not inapplicable whenever there is an actual occupation notwithstanding he derives no individual benefit from his occupation. If this be so, the actual occupation may well be regarded as bringing the case within the statute of Elizabeth, so as to render an appeal to the sessions the only proper mode of disputing the propriety of the rate; but if the exemption be regarded as based on the doctrine that the word "occupier" in the stat. Eliz., which gave powers to raise money of every occupier of land ought to be construed to mean "beneficial occupier," then it is certainly more difficult to understand the principle on which the decision in Birmingham v. Shaw proceeded; because, if this be so, the statute may be read as if the words of it were "every beneficial occupier;" how then can a valid rate be made on an occupier who is not a beneficial one? Surely, there can be no distinction in such a construction of the statute between a man not an actual occupier of any rateable property who clearly is not put to an appeal, and a man not a beneficial occupier, seeing, that if the statute be so read, one is just as much out of the reach of it as the other. Judgment for defendants.

REG. v. LEATHAM.

Evidence—Clue to document—Privilege of protection—Corrupt Practices Act—Appeal.

Q. B.]

REG. v. LEATHAM.

[Q. B.]

If a confession of a crime be improperly obtained so as to be inadmissible in evidence, yet if in the course of such confession a clue is given to other evidence which will prove the case, such latter evidence is admissible.

Where a document cannot be produced by reason of privilege, independent secondary evidence of it is admissible.

On an inquiry before commissioners under the 15 & 16 Vict. c. 57, to examine as to corrupt practices at an election for a member of Parliament, a letter was produced, written by A., the party suspected of bribery, to his agent, in answer to one from the agent, asking for an account of sums advanced; this letter was produced by the agent. On an information being subsequently filed against A., this letter was called for and produced by the secretary to the commissioners, in whose hands it had remained, and on the letter of the agent to which it was an answer being called for, and not being produced, secondary evidence of it was tendered and admitted:

Held, that such evidence was properly admitted, and that the provision in 15 & 16 Vict. c. 57, s. 8, that "no statement made by any person in answer to any question put by a commissioner, shall, except in cases of indictment for perjury, committed in such answers, be admissible in evidence in any proceeding, civil or criminal," was not applicable, and did not prevent the admission of such evidence.

There is no appeal from the decision of this court on a rule for a new trial of an information at the suit of the Attorney-General.

This was an information at the suit of the Attorney-General against the defendant, for certain offences against the Corrupt Practices Act, alleged to have been committed at the Wakefield election. It was tried before Martin, B. at York, when a verdict was returned for the Crown. Subsequently a rule was obtained to set aside that verdict, and for a new trial, on the ground that there was no evidence of a payment being made to a person named Gilbert in support of the first count of the information, and that the contents of a certain letter, written by a person named Wainwright, an agent of the defendant, to the defendant, and the defendant's letter in answer to Wainwright, had been improperly admitted in evidence.

The Solicitor-General, Overend, Q.C., Monk, Q.C., and Cleasby now showed cause.—[The Crown having determined to enter a nolle prosequi on the first count, the question as to the admission of the letters in evidence alone remained.] The two letters in question were dated respectively the 4th and 5th April 1859. The first was written by Wainwright to the defendant, asking for an account of sums advanced by him for election purposes, and was put in evidence in order to explain what the defendant's letter of the 5th Aug. was an answer to. This last-named letter was in the following terms:—"Hemsworth-hall, Pontefract, Aug. 5, 1859. Dear Sir,—In reply to your inquiry I beg to hand on the other side the sums of money which were advanced by myself and friends for election purposes, &c. Signed, W. HENRY LEATHAM;" and then followed a list of sums amounting in all to about 446l. 18s. 8d. The defendant had been summoned to attend before the commissioners on the Wakefield election, and questions were then put to him which he answered. He was also summoned to produce papers, &c. in his possession. His examination took place in October, and in November following Mr. Wainwright, who was also summoned as a witness, sent in the defendant's letter of the 5th Aug. to Mr. Dew, the secretary of the commissioners, who produced it on the trial of this information, and it was then found to be in defendant's handwriting. The other letter of the 4th Aug. defendant had notice to produce, but not having done so, secondary evidence of it was received in the usual manner.

Sir F. Kelly, Q.C., Edward James, Q.C., Price and Quain were called on in support of the rule.—The 15 & 16 Vict. c. 57, introduced a principle and practice unknown before. The 6th section provides for inquiry into the existence of corrupt practices at elections; and such commissioners are to report to her Majesty, and their reports are by the 7th section to be laid before Parliament. The 8th section enacts that it shall be lawful for such commissioners by summons under their hand and seal, or under the hand and seal of any one of them, to require the attendance before them of any persons whomsoever, whose evidence in the judgment of such commissioner or commissioners may be material to the subject-matter of the inquiry to be made by such commissioners, and to require all persons to bring before them such books, papers, deeds and writings as to such commissioners or commissioner appear necessary for arriving at the truth of the things to be inquired into by them under the Act. It then enacts that all such persons shall attend such commissioners, and shall answer all questions put to them by such commissioners touching the matters to be inquired into by them, and shall produce all books, papers, deeds and writings required of them and in their custody, or under their control, according to the tenor of the summons. It then provides "that no statement made by any person in answer to any question put by such commissioner shall, except in cases of indictment for perjury committed in such answers, be admissible in evidence in any proceeding civil or criminal." The 9th section enacts, for the more effectually prosecuting any inquiry under the Act, that every person who has been engaged in any corrupt practice at or connected with any election of a member of Parliament, and gives evidence touching such corrupt practice before the commissioners, and who upon such examination makes a true discovery to the best of his knowledge touching all things to which he is so examined, shall be freed from all penal actions, forfeitures, punishments, disabilities and incapacities, and all criminal prosecutions to which he might have been or might become liable or subject at the suit of her Majesty for anything done by such person or persons in respect of such corrupt practice; and that no person shall be excused from answering any question put to him by such commissioners on the ground of any privilege, or on the ground that the answer to such question would tend to criminate such person. The 10th section enacts that when any witness is so examined as aforesaid, he shall not be indemnified under the Act unless he receive from the commissioners a certificate in writing under their hands, stating that he has upon his examination made a true disclosure touching all things on which he was so examined; and that if any action, information, or indictment shall be at any time pending in any court against any person so examined as a witness for any corrupt practice at any election to which the inquiry made by such commissioners has reference, such court shall, on the production and proof of such certificate, stay the proceedings in any such action, information, or indictment, and may in its discretion award to such person such costs as he may have been put to by such action, information, or indictment. The 11th section gives the power to the commissioners to examine witnesses on oath; and the 12th section contains provisos for compelling the attendance of witnesses, and to compel them to answer questions and produce documents. The proviso in the 8th section, that no statement shall be admissible in any proceeding applies to statements in writing as well as verbal statements, and any document produced under that Act is a "statement" which cannot be admitted in evidence. [BLACKBURN, J.—The written document in question was written prior to the statement made to the commissioners, and was evidence prior to that statement. Is there anything in the Act which says that that which was evidence before shall cease to be evidence?] The defendant's letter was not evidence before he was examined and made his statement; its existence was not known, and could not have been known but for this act; its existence was found out by the examination of the defendant. If the court should be of opinion that this rule should be discharged, I shall ask leave to appeal. [CROMPTON, J.—What in a criminal matter? The Act giving an appeal does not apply to criminal cases. It is clear there is no appeal. HILL, J.—The way in which this question arises should be distinctly understood. The defendant's letter was not given, sent, or produced by Leatham to the commissioners—it was produced by Wainwright; then, as to the other letter, notice was given to Leatham to produce it, and he did not do so, and then secondary evidence of it was properly received.] The privilege and the protection must be equally large; wherever, if the privilege had been claimed, the evidence would have been excluded, the protection extends. Whenever a man is compelled to answer and produce, he is protected; here the first clue to the letter proceeded from the defendant. [CROMPTON, J.—Suppose you, by threats and promises, obtained a confession of murder which would not be admissible, but you also obtain a clue to a place where a written confession may be found, or where the body of the person murdered is secreted; could not that latter evidence be made use of because the first clue to it came from the murderer? It matters not how you get it; if you steal it even, it would be admissible in evidence. [BLACKBURN, J.—I never heard of a case where a man served with a subpoena duces tecum claimed his privilege. I know it is so laid down in Taylor on Evidence, but the cases do not bear it out.] It is also so laid down in Starkie and Phillips. [BLACKBURN, J.—How often are documents taken out of a prisoner's pocket and produced against him; you would say he might claim his privilege.] There they are obtained by physical force; but suppose the man was in the witness-box and said he had such a document in his pocket, but declined to produce it, as it would criminate him; he would be protected. The same rule applies to written and oral testimony in construing this statute.

Q. B.]

REG. v. WILMOT.

CROMPTON, J.—I am of opinion that this rule ought to be discharged. The matter is important; but I entertain no doubt as to the meaning of the Act of Parliament. The court has no means of sending the case to a higher court, but it is not a case of doubt and difficulty to make it necessary. It seems to me clear that the letter in question was not "a statement" made by the defendant in answer to a question by a commissioner so as to be within the proviso of the 8th section of the Act [his Lordship read the proviso]; that applies to statements made, and not to documents produced, which may be proved aliunde. It is the duty of the court to give full effect to the protection of the statute, and not to allow statements made to be given in evidence against the defendant. If it had been the intention of the Legislature, it would have been easy for it to say that no document should be given in evidence if the clue to its existence had been found by what a witness said on his examination. It is a maxim that no statement made by a prisoner can be given in evidence if it has been improperly obtained by threats or a promise; but nevertheless it is permitted to give in evidence the discoveries to which such statements might lead, such as the discovery of stolen property, or of a body. Suppose the defendant said that a letter would be found in his house; that statement would not exclude the document if it was found there. I think the proviso does not, by implication, exclude a document merely because it was referred to in the examination. [His Lordship said that Wightman, J., who had left the court, but who had heard the chief part of the argument, was of the same opinion.]

HILL, J.—I am of the same opinion. The rule might have been disposed of on the narrow ground that the letter of the 5th Aug. was not produced before the commissioners by the defendant, and therefore no privilege could attach; it was produced by Wainwright in obedience to the mandate of the commissioners. As to the letter of the 4th Aug., its contents were given in evidence without objection, and it was only put in evidence out of fairness to the defendant himself, to show to what his letter of the 5th was an answer. But even if objection had been taken to the admission of the letter of the 4th Aug. on the ground of privilege, the rule is that where a document cannot be produced by reason of privilege, independent secondary evidence is admissible. I do not, however, think there was any objection to the reception of the original. The court must look at the words of the Act of Parliament, and the object which the Legislature had in view; and unless there is something in the Act repugnant thereto, they ought to construe the words in their plain grammatical meaning. The 8th section says witnesses are to attend and answer questions, and produce documents; and the proviso says that no statement made by any person in answer to any question shall be given in evidence, but it says nothing about documents or books; it leaves them as they were before. The court would be making, not construing an Act of Parliament, if they were to put upon it the construction now contended for.

BLACKBURN, J.—I am also of the same opinion. The meaning of the Act was, that there should be a full and complete investigation. [His Lordship went through the several sections.] Then it is said that a document is not to be received against him, if a clue to it has been obtained from the witness; but it would require a great straining of the words to put such a construction on them; and if that were so I think the Act would rather tend to encourage than to stop corrupt practices. Therefore, putting such a construction on the Act, we must introduce words which, even if we thought it desirable, we have no power to do.

Rule discharged.

REG. v. WILMOT.

Habeas corpus—Possession of Government stores—Fine and imprisonment—Appeal.

Under the 40 Geo. 3, c. 89, ss. 18-20, a party may be subjected to a fine or imprisonment, at the discretion of the convicting magistrate for having unlawful possession of Government stores.

Where a person has been convicted and takes to prison under a warrant of commitment the entering into recognisances to prosecute an appeal does not operate as a suspension of the committal, and the person has no right to his discharge upon bail during the pendency of the appeal.

Rule nisi calling upon the keeper of the gaol of St. Augustine, near Canterbury, to show cause why a writ of habeas corpus should not issue to bring up the body of Wm. Wilmot, a prisoner, in order to his discharge upon the ground that he had been illegally committed to prison, or why the said prisoner should not be admitted to bail.

It appeared that the prisoner, a marine store dealer at Chatham, had been convicted by the acting superintendent of her Majesty's dockyard at Chatham under the 18th section of the 39 & 40 Geo. 3, c. 89, of unlawfully having in his possession certain property marked with the Admiralty mark known as "the broad arrow" and sentenced by him to three calendar months' imprisonment with hard labour.

The power of convicting offenders of such offences was formerly exercised by commissioners of the navy and justices of the peace, but such jurisdiction is now exercised by the superintendents of her Majesty's dockyards as well as by the justices: (2 Will. 4, c. 40, s. 11.)

The deft. after he was taken to prison on the usual warrant, gave notice of his intention to appeal to the quarter sessions under the 21st section, and having entered into recognisances at Canterbury, before a justice of the county, to prosecute his appeal, applied at chambers, to Blackburn, J., and afterwards to Wightman, J., to be admitted to bail, in order that he might prosecute and try his appeal, but some difficulty being experienced in granting that application the present rule was obtained either to discharge the prisoner on habeas corpus or to liberate him on bail.

The following are the material enactments applicable to the case:—

The 40 Geo. 3, c. 89, "An Act for the better preventing the embezzlement of his Majesty's naval, ordnance and victualling stores."

Sect. 18. And whereas it might tend to prevent the commission of offences if power were given to the commissioners of his Majesty's navy, ordnance and victualling, and his Majesty's justices of the peace out of sessions, to hear and determine offences in a summary way in cases where the stores found are of small value, and to fine or otherwise punish the offenders accordingly; be it therefore enacted, by the authority aforesaid, that from and after the passing of this Act, it shall and may be lawful to and for any principal officer or commissioner of the navy, ordnance, or victualling for the time being, or any justice of the peace for any county, division, city, town corporate, liberty, or place within this kingdom, to hear and determine any complaint against any person or persons (not being a contractor or contractors, or employed as aforesaid) for unlawfully selling or delivering, or causing or procuring to be sold or delivered, or for receiving or having in his, her, or their custody, possession, or keeping, or for concealing any stores of war, or naval, ordnance, or victualling stores, or goods marked with such marks respectively as are hereinbefore mentioned, of any value in the whole not exceeding 20s., which said commissioner or justice respectively is hereby authorised and required, upon any information exhibited, or complaint made in that behalf, at any time within three calendar months next after any such offence shall have been committed, to cause the party or parties accused to be apprehended and brought before him, or if he, she, or they shall have absconded or cannot be found, then to be summoned to appear before such commissioner or justice by a notice or summons left at his, her, or their last or usual place of abode, and also to cause the witnesses on either side to be summoned, and such commissioner or justice shall examine into the matter of fact, and upon due proof made thereof, either by the voluntary confession of the party or parties, or by the oath of one or more credible witness or witnesses (which oath the said commissioner or justice respectively is hereby authorised to administer), give judgment or sentence accordingly, and in case the party or parties accused shall be convicted of such offence, then it shall and may be lawful to and for such commissioner or justice of the peace respectively to inflict a fine of 10*l.* upon him, her, or them, for such his, her, or their offence, which said fine so inflicted shall be divided and distributed one moiety thereof to the informer or discoverer of the offence, and the other moiety thereof (the necessary charges for the recovery thereof being first deducted) to the treasurer of his Majesty's navy or ordnance as the case may be, to be by him applied in such manner as hereinbefore mentioned with respect to the produce of boats, barges, or other craft seized or sold under the authority of this Act, and to award and issue out his warrant under his hand and seal for levying such fine so adjudged on the goods of the offender or offenders, and to cause sale to be made thereof for payment of such fine and reasonable charges of distress (to be adjudged of by such commissioner or justice respectively) in case they shall not be redeemed within six days, rendering to the party the overplus, if any, and where sufficient goods of the party cannot be found to answer the said fine, to commit the said offender or offenders to the common gaol of the county, division, city, town corporate, liberty, or place for the space of three calendar months, unless such fine shall be sooner paid; or, in lieu of such fine, to cause such offender or offenders to be imprisoned and kept to hard labour in the house of correction for the space of three calendar months, as to such commissioner or justice of the peace respectively shall be thought fit; and every such commissioner or justice shall cause the amount of every such last-mentioned moiety of fine which he shall so receive, and also the moiety of every sum arising from the sale of any barge, boat, or other craft sold under the authority of this Act, and paid into his hands as aforesaid, to be paid into the hands of the said treasurer of the navy or ordnance within thirty days after the expiration of the year in which such fines shall be received by him, or in default thereof such commissioner or justice respectively shall forfeit the sum of 50*l.*, to be recovered with double costs of suit by any person or persons who shall sue for the same by action of debt, bill, plaint, or information in any of his Majesty's courts of record at Westminster, or Court of Exchequer in Scotland, wherein no essign, protection, or wager of law, nor more than one imparlance shall be allowed; one moiety of which last-mentioned fine shall go to his Majesty, his heirs and successors, and the other moiety thereof to him or them who shall sue for the same as aforesaid.

Sect. 20. Provided also and be it enacted, that in case such commissioner or justice of the peace shall, upon the hearing and determining of such complaint as aforesaid, adjudge the offender or offenders, in lieu of a fine, to be imprisoned and kept to hard labour as aforesaid, that then the informer or person or persons who shall have discovered such offender or offenders shall have and receive as a reward for such his, her, or their discovery, the sum of 5*l.* for every such offence so discovered, and the principal officers and commissioners of his Majesty's navy, ordnance, or victualling, as the case may require, shall cause the said reward of 5*l.* to be paid by the treasurer of the navy or ordnance respectively for the time being out of any public money in his hands, upon such informer or other person producing to them a certificate under the hand and seal of the commissioner or justice of the peace who shall have convicted such offender or offenders as aforesaid, certifying such conviction and the punishment which he hath inflicted on the offender or offenders, and the name or names of the person or persons who in his judgment is entitled, and in what proportion or proportions to such reward, which certificate the said commissioner or justice of the peace respectively is hereby required to give without fee or reward, and the money paid by any such treasurer on account of such last-mentioned reward shall be allowed in his accounts, and he shall be discharged thereof accordingly, any law, custom, or usage to the contrary thereof in any wise notwithstanding; provided also that no such summary proceeding as before mentioned shall be had before any justice of the peace under the authority of this Act without the consent in writing of the principal officers or commissioners of his Majesty's navy, ordnance, or victualling for the time being, or one of them, for that purpose first had and obtained, and that every adjudication or sentence to be had or given without such consent as aforesaid shall be null and void to all intents and purposes whatsoever.

Sect. 21. And be it further enacted, by the authority aforesaid, that if any person or persons shall find himself, herself, or themselves aggrieved by the judgment of any such commissioner or justice touching or concerning any such stores as last aforesaid under the value of 20s., then he, she, or they shall or may, upon entering into a recognisance to his Majesty, with one or more surety or sureties, to the satisfaction of such commissioner or justice, to the amount of treble the value of such fine, appeal to the justices of the peace at their next general quarter sessions of the peace for the county, division, city, town corporate, liberty, or place wherein the offence was committed, who are hereby empowered to summon and examine witnesses upon oath, and to finally hear and determine the same, and in case the judgment shall be affirmed, it shall be lawful for such justices of the peace to award the person or persons so appealing to pay such costs occasioned by such appeal, as to them the said justices shall seem meet, and to enforce payment thereof, according to the course and practice of such court.

REG. v. WILMOT.

The 2 Will. 4, c. 40, ss. 10, 11, substitutes superintendents for commissioners at the dock yards, and empowers them to administer oaths and exercise the duties, powers and authorities of justices in all places whatever, and in all matters relating to the naval service, and in all other cases in which any commissioner of the navy or victualling is empowered to act as a justice.

Collier (West with him), on behalf of the Admiralty, showed cause.—It is contended for the prisoner that the superintendent had no power to inflict imprisonment, but was bound in the first instance to impose a fine, and then, in default of payment or satisfaction by distress, imprisonment. The question depends upon the construction of sects. 18 and 20 of 40 Geo. 3, c. 89. It is submitted that the right construction is, that the convicting magistrate has the alternative power of inflicting imprisonment with hard labour, or a fine, according as in his judgment the case may be a serious or trifling one. That has been the construction that has been acted upon by the authorities for a long time past. Secondly, there was no appeal in this case, as the appeal clause is only applicable where a fine is inflicted. Thirdly, the recognisances to prosecute the appeal were entered into before the wrong magistrate. Sect. 21 enacts that they are to be entered into before "such" commissioner or justice, i. e. the committing one, and that was not done in the present case: (Reg. v. Brooke, 2 T. R. 190.)

Prentice in support of the rule.—The 40 Geo. 3, c. 89, s. 18, is a penal enactment, and is to be construed in favour of the liberty of the subject. This section only gives the same power as is found in all similar enactments, viz., in the first instance to impose a fine, and then, in default of satisfaction, to imprison. And this view is supported by Jervis' Act, 11 & 12 Vict. c. 43, ss. 19, 27. As to the discharge on the ground of the prisoner having appealed. [CROMPTON, J.—The appeal does not operate as a suspension of the commitment. Buller, J., in R. v. Brooks, says that the magistrate would have no right in a case like this to commit after the appeal has been heard.] It is submitted that he would have under sect. 27 of 11 & 12 Vict. c. 43. It is unjust that a prisoner should have to undergo the sentence while an appeal is pending.

COCKBURN, C. J.—I am of opinion that this rule must be discharged. It is certainly no easy task to construe an enactment like sect. 18. The more reasonable construction appears to me to be, that the superintendent has the alternative power either to impose a fine and imprisonment in the absence of goods of the offender whereon the fine may be levied, or, without imposing a fine at all, to sentence the offender to three calendar months' hard labour. The introductory words of the enactment look as if the justice was to have power to fine the offender, and in the event of that not being levied to imprison him; but the subsequent part of the enactment raises considerable difficulty in the way of this construction. The words "or in lieu of such fine" look as if there was to be a fine in the first instance, and then imprisonment if that could not be levied. On the other hand, it seems difficult to understand why the justice should have power to inflict in lieu of the fine imprisonment with hard labour, while he has power to imprison merely without hard labour where a fine has been imposed, and sufficient goods of the party cannot be found to answer the said fine. Upon the whole, therefore, I think the Legislature meant to give the alternative power to the magistrate, and that he should exercise his judicial discretion upon the case as to whether it was a case in which he should impose a fine, or imprison the party with hard labour, without regard to any fine. This rule further asks the court to discharge the party out of custody on entering into recognisances to prosecute the appeal. Upon this point the first difficulty is, that it is not plain that sect. 21 gives any appeal at all in this case. Possibly, under the words "treble the amount of such fine," when imprisonment is substituted for a fine, the party would be entitled to appeal, but it is not necessary to decide whether or not that is the true construction; for it may be that the party has a right to appeal but still what power has this court to discharge him on entering into a recognisance to prosecute the appeal? The 11 & 12 Vict. c. 43 (Jervis Act) gives no such power; and sect. 27 only enacts that when an appeal against any conviction shall be decided in favour of the resps. the justice who made the conviction may issue his warrant for execution of the same. In this case the warrant has already been issued, and the man is in custody under the warrant of commitment. That section does not apply to a case like this. The rule must therefore be discharged.

CROMPTON, J.—I am of the same opinion. The conviction seems to me to be good. On looking at the clauses of 40 Geo. 3, c. 89, that have been referred to, I am clearly of opinion that the statute intended to give the alternative power to the magistrate of punishing either by fine or imprisonment. "In lieu of such fine" should be read "in lieu of inflicting such fine;" and then the construction is clear. It would be absurd to say that, where no sufficient goods of the party are found, there was to be imprisonment merely, and that imprisonment with hard labour might be imposed in lieu of a fine. The 20th section seems extremely strong to show that, on the hearing of the offence, the magistrate is to come to a decision, whether a fine or imprisonment shall be imposed. The only answer given to this view is the appeal clause, which brings us to the second question, whether there is an appeal or not in this case. I am inclined to think that there is an appeal in both cases, where either a fine or imprisonment is imposed. Then, supposing that a right of appeal exists in this case, have we any power to discharge the party on entering into recognisances to prosecute the appeal? The authorities are clear that a warrant of commitment once made is not suspended by an appeal being lodged. It may be a hard thing to keep a party in prison while an appeal is pending, but the law is well established, that an appeal does not of itself suspend a warrant of commitment: (Kendall v. Wilkinson, 4 E. & B. 680.)

HILL, J.—I am of the same opinion, and for the same reasons.

BLACKBURN, J.—I am of the same opinion. In sect. 18, after the words, "to inflict a fine of 10l. for such his, her, or their offence," the following words down to "or in lieu of such fine" should be read as one long parenthesis, and then the grammatical construction is plain, and shows that it was intended to give the alternative power either to fine or imprison. If so, the conviction is good. I am also inclined to think that the statute does give a right of appeal in this case, but I cannot find that that operates as a suspension of the commitment: (Kendall v. Wilkinson.) I doubt whether Jervis's Act applies at all to a conviction before a commissioner.

WHITEHOUSE v. FELLOWES AND OTHERS.

Injury to property arising from works done by the trustees of a turnpike-road—Limitation of time for bringing action under sect. 147 of 3 Geo. 4, c. 126—When cause of action accrues.

The defts. were the trustees of a turnpike-road, and the plt. alleged that they so negligently made and maintained certain catchpits for carrying off the water from the road, that large quantities of water ran into his land and collieries, whereby he was greatly damaged. The plt. first complained in July 1859, and the defts. made some alterations; he was again damaged, and complained in December of the same year, and eventually brought this action. On behalf of the defts. it was contended that the action was not brought in time, inasmuch as it was not brought within three months after the act complained of was committed, as enacted by sect. 147 of the Turnpike-road Act, 3 Geo. 4, c. 126:

Held, that the action was in time, as no cause of action arose to the plt. so long as the works of the defts. caused him no damage, and that the cause of action first accrued when the plt. received actual damage.

It was also contended that, according to the case of Sutton v. Clarke, the defts. being trustees were not liable, and that the learned judge did not leave the question properly to the jury to say whether the defts. had been guilty of negligence:

Held, that the learned judge was right in asking the jury whether they considered the defts. had been guilty of negligence, and that they having found in the affirmative, that then the defts. were liable for such negligence.

This was an action brought against the deft. as clerk to the trustees of the Sedgeley roads, and the declaration, after reciting the title of the Act of Parliament under which the trustees acted, stated, that the said trustees so negligently, carelessly, wrongfully and improperly conducted themselves in and about improving, maintaining and keeping in repair a certain turnpike-road leading from Cann-lane to the town of Bilston, in the county of Stafford, to wit, by making manifestly insufficient catchpits for carrying off the water accumulating and running in and along the said road, and by improperly cutting divers outlets from the said roads into the adjoining land, that by means of such negligent, careless, wrongful and improper conduct large quantities of water ran from such road into the land and collieries of the plt., whereby the said land and collieries have been damaged, and the plt. has been prevented from working the said collieries and lost large gains, &c.

Plea, not guilty by statute 3 Geo. 4, c. 126, s. 147.

This action was brought to recover damages for alleged negligence on the part of the trustees of the road for not providing catchpits sufficiently large for carrying off the water from the road, and in making outlets from the road, by reason of which the plt.'s land and colliery became flooded. The first complaint made by the plt. to the trustees was in July 1859, and the surveyor by their direction made some alterations to remedy the evil complained of. On the 6th Dec. 1859 the plt. again made a complaint by letter to the surveyor, and stated that legal proceedings would be commenced, unless measures were taken to the satisfaction of his agent to prevent the escape of water. Three other letters were sent by the plt. to the surveyor respectively dated the 12th, 19th, and 23rd Dec., after which the writ was issued.

The cause was tried at Stafford before Byles, J., when a verdict was found for the plt., leave being reserved to move to enter a nonsuit on three grounds—first, that the action was not brought within three months after the act complained of was committed, as enacted by sect. 147 of the Turnpike-road Act, 3 Geo. 4, c. 126; secondly, that the learned judge did not leave the question properly to the jury to say whether the defts. had been guilty of negligence; and thirdly, that the verdict was against the weight of evidence.

A rule having been obtained on a former day,

Gray (Holl with him) now showed cause.—The damage done in this case is owing to the defts. allowing the catchpits to remain in this state. The continuance is the cause of action, and therefore the continuance is the thing done, and therefore the action is brought in time. It would be absurd to say that the plt. should be precluded from his remedy because he did not bring an action within three months of the commencement of the injury, when the damage done was very slight, and when there were grounds for supposing that the trustees would of their own accord rectify the evil. This case differs from that of Bonomi v. Backhouse, Ell. & Bl. 622, for there the damage flowed from a single act. Here is an act of omission, and as soon as any damage occurs from such omission then the cause of action arises: (Roberts v. Read, 16 E. 215; Gillon v. Boddington, Ry. & Mood. 161; Howell v. Young, 5 B. & C. 259; then the case of Nicklin v. Williams, 10 Ex. 259, was one entire act of commission.) [WILLIAMS, J. referred to Holmes v. Wilson, 10 Ad. & El. 503; Hudson v. Nicholson, 5 M. & W. 437; Thompson v. Gibson, 7 M. & W. 456; Battishill v. Reed, 18 C. B. 696; Oakley v. Kensington Canal Company, 5 B. & A. 138.] Then there is no distinction between a private person and a public body of commissioners; and the latter are liable to an action against them for negligence, and they can reimburse themselves out of the rates. The Southampton and Itchin Bridge Company v. Local Board of Southampton, 98 L. J. 41, Q. B.; Ruck v. Williams, 3 H. & N. 308.) [WILLIAMS, J.—The case of Boulton v. Crowthor, 2 B. & C. 703, is the leading case on the point, where it was decided that trustees are not liable to an action for consequential injury arising from an act which they are authorised to do, unless they have acted arbitrarily, carelessly, or oppressively.] The trustees in doing this work were bound to use proper care: (The Grocers' Company v. Donne 3 Bing. N. C. 34; Violet v. Simpson, 27 L. J. 139, Q. B.; Jones v. Bird 5 B. & Ald. 844; Lloyd v. Wigdale, 6 B. 489; Tindal v. King, 17 C. B. 483; Ward v. Lee, 7 El. & Bl. 426, were also cited.)

Pigott, Serjt. (Phipson with him) contended that, according to the case of Sutton v. Clarke, 6 Taunt. 29, the trustees are not liable. [WILLIAMS, J.—In Sutton v. Clarke it was the duty of the trustees to do a particular act, but in the present case they were to keep the roads in repair.] We have not turned the water out of its natural course; all we have done is, instead of open drains we have made covered ones, and this is just as much our duty as it is to mend the roads, and it does not follow that because what we did has produced the effects complained of by the plt., that therefore we have been guilty of negligence: (Harris v. Baker, 4 M. & W. 27; Gibbs v. Trustees of the Liverpool Dock Company, 3 H. & N. 257.)

C. B.]

WHITEHOUSE v. FELLOWES AND OTHERS.

[C. B.]

Then I say that the action is too late; and that it ought to have been brought as soon as the cause of action arose. (He referred to and reviewed the cases already cited.)

WILLIAMS, J.—This rule has been obtained upon three grounds—two based upon points of law, and the other on the ground that the verdict was against the weight of evidence. Now the points of law are, first, whether the declaration is answered by the plea relying upon sect. 147 of the Turnpike Act, 3 Geo. 4, c. 126, which says that “if any action shall be commenced against any person or persons for anything done in pursuance of this Act, then and in every such case, such action or suit shall be commenced or prosecuted within three months after the fact committed, and not afterwards;” and, secondly, on the ground that the learned judge was wrong in not leaving the question to the jury to say directly whether the defts. had been guilty of that description of culpable negligence which would make them liable in this action. I think it would be more convenient if I address myself to the second ground first. Now there is a great difference between the acts of trustees and those of private individuals, and a great many cases have been referred to upon this point, but several of them do not appear to me to have any application at all to the subject in hand. The case which has been most relied on is that of Sutton v. Clarke, but that only bears upon the cases where the trustees were authorised by Act of Parliament to do some special act, as in the case of The Governor and Company of the British Cast-plate Manufacturers v. Meredith, 4 T. R. 794, where it was held, that where the acts of commissioners appointed by a Paving Act occasioned a damage to an individual without any excess of jurisdiction on their part, the commissioners, or paviers acting under them, were not liable; and in Sutton v. Clarke, and the cases similar to it, that doctrine seems to have been recognised, that where persons are authorised to do some particular act, and by doing such act they prejudice the rights or injure the property of some private individual, they are not liable for doing that act, notwithstanding that, if that act had been done by a private person, he would have been liable. So the trustees of a turnpike-road, if authorised to raise the road, would not be liable for any damage which such act might occasion, although a private individual would be if he had done the same thing; but it would be otherwise if the trustees had done their work so carelessly and negligently as to create such damage. I understand that the plt. complains that the defts., in discharging their regular duty in keeping the roads in repair, have been guilty of negligence, whereby he has been injured; and the facts appear to be, that when the trustees entered upon their duties as such trustees, they found open drains; and the objection to them was, that when a heavy fall of rain came there was a gush of water on the road, but which these open drains carried away to the canal, or it dispersed itself in such a way as to be wholly innocuous to the adjoining owners; that being so, in order to prevent the gush of water on the road, they are advised to disturb the state of things then existing and cover the drains, which had the effect of turning the water on to the adjoining owner's land, as the catchpits made to prevent that were not sufficient, and the plt. says that the trustees have been guilty of negligence and carelessness in so changing the state of things as to make the water accumulate on the adjacent lands, by reason of the catchpits being insufficient, and that they are further guilty for continuing them in such insufficient state; and I think that is a state of things upon which the jury might rightly have been asked, whether the defts. had been guilty of negligence, and I understand that it was so left to them, that supposing found such a state of things to exist, that then they were to say whether the defts. had been guilty of negligence, and the jury have found that they were, and in this direction I can see nothing wrong. Then as to the question whether or not the plt. is bound to rely on the negligence of the defts. when the damage first occurred, or whether he can maintain his action after three months have elapsed from the first damage, I am of opinion that where the defts. have been guilty of negligence in the management of the highway over which they have charge, and that by reason of such negligence damage has been caused, which has been accompanied by a fresh damage, such a state of things brings the plt. within the time limited by the statute. There is no doubt that a fresh damage is no cause of action, and the case of Fetter v. Beale, 1 Salk. 11, is an authority upon that point. In that case an action was brought by the plt. for a blow he had received on the head, and which at the time appeared slight, and he obtained damages accordingly; but afterwards it turned out that the injury was of a more serious nature, and the plt. then brought a second action, but it was held that it would not lie, Holt, C. J. saying, “Every new dropping is a new nuisance, but here is not a new battery, and in trespass the grievousness or consequence of the battery is not the ground of the action, but the measure of the damages which the jury must be supposed to have considered at the trial;” but here the plt. has been again damaged by reason of the defts. neglecting their duty, and is he to have no remedy at all? It seems impossible to suppose that such was contemplated by the Act. Here it is not only the fresh damage, but the continuance of the original neglect that constitutes a new cause of action, and I think that this wrongful act may be a fresh cause of action. And I therefore am of opinion that on both points our judgment should be for the plt. And now as to the verdict being against the weight of evidence, without going so far as to say that this verdict was against the evidence, yet, looking at it in all its bearings, I think it would be more satisfactory that they should be re-investigated, on the condition that the defts. pay the costs of the former trial.

WILLES, J.—I am of the same opinion. As to the misdirection, it appears that the jury were told to find for the plt. if they were of opinion that the defts. had, by the negligent construction of the catchpits, occasioned injury to the plt. I assumed, therefore, that the jury found negligence on the part of the defts., therefore there can be no reason for granting a new trial on the ground of misdirection. Then, as to the question on the Statute of Limitations, that is a question of considerable nicety. Certain expressions have fallen from the courts, and have been used, which have not applied to the particular facts of the cases in which they were made. After what my brother Williams has said, I do not think it necessary to refer to more than one decision, and that is the case of Bonomi v. Backhouse. The cause of action there was in respect of injury occasioned by the support to land being taken away. There the court threw out that it did appear the support was taken away, and that the cause of action was then complete. Then compare that case with the present. Here the cause of action is the injury to the land. It cannot be said that the plt. in this case had a right to say that the trustees should not make this work on the road. In Bonomi v. Backhouse it was said that the plt. had a right to prevent the ground from being taken away where it would interfere with his supports. All that the plt. could do here was to demand that the works should be done in such a manner as not to injure his land; and each action was to be limited to such injury; and it appears to me that the Statute of Limitations ought to run from the time the damage was effected. With regard to the verdict being against the evidence, I need add nothing to what has already been said by my brother Williams.

BYLES, J.—I shall say nothing as to the misdirection, but I wish to say a word as to the limitation of time for bringing the action. The case of Bonomi v. Backhouse is a decision of the Court of Ex. Ch., and is binding upon us, and clearly establishes the law that the period runs, not from the act done, but from the damage itself, but it leaves the question open—does it run from the first damage, excluding all subsequent damage? or does it not say, may not there be a case where new damage gives a new cause of action? There the damage was one act; but here the damage arises from every shower, and every time there is a storm there is a new and distinct injury. With regard to the verdict being against the weight of evidence, I do not think that that was so; but, as this is a case of great importance, I think that in justice to both parties there should be a new trial, if the defts. are willing to pay the costs of the former one.

ELLIS v. THE CORPORATION OF BRIDGNORTH.

Injunction—Market—Local Government Act 1858—Stallage—Legal right.

Where the members of a corporation elect to proceed under their Local Government Act, instead of asserting their common law right as a corporation, they will be bound to proceed according to the provisions of such Act.

Thus, although there may be a clear right at law to change the site of a market in the corporation of a borough, if the corporation proceeds under the Act to change such site, and transfer and regulate the market, they must not exceed the powers conferred upon them by such Act of Parliament, although less extensive than their rights at common law.

The court will require the right of stallage to be decided at law, before granting an injunction to restrain a corporation from interfering with such rights of stallage, where the right has not been admitted by the corporation.

Rolt, Q.C. and C. Hall moved for an injunction to restrain the defts. from establishing or holding a market in the New Market-buildings at Bridgnorth, and from interfering with the rights and privileges of the plts., as occupiers of houses in the High-street of Bridgnorth, in which the weekly market has been held from time immemorial, the case made by the bill being that certain privileges and profits from stallage on market-days have been enjoyed by the High-street householders, and that those rights will be entirely destroyed by the removal of the market. By the plts.' bill it appeared that in 1854 a company was formed under the title of the "Bridgnorth Public Buildings and Market Company (Limited)," for the purpose of erecting new market buildings in Bridgnorth. The company had erected new market buildings in another part of the High-street, at a distance of 110 yards from the old market-house, erected in 1650, but the speculation was stated to have been unprofitable, as the holders of stalls in the High-street could not be induced to remove to the new buildings. After the passing of the Local Government Act 1858 negotiations took place between the company and the local board of health, under which the company granted a new lease of the new market buildings. In Dec. 1860 notice was published in the Bridgnorth Journal by the clerk to the local board, that, in pursuance of the Fairs and Markets Clauses Act 1847, and the Local Government Act 1858, the local board intended to apply to Government for the allowance of bye-laws, made for regulating the use of the market-places provided for them in Bridgnorth. The plts., feeling themselves aggrieved by the contemplated removal of the market from its ancient situation in the High-street, in violation as it was alleged of their prescriptive rights of stallage, served the local board with notice of their intention to oppose the allowance of the bye-laws, stating, among other grounds of objection, that the bye-laws ought to have been published under the Fairs and Markets Clauses Act 1847, and the application for their allowance first made at quarter sessions; secondly, that the removal of the market without the consent of the plts. (having the prescriptive right of stallage) was illegal and contrary to the provisions of the Local Government Act 1858, and the Fairs and Market Clauses Act 1847. The plts. subsequently filed their bill, and now moved for an injunction in the terms before stated. They cited Mayor of Northampton v. Ward, 1 Wils. 107; S. C. 2 Strange, 1238; Campbell v. Wilson, 3 East, 298; Ellwood v. Bullock, 6 Q.B. Rep. 330; Tyson v. Smith, 4 Ad. & Ell. 407.

Gifford, Q.C. and Roberts, for the defts. the corporation, contended that the common law right in the corporation to remove the market still existed notwithstanding the passing of the Acts of Parliament. Even if the plts. had proved that they were within sect. 50 of the Local Government Act 1858, as persons whose rights were interfered with by the establishment of any new market, the remedy was at law. They commented upon the trifling nature of the interest asserted by the plts.' bill, and the very large terms in which the prayer was framed.

Rolt in reply.

Feb. 1.—The VICE-CHANCELLOR said there was no doubt a clear case to be tried. The plts. sought to restrain the corporation from interfering with the immemorial right of every owner of a house in the High-street of placing before his door stalls, which would otherwise be an obstruction to the thoroughfare, and of exacting for the use of those stalls a rent of 10*l.* a year. If the corporation were, as had been contended, the owners of the soil, then, to their knowledge, they had been allowing these payments to be made to the owners of the houses by the persons using stalls. The market had been held from time immemorial in the High-street. It was to be observed that, in proposing to transfer the market, the defts. had not acted as the corporation, and in their corporate capacity they had a clear right at common law to transfer the market, but through a sort of combined medium of the joint-stock company and the local board of health. Though in one sense the same body, yet the local board was distinct from the corporation, and intrusted with large powers, which the corporation could never exercise. If, then, they did not choose to exercise their common law right, but availed themselves of the powers confided to them by the Local Government Act (far exceeding any power in the corporation), they must be bound by every provision of that Act in the strictest sense; otherwise there would be monstrous injustice if the defts. were allowed to avail themselves of their common law rights as owners of the market, and also to apply to the Secretary of State under the Local Government Act to sanction their bye-laws for regulating the market. They took the lease of the buildings from the joint-stock company, as the local board, and they must be considered as acting under the Act, and the Act alone. With respect to sect. 50, which provided "that no market or slaughter-house shall be established in pursuance of this section, so as to interfere with any rights, powers, or privileges enjoyed within the district by any person, chartered joint-stock company, or incorporated company, without his, her, or their consent," there was a strong intimation of an intention by the defts. to change the site and remove the market out of the High-street. They acted under the Act as the local board, and, looking at the circumstances, there was a strong prima facie case to be tried of whether the defts. were not establishing a new market within sect. 50 of the Act. As to the rights of stallage on the ancient site appurtenant to the houses, those rights could not possibly be transferred to the new site. Whether those rights had been interfered with by the establishment of a new market, remained to be determined by a jury, there being a mixed question of law and fact: first, whether the plts. had such a legal right as was contemplated under sect. 50; and, secondly, whether such legal right had been interfered with. It was not to be assumed against the defts. as clear, that the mere introduction by them of buying and selling in the new market buildings would necessarily interfere with the holders of stalls upon the ancient site. If, indeed, they had proceeded to clear away those stalls, then the case would hardly have required the intervention of a jury. But the notice of the defts. was carefully framed, and, at all events, there was nothing amounting to an admission that the stalls were to be removed. He felt, therefore, very great difficulty in framing any admission between the parties which would fairly raise the question for decision at law. The question was one which must be tried at law. He should therefore direct that the motion should stand over; the plts. to bring such action to try the legal right as they should be advised.

COWLEY AND WIFE v. THE MAYOR AND CORPORATION OF SUNDERLAND.

Negligence—Corporation—Public baths and wash-houses—9 & 10 Vict. c. 74.

In an action for injuries caused by the negligent construction of a machine set up by a corporation, and used in a public wash-house erected by them under 9 & 10 Vict. c. 74, to which the wife of the plt. resorted, and paid a certain sum for the use of the machines and other conveniences for washing there:

Held, that the corporation was liable for negligence in the construction and management of the establishment, and that, in discharge of the statutory duty undertaken by them, they were bound to exercise ordinary care and diligence, and to provide machines reasonably safe for use.

In this case the plt. complained of the injury caused by the negligent construction of a machine set up by the defts., and used in some public wash-houses erected by them under the provisions of the 9 & 10 Vict. c. 74.

It appeared that the wife of the plt. resorted to the wash-houses in question, and paid 4d. for the use of the machines and other conveniences for washing there. The machine in question, by which the injury was done, was a drying machine. It consisted of a cylinder into which the wet clothes were put, and made to revolve with great rapidity, and the water driven out by the operation of centrifugal force. The machine was originally constructed to be worked by an ordinary winch-handle connected with the top of it, such handle being turned by the hand of the person using it, and there were a considerable number of these machines in the wash-house. A proposition was made among the members of the corporation to introduce steam. There was evidence to show that this was objected to by some competent persons as likely to prove dangerous. It was, however, adopted, and at the time of the accident the machine in question was turned by steam-power.

On applying the steam-power in place of the hand, the winch-handle was taken off, but the rod on which it had been fixed was allowed to remain.

This rod was quite unnecessary, and useless to the machine as worked by steam. It projected some distance over the edge of the top of the machine, and revolved with great rapidity while the machine was in action. The plt.'s wife in using the drying machine allowed a portion of her dress to touch this rod; it was caught by it, and she was drawn against the revolving rod and considerably injured.

The action was tried before Wilde, B., at the Durham summer assizes 1860. The jury negatived any negligence on the part of the plt.'s wife, and found that the machine was dangerously and negligently constructed, and that the accident with which the female plt. met was caused by such dangerous and negligent construction of the machine. The plts. recovered a verdict for 50*l.*, with leave reserved to the defts. to move to enter the verdict for them.

E. P. Price (Davison with him) now showed cause.—They cited Green v. The London General Omnibus Company, 29 L. J. 13, C. P.; Cornman v. Eastern Counties Railway Company, 29 L. J. 94, Ex.; Ruck v. Williams, 27 L. J. 357, Ex.; Blackmore v. The Bristol and Exeter Railway Company, 27 L. J. 167, Q. B.

Manisty, Q.C. (T. Jones with him) supported the rule.—They cited Manley v. St. Helens Canal and Railway Company, 27 L. J. 159, Ex.; Metcalf v. Hetherington, 11 Ex. 755. Cur. adv. vult.

Feb. 25.—WILDE, B. now delivered the judgment of the court.—It was argued by the defts. that the 9 & 10 Vict. c. 74, imposed no responsibility or liability whatever on the corporation, but only on the committee to which the erection and management of the wash-houses were confided. But several clauses of the Act were pointed out during the argument, which tended to negative this proposition. It is unnecessary to refer to them again in detail. It is sufficient to say that, in our opinion, the Legislature did not intend to withdraw from the corporation to whom the wash-houses belonged the responsibility which might attach to any improper construction or management of them. It was then argued that, as the plt. was a volunteer, and chose to use the machine such as it was, she could not recover; but we think this argument does not avail the defts. The statute was passed for the benefit of the poor and more ignorant classes of the population. The corporation chose to avail themselves of these powers to erect these wash-houses. In discharge of the statutory duty thus undertaken by them, we think they were bound to exercise ordinary care and diligence, and provide machines reasonably safe for use. It is clear from the evidence and the finding of the jury that the projecting rod which did the mischief was unnecessarily, carelessly and negligently allowed by the defts. to remain after all use and purposes of it had ceased. It is also clear that this danger was one which the plt. might reasonably fail to perceive or appreciate, and the jury have in substance found that neither in the fact of using the machine at all, nor in the particular mode of using it by the plt., was there any negligence. The accident was caused by the immediate negligence of the defts., and on an occasion when the plt. was in no way to blame. We think the plt.'s verdict ought to stand, and this rule be discharged. Rule discharged.

THE CHARTERED GAS COMPANY v. CLERKENWELL. Poor-rate—Gas company—Principle on which assessment should be made, and mode of estimating the annual rateable value.

MD. SES.] THE CHARTERED GAS COMPANY v. CLERKENWELL—REG. v. JONES. [NISI PRIUS.

This was an appeal against a poor-rate made in June 1859, by which the property of the company in Clerkenwell was rated at the sum of 2598*l*.

John Clarke and Norman for the appellants.

Metcalf and Poland for the respondents.

The facts are fully stated in the following

JUDGMENT.

Mr. BODKIN.—The company produced their accounts for the Brick-lane district, in which the respondents' parish is situate, by which accounts it appeared that their gross receipts from all sources, if taken, as the company proposed, on an average of four years, amounted to 60,918*l*. The respondents proposed to adopt the account for the year 1859, the year in which the rate was made. The difference between the two modes is unimportant; in fact, the mode proposed by the company is taken favourably to the respondents so far as the receipts are concerned, but the extension of the area of calculation enables the company to avail themselves of a larger amount of expenditure than was incurred in 1859, and, as I think the respondents are in strictness entitled to look to the rateable value for the year in which the rate is made, and as I see no reason to think that an incoming tenant would object in this particular case to treat upon the footing of that year's transactions, I have adopted the receipts for 1859 only, amounting to 60,539*l*. It follows that the expenditure must be taken for the same year, and this, according to the company's book, was 48,050*l*. Some items were questioned by the respondents, particularly the charge for ordinary repairs, but so far as the evidence enabled me to form a judgment, that item and all the others appeared to have been in fact paid by the company, and I must assume that the expenses so paid were necessarily incurred. An objection was taken specifically to the charge made for remuneration to the directors and auditors, on the ground that an individual tenant would carry on the works without directors or auditors. But although the supposition of a tenancy is of necessity resorted to in these cases, such an occupation is extremely improbable, and if such were to arise, it is difficult to understand how works of such magnitude and complication could be satisfactorily conducted without a controlling power of some kind. Finding, therefore, that such a charge is considered essential, and is in fact incurred, I see no sufficient reason for disallowing it. The sum of 48,050*l*. deducted from 60,539*l*. will leave as the gross earnings 12,489*l*. The balance thus remaining may be taken as composed of two elements: 1, Profits of trade; 2, Rent; and the first being ascertained, the remainder will represent what, if a tenancy arose, an occupier might reasonably be expected to pay. Such a tenant would require to embark a considerable capital in the concern, and the appellants estimated their capital at 50,000*l*., viz., tools and tents, fixtures and implements, 22,000*l*., and floating capital 28,000*l*. Considering that this value has been proved by an unchecked estimate, and considering that the revenue is received quarterly, I think a tenant would not require a capital beyond 30,000*l*. Upon this the claim of 5 per cent. as interest, and 10 per cent. as tenants' profits (bad debts being already provided for) is reasonable, making together 4500*l*. This leaves as a rent what a tenant might reasonably be expected to pay, 7989*l*. The Parochial Assessment Act, however, provides that the assessment shall be made after allowing for repairs, insurance and whatever expenditure may be necessary to maintain the property rated in a state to command the same rent, and the appellants therefore claim for insurance against fire the sum of 225*l*. They do not, in fact, insure, but this does not make the claim less reasonable, and I have therefore allowed it at 225*l*. The appellants also claim a percentage on the value of their works of 2 per cent., amounting upon an unchecked estimate to 1620*l*. But, upon the best judgment I can form, seeing that all ordinary repairs, as well as injury by fire, have been already provided for, I consider 1 per cent. amply sufficient, and this will amount to 810*l*. These deductions will leave the rateable value of all the works in the district at 6954*l*. The respondents' parish is a terminal parish and the pipes within it do not contribute to the supply of any other place; and this, so far as Clerkenwell is concerned, somewhat simplifies the division of the total sum amongst the various parishes in the district. Several modes of doing this have been discussed, and this question is always attended with considerable difficulty. That which seems to me the most advisable to adopt in this case is to apportion the whole rateable value according to the present value of the works in each parish—a mode suggested by the appellants, and certainly the most favourable to the respondents. Adopting this rule, the respondents' parish appears entitled to one month's part of the whole sum, amounting to 772*l*. It has, however, been stated by the appellants that in the city portion of the district the company's gas is supplied at a lower rate than in the other portions, and that the outlying parishes are entitled to a larger portion of the rateable value by reason of the extra profit obtained in them. I assume that the appellants are right in this suggestion. I therefore adopt the additional sum which they assign to the respondents on this ground; I therefore find and determine the rateable value of the company's property in Clerkenwell to be 1022*l*., and I order the rate appealed against to be reduced accordingly.

No costs.

REG. v. JONES.

Rape.

The rule now is that the connection must be without the consent of the person alleged to have been ravished. Where a father has established a kind of reign of terror in his family, and his daughter, under the influence of dread and terror, remains passive while he has connection with her, he may be found guilty of rape.

The prisoner was charged with committing a rape upon the person of Jane Jones.

Sweetenham for the prosecution.

Jane Jones was the daughter of the prisoner and fourteen years of age. She stated that she lived with her father and mother in Love-lane, Denbigh, in a house a short distance from the road; that on the 29th Jan. last she and her father were alone in the house; that her father told her to go to the front door to see if her mother was coming home; that she went to the door and said her mother was not coming home; that her father then took hold of her and threw her on a bed in the room and had connection with her [his Lordship hereupon stated that he was of opinion that, although the counsel for the prosecution must confine himself to one act of ravishing, he might ask the witness as to the previous conduct of the prisoner towards the witness, and she then stated]; that her father had previously told her not to tell any one what he had done to her; that he had said he would throttle her, and would kill her if she told of anything he had done; that he had throttled her; that he had had connection with her many times before, and on those occasions had told her not to tell, and that that was the reason she did not tell; that after the last occurrence she told her mother; that she consented to the prisoner's having connection with her because she was afraid of him; that she was afraid of his choking her—was afraid if she resisted him; that she begged of him not to do it, and asked him to be quiet, to leave her alone.

Enoch Williams, a policeman, stated that, before the magistrates, the prisoner said he did it with the prisoner's consent.

His LORDSHIP stated to the jury that until lately it was the rule on a charge of rape that the connection must be proved to have been against the will of the female; but since the case of Reg. v. Fletcher, Bell's Crown Cas. 63 (the principle of which case his Lordship expressed his approval of, notwithstanding there was a mistake in it—the court having assumed that the Statute of Westminster, 2 C. 34, was still in force, which is not the case, it having been repealed), the rule was, that it must be without her consent, so as to meet the case of idiots and infants, and persons incapable of giving consent; that where it appeared that such persons had any violent desires and passions, it might be the duty of the jury to take that into their consideration before finding a prisoner guilty; but where that did not appear, they might find that the connection was without consent; that the amount of resistance necessary to be proved may be less in some cases than in others; that that may be so where there are no persons near, and where shouting and resistance would be useless. His Lordship then continued:—If in this case it is made out to your satisfaction that a kind of reign of terror was set up in this family, and in consequence of that terror and dread the girl allowed the connection to take place without resistance, then I am of opinion you may convict. It is possible she may have been a consenting party, and not influenced by dread. That is a question for you. She says the same thing had been done upon previous occasions, and her father had told her he would throttle her if she told her mother, and that is why she did not tell. She says she begged him not to do it, and to be quiet and leave her alone. This in ordinary cases would be quite insufficient. But in this case, if you think she remained passive under the influence of that dread and reign of terror which I have mentioned, and that is clearly made out, you may find the prisoner guilty. Verdict, guilty.

There was another case against the prisoner for committing a similar offence upon another daughter, and one for an attempt upon a third daughter. He was sentenced to ten years' penal servitude.

CROWN CASES RESERVED.

Reported by JOHN THOMPSON, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Saturday, April 27.

(Before POLLOCK, C.B., WILLIAMS, WILLES and BLACKBURN, JJ. and WILDE, B.)

REG. v. JAMES TITE.

Embezzlement—Clerk or servant—Commercial traveller.

The fact of a commercial traveller being paid by commission and being permitted to obtain orders for others than the prosecutor, does not prevent him from being a servant to the prosecutor within 7 & 8 Geo. 4, c. 29, s. 47, upon an indictment for embezzlement.

Case reserved for the opinion of this Court by the Recorder of London.

At a session of the Central Criminal Court holden on the 28th day of Jan. 1861 James Tite was tried and convicted before me on an indictment which charged that he was servant to Richard Adams Ford, and by virtue of his employment as such servant he did receive the sum of 4*l.* 16*s.* 6*d.* in money, for and on account of the said Richard Adams Ford, his said master, and fraudulently and feloniously did embezzle, secrete and steal the said money.

It was proved that he was engaged by the prosecutor (who was a shirt manufacturer) as a commercial traveller, and that the agreement between them was that he should be paid by commission, and that he was at liberty to obtain orders for others than the prosecutor.

It was also proved that he received from the prosecutor various samples with which he set out on his journey, and that while on that journey he received by virtue of his employment the sum charged in the indictment, for which he did not account, but which he fraudulently appropriated to his own use. He never returned the samples entrusted to him, and was never seen by the prosecutor from the time he set out on his journey until he was taken into custody.

The question on which I wish for the decision of the Court for Consideration of Crown Cases Reserved is:—

Whether there was any evidence of the prisoner being a servant, as alleged in the indictment.

The prisoner remains in custody awaiting judgment.

RUSSELL GURNEY.

Sleigh for the prisoner.—It is submitted that there was no evidence that the prisoner was a servant of the prosecutor, as alleged in the indictment. His engagement was that of a commercial traveller, and is more like that of the prisoner in Reg. v. Walker, 1 Dru. & Bell, 600; S. C. 8 Cox Crim. Cas. In that case the prosecutors, manure manufacturers, engaged the prisoner, who kept a refreshment-house at B., to get orders which were supplied from their stores at B., under the prisoner's control. The rent was paid by the prosecutors, and the prisoner's duty was to collect money and pay it over at once; he was also to send weekly accounts of sales and receipts. He was to be paid by commission, and was called agent for the B. district. After some time the prisoner signed a proposal to a guarantee society, which stated that his salary was 1*l.* per year, besides commission, and it was proved that the prosecutors had agreed to give this salary of 1*l.* per year. And it was held by the court that he was not a servant within the 7 & 8 Geo. 4, c. 29, s. 47, and that he could not be convicted of embezzlement.

POLLOCK, C.B.—Is not this question one of fact for the jury? A man may be employed as a tailor, and he may be the servant of the employer, but he may also be employed as a tradesman, and not as a servant. A commission agent is a separate and distinct occupation, but no doubt by agreement the nature of the occupation may be such that he may be the servant of his employer. There may be a servant who has the power of being employed by other people.

Sleigh.—There is no evidence of the existence of the relationship of master and servant here.

POLLOCK, C.B.—The evidence is ambiguous. It is quite consistent with the existence or non-existence of that relation.

BLACKBURN, J.—The question reserved, as I understand, is this, Do the two facts set out in the case, the payment by commission and the liberty to obtain orders for others than the prosecutor, conclusively show that the prisoner was not a servant?

Sleigh.—I shall not contend for the now exploded view that payment by commission prevents a person from being a servant. And Reg. v. Batty, 2 Moo. C. C. 257, contrary to the view expressed by Parks, B. in Reg. v. Goodbody, 2 Car. & P. 667, decided that a person might be convicted of embezzlement as the servant, though at the same time he was employed by other persons. But on the facts stated in the case it is ambiguous whether the prisoner was a servant or not. He was not bound to obey the orders of Mr. Ford.

WILLES, J.—Is not an ordinary commercial

C. B.]

HUNT AND OTHERS v. ALLGOOD AND OTHERS.

[C. B.]

traveller bound to obey the orders of his employer as to the price, terms of payment and such like matters?

Sleigh.—A man may well be a commercial traveller without being a servant.

WILDE, J.—The difficulty I feel is, that the case does not state what he was employed to do, but merely states compendiously that he was a commercial traveller.

BLACKBURN, J.—Can it be said that if a commercial traveller goes on a journey with samples, and is also to receive moneys for his employer, that there is not some evidence that he was a servant?

Sleigh.—He goes about the country at his own pleasure, and is not bound to get any orders. It is like the case of Reg. v. May, 8 Cox Crim. Cas. 421; 8 C. 30 L. J. 81, M. C., where the prisoner was appointed by letter to get orders upon commission, and it was his duty to account for any money he might receive immediately on receipt of it, and it was held that this did not make him a servant within the statute. In that case Cockburn, C.J. said, "The position of clerk or servant implies control." Here it was not incumbent on the prisoner to obtain any orders for Mr. Ford. Here there is nothing ejusdem generis as a clerk or servant.

WILLIAMS, J.—I concurred in the judgment in that case, on the ground that it was not found to be any part of the prisoner's duty to receive money.

M'Intyre, for the prosecution, was not called upon to argue.

POLLOCK, C. B.—We are all of opinion that the conviction was right. The question arose at the trial whether there was any evidence of the prisoner's being the servant of the prosecutor as alleged in the indictment. The occupation of a commission agent is now perfectly well known; he may be employed by a number of persons for different purposes. Here the prisoner was employed as a commercial traveller by the prosecutor, to be paid by commission, but with permission to obtain orders for other persons. In our opinion that would not prevent him being servant to the prosecutor. We understand that the object of the recorder in reserving this case was that the doubt which had been expressed by Mr. Baron Parke (now Lord Wensleydale) in Reg. v. Goodbody might be cleared up. That has been cleared up, and the conviction must be affirmed.

WILLIAMS, J.—I am of the same opinion. The case of Reg. v. Batty not only decided that the prisoner was not the less a servant because he was employed by other persons at the same time, but that the employment for wages made him a servant. That is applicable to this case, unless the payment by commission makes a difference. That, however, is only a mode of receiving wages.

WILLES, J.—I am of the same opinion.

BLACKBURN, J.—I am of the same opinion.

WILDE, J.—I am of the same opinion. The case of Reg. v. May is an authority in favour of the conviction, for Cockburn, C. J. says a traveller is under the control of his several employers, he is bound to go here and there, and to do this and that according to orders.

Conviction affirmed.

HUNT AND OTHERS v. ALLGOOD AND OTHERS.

Lands vested in churchwardens and overseers, under 59 Geo. 3, c. 12, held by poor of the parish—Payment of rent in advance—Notice to quit. The defts., who were poor parishioners of the parish of C., claimed to hold as yearly tenants certain lands in the parish which were vested, under the provisions of the 17th section of 59 Geo. 3, c. 12, in the churchwardens and overseers for the time being, at the yearly rent of 4s. per acre. Up to the year 1803 these lands had been occupied at the above rent, which was always paid in advance; in that year these lands were inclosed, and to pay the expenses the rent was raised to 12s., which was paid up to the year 1848, when all the expenses being liquidated, the defts. refused to pay more than 4s., which sum was tendered and refused and the present action brought:

Held, in the absence of any agreement to the contrary, that they were tenants from year to year, and entitled to notice to quit, and that the facts stated below did not amount to a disclaimer.

This was an action of ejectment which was brought to obtain possession of some property known as the "Coton Church and Town Lands," situate in the parish of Coton, which belongs to the parish, and as such is vested in the churchwardens and overseers. It appeared that previous to the year 1803 these lands were held by the poor of the parish at the nominal rent of 4s. per acre, which was paid in advance; in that year an Act was passed for the inclosure of these lands, at which time the rents were raised to 12s. per acre, to defray the expenses of the inclosure.

From the evidence it appeared that in 1848, the expenses for which the additional 8s. had been imposed having been paid, the defts. attended a vestry meeting and asserted that the land was theirs at 4s. per acre.

This not being assented to by the trustees of the charity the defts. than in possession ceased to pay any rent for the lands which they held and have not done so up to the present time; and the trustees have tried to induce them to give up possession, or to pay the rent, which they have refused to do; and consequently this action has been brought.

The cause was tried at Cambridge, at the last summer assizes, before Pollock, C. B., when a verdict was found for the plts., subject to leave being granted to the defts. to move to enter a nonsuit on the grounds that the defts.' tenancy from year to year had not been determined by any notice to quit; and secondly, that there had not been any disclaimer by the defts., or any of them, of the plts.' title.

A rule having been obtained on a former day,

O'Malley, Q.C. (Keans and Couch with him) now showed cause.—This was a hiring for a year at a rental which was to be paid in advance, and therefore at the end of the year they were not entitled to a notice, as it was a fresh letting from year to year. Then as to the disclaimer, the defts. say that they have a right to the land at a rental of 4s. Surely this amounts to a disclaimer. They cannot show any deed giving them a right to dictate the terms upon which the land should be let; if the landlord has a title he has a right to prescribe the rents to be paid; and if a tenant says "I can compel you to reduce your rent," surely that is setting up an adverse title. They cited Doe dem. Calvert v. Froud, 4 Bing. 557; Saunders v. Freeman, 2 Dyer, 209; Doe dem. Gray v. Stannion, 1 M. & W. 695; Doe dem. Donne and others, 10 A. & E. 427.

Power, Q.C., Tozer, Serjt. and Douglas Brown, for the defts., were not called on.

ERLE, C. J.—I am of opinion this rule must be made absolute. The judge who tried this cause reserved the point of law, and left it to the court to say what was the law, and what were the inferences of fact to be drawn from the evidence. Two points have been made in support of the plts.' case, one is: that the defts. do not hold from year to year, but for one year certain, and therefore the interest of each one of them terminated at the end of each year. I have looked carefully at the evidence, and I take the facts to be, that for many years the defts. had been occupiers of these premises, and paid their rent in advance. It has been an occupation for many years, and there has been nothing shown which would enable the landlord to say "Unless you pay the rent I can turn you out without notice." I am of opinion that the defts. held as tenants from year to year. The plts. have also had leave to move on another point, namely, that there had been a disclaimer; the facts are that the defts. have held for 4s. per annum, which appears to have been raised to 12s., and there seems to have been some expectation that it would have been lowered again to the former sum, as the purposes for which it had been raised were satisfied. At a parish meeting, where there was a discussion about the matter, words were used, "The land was the defts'." The Chief Baron says the words used were, "The land was theirs, and they ought to pay 4s. rent." When I look at the circumstances under which they were used, it seems to me they meant, "We have a right to continue our tenancy at 4s. an acre," which seems to me to be much more probable that they had not made an investigation into facts than that they had done so. I do not think the words fairly mean what the plts. say they do. I further think that it would not be satisfactory to turn thirty-six persons off the land on the evidence of what appears to have taken place at a parish meeting, which would be the case if we gave judgment for the plts. I cannot, therefore, hold that these premises have been forfeited by these words, which the plts. contend set up an adverse title; and, consequently, the rule must be made absolute.

Judgment for defts.

Judicial Committee of the Privy Council.

Reported by JAMES PATERSON, Esq., of the Middle Temple Barrister-at-Law.

Wednesday, March 13.

(Present—The Right Hon. the ARCHBISHOP of YORK, Lords CRANWORTH, CHELMSFORD and KINGSDOWN, Sir E. RYAN and Sir J. T. COLERIDGE.)

POOLE v. BISHOP OF LONDON.

Clergy—Stipendiary curate—Revocation of licence by bishop—Appeal to Privy Council—36 Geo. 3, c. 83; s. 6, 1 & 2 Vict. c. 106, ss. 98, 109.

Where the bishop revokes the licence of a stipendiary curate acting within the diocese, such curate has no appeal except to the archbishop, whose decision is final.

This was an appeal from a decision of his Grace the Archbishop of Canterbury, whereby he confirmed the revocation made by the Bishop of London of the licence of Mr. Poole, the app., who was an assistant stipendiary curate in the church of St. Barnabas, Pimlico.

Mr. Poole had been duly licensed by the late bishop, but, in consequence of certain alleged malpractices touching the practice of confession, the present Bishop of London had, under the authority of the statute 1 & 2 Vict. c. 106, s. 98, after hearing evidence, revoked such licence on May 25, 1858. Mr. Poole appealed to the Archbishop of Canterbury, who, without hearing the parties, confirmed the revocation. It having been found that the archbishop had acted illegally in deciding without hearing the parties, a mandamus was issued from the Q. B. to his Grace to hear evidence, which was accordingly done on Feb. 18, 1859, when his Grace sat, assisted by the Right Hon. Dr. Lushington. On the 23rd May 1859 his Grace confirmed the decision of the Bishop of London. Mr. Poole then appealed to her Majesty in Council, and the competency of the appeal was objected to.

The Queen's Advocate, M. Smith, Q. C. and Dr.

Seabey, for the resp., contended that it was not competent to appeal from the decision of the archbishop to the Privy Council: (Lyndwood, B. 5, tit. 13, edit. 1679; 2 Gibson's Codex, tit. 36, c. 5; 3 Hooker's Eccl. Ledbitter*, 13 M. & W. 838; Gorham v. Bishop of Exeter, 15 Q. B. 52, 66.)

Dr. Phillimore, Q. C., Coleridge and Buller, for the app., contended that the right of appeal under the former statutes was not taken away by the recent statute: (Lyndwood, B. 3, tit. 4; B. 5, tit. 11; 1 Inst. 96; Godolphin's Abridg. 22, 81; 1 Gibson's Codex, 266, 329; Ducange, "Curatus;" 3 Thomas-simis, 4; Bishop of St. David's case, 14 St. Tr. 417; *Lins v. Cur. adu. vult.

Lord CRANWORTH.—The only question on which we have to pronounce an opinion in this case is, as to the right of Mr. Poole to appeal to her Majesty from a sentence of the Archbishop of Canterbury, dated March 23, 1859, by which his grace confirmed the revocation by the resp. of the app.'s licence as an assistant stipendiary curate in the church of St. Barnabas, in the diocese of London. The case was argued before us with great learning and ability, and our attention was directed to numerous ancient ecclesiastical authorities supposed to bear on the question. But, after giving the most careful attention to all which was addressed to us, we have come to the conclusion that the question turns, not on ancient ecclesiastical law, but on the true construction of, at most, two modern Acts of Parliament. It is not necessary to decide whether there were or were not in our church before the Reformation functionaries corresponding precisely to the stipendiary curate of the present day. It is sufficient for the purpose of enabling us to come to a satisfactory conclusion that we should see how far they have existed, and to what extent their rights have been recognised, in more modern times. That such a class of persons existed at the beginning of the 17th century is plain from the canons of 1603. The 47th canon provides that every beneficed clergyman, licensed not to reside on his benefice, shall cause the cure to be supplied by a curate, that is, a sufficient and licensed preacher; and the next canon, the 48th, goes on to say that no curate shall be permitted to serve in any place without examination and admission by the bishop in writing under his hand and seal. Though, doubtless, there was by no means the same number of curates then as in modern times, yet it seems certain from these canons that such an order of ecclesiastics then existed; that is made more plain by subsequent Acts of the Legislature. I am not aware of any statute bearing directly on the point prior to the 12th of Anne, s. 2, c. 12. By that statute it was enacted, "that if any rector or vicar should present any curate to the bishop to be licensed, or admitted to serve the cure in his absence, the bishop should fix his stipend at an annual sum not exceeding 50*l*. And in the case of any dispute as to payment, the bishop should summarily hear and determine the same; and in case of nonpayment he might sequester the profits of the living." This statute shows clearly that in the reign of Queen Anne, curates, according to the modern acceptation of the word, were a class of ecclesiastical functionaries commonly known and recognised in the Church. The next statute to which it is necessary to refer is the 36 Geo. 3, c. 83. The first section of that statute, after reciting the statute of Queen Anne, and that in many places the stipend thereby authorised was inadequate, authorised the bishop, in cases where the incumbent is nonresident, to fix the stipend at any sum not exceeding 75*l.* per annum, and to allow the curate to occupy the rectory-house. There are then some clauses, putting, for certain purposes, perpetual curacies, and churches augmented under Queen Anne's Bounty, under the same footing as ordinary benefices. And then the 6th section proceeds thus:— "And whereas it is expedient that the authority of ordinaries to license curates, and to remove licensed curates, should be further explained, enlarged and confirmed, be it enacted and declared, that it shall be lawful for the ordinary to license any curate who is or shall be actually employed by the rector, vicar, or other incumbent of any parish church or chapel, although no express nomination of such curate shall have been made, either in words or in writing, to the ordinary by the said rector, vicar, or other incumbent; and that the ordinary shall have power to revoke, summarily and without process, any licence granted to any curate employed within his jurisdiction, and to remove such curate for such good and reasonable cause as he shall approve, subject, nevertheless, to an appeal, as well in the case of a grant of a licence to a curate who has not been nominated, as in revocation of a licence granted to a curate; such appeal to be made in either case to the archbishop of the province, and to be determined in a summary manner." By the 57 Geo. 3, c. 99, so much of the Act of Queen Anne and of the 36 Geo. 3, c. 83, as relates to the maintenance of curates and to the fixing of their stipend is repealed, together with the whole of an intermediate Act, namely, the 53 Geo. 3, c. 149, which had contained provisions further extending the amount of stipend which might be assigned to them. This repeal does not touch the 6th section of the 36 Geo. 3, inasmuch as that does not relate to the maintenance of curates or the fixing of their stipends. This last statute, the 57 Geo. 3, c. 99, is wholly repealed by the 1 & 2 Vict. c. 106, except so far as it had repealed former enactments; so that the enactments now in force appear to be the 6th section of the 36 Geo. 3, c. 83, and the whole of the 1 & 2 Vict. c. 106. It is under this last statute that the present appeal was presented, and it is necessary, therefore, to look closely to its provisions. The first seventy-four sections relate to matters foreign to our present inquiry; the 75th and 76th sections give power to the bishop, when an incumbent is nonresident, to appoint a curate, and fix within certain limits the amount of his stipend. Sects. 77 and 78 enable the bishop, in certain cases, to appoint a curate even when the incumbent is resident, and does not consent to the appointment. Sects. 81 and 82 point out the steps to be taken by any curate in order to obtain the bishop's licence, whether the incumbent be resident or not. Sect. 83 provides that, whether the incumbent is or is not resident, the licence shall state the amount of the stipend; and if any dispute arises concerning the stipend or its payments, the bishop shall summarily hear and determine it without appeal, and may, if necessary, sequester the profits of the living. Sects. 84 to 94, both inclusive, point out the amount of the stipend to be allowed in different cases. Sects. 95 and 96 regulate the mode in which a curate is to give up his cure and the rectory-house when a new incumbent is appointed, and in certain other cases. Sect. 97 forbids a curate to give up his curacy without a certain notice. And then comes sect. 98, on which the present question arises: "And be it enacted that it shall be lawful for the bishop to license any curate, who is or shall be actually employed by any nonresident incumbent of any benefice within his diocese, although no express nomination of such curate shall have been made to such bishop by the incumbent, and that the bishop shall have power, after having given to the curate sufficient opportunity of showing reason to the contrary, to revoke, summarily and without further process, any licence granted to any curate, and to remove such curate, for any cause which shall appear to such bishop to be good and reasonable, provided always that any such curate may, within one month after service upon him of such revocation, appeal to the archbishop of the province, who shall confirm or annul such revocation as to him shall appear just and proper." Acting on the authority conferred, or supposed to be conferred, by this section, the bishop revoked the licence which had been granted by his predecessor to Mr. Poole. Mr. Poole duly appealed to the archbishop, who confirmed the revocation. Does any appeal lie from the decision of the archbishop? We think not. The argument on behalf of Mr. Poole was, that by the ancient law of the Church, as finally altered and settled by the statute 24 Hen. 8, c. 12, and 25 Hen. 8, c. 19, there lay, of common right, an appeal from every decision of an archbishop to the King in his Court of Ch.; and that, by the recent statutes of 2 & 3 Will. 4, c. 92, and 3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 41, s. 3, that appeal has been now transferred to the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council. By the 2nd section of 24 Hen. 8, c. 12, it is enacted that all causes testamentary, causes matrimonial, and causes relating to tithes, should from thenceforth be finally determined within this realm. And then, by sects. 5 and 6, it is enacted that in all such causes, i. e. causes relating to testaments, marriages, or tithes, any of the parties grieved may appeal from the archdeacon (if the matter or cause be there begun) to the bishop; and if commenced before the bishop, then from him to the archbishop, there to be definitely determined. In the next year was passed the celebrated Act commonly called the Act of the Submission of the Clergy, 25 Hen. 8, c. 25; and by the 3rd section of that Act it is enacted that no appeals whatever should be had to any authority out of the realm in any causes or matters whatever, but that all appeals, what cause or matter soever they might concern, should be had and prosecuted by the parties aggrieved after such manner as had been limited by the preceding statute in regard to causes of matrimony and tithes; and then by the 4th section it is provided that parties grieved by any act of justice in any of the courts of the archbishop might appeal to the King in Chancery, who should thereupon direct his commission to the delegates to hear and determine the same in the same way as in appeals from the Court of Admiralty. The power thus conferred on the Crown was, by the Acts of the last reign, transferred to the King in council, and is now exercised upon the advice of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council. The argument of the app. was, that his case comes within the purview of these statutes. The stat. 1 & 2 Vict. c. 106 gives him, he contends, a right of appeal to the archbishop, and from him the statutes of Hen. 8 and Will. 4 give him a right of appeal to her Majesty in council, and to the Judicial Committee. But we are of opinion that the provisions of the statutes of Hen. 8 cannot be thus engrafted on those of the modern statute. The appeals given by the statutes of Hen. 8 were appeals in matters and causes in contest in which complaint was made of some violated right where there was in the ordinary acceptation of the word litigation. But the case is very different in the appeals given by the statute under which the present question arises. The object of that statute evidently is to authorise and compel the bishop, for the benefit of the community, to exercise his discretion in a summary way on various matters in which it is necessary or expedient that a discretionary power should be lodged somewhere. Thus it may be reasonable, under special circumstances, to permit an incumbent to be nonresident. Circumstances may arise which may make it expedient to put an end to such a permission. It may be necessary to fix the stipend of a curate; additional curates may be required for the sake of the parish. In these, and very many similar cases to which the Act extends, it is absolutely necessary that a discretion should be lodged somewhere, and the Legislature has confided that discretion to the bishop. He is to determine whether there are circumstances which will justify the non-residence of an incumbent, or which make it expedient that a licence given to him for that purpose shall be revoked, or what amount of salary a curate ought to receive, or whether in certain cases additional curates ought to be appointed. He is to exercise in these and the numerous other cases which the Act embraces his discretion as to what ought, in the interests of the Church and of the public, to be done. But then the Legislature, seeing that, in the exercise of that discretion, the bishop may err, has given to the party affected by what has been done or refused to be done, a right to appeal to the archbishop, whose duty it still is to exercise his discretion as it had been the duty of the bishop. In a solitary instance—namely, the refusal by the archbishop to grant a dispensation to hold two livings—a right of appeal is given to the Queen in council by sect. 6. But in that case the original discretion is exercised by the archbishop and not by the bishop, so that, unless there had been such an appeal given, there would have been no control over the discretion first exercised. The circumstance that in this case an appeal is expressly given to the Queen in council is strong to show that where no such appeal is expressly given it cannot be implied. The appeal given by the statute from the bishop to the archbishop, and in the case mentioned from the archbishop to the Queen in council, is not an appeal as between litigant parties. It is a reasonable safeguard provided by the Legislature to prevent hardship from a hasty or erroneous exercise of discretion; and even if there were nothing in the Act excluding further appeal, we might reasonably have inferred that no such further appeal was contemplated; but all question on this subject seems to us to be excluded by the positive provisions of the Legislature. The 109th section is as follows:—"And be it enacted that in every case in which jurisdiction is given to the bishop of the diocese, or to any archbishop under the provisions of this Act and for the purposes thereof, and the enforcing of the due execution of the provisions thereof, all other and concurrent jurisdiction in respect thereof shall, except as herein otherwise provided, wholly cease, and no other jurisdiction in relation to the provisions of this Act shall be used, exercised, or enforced, save and except such jurisdiction of the bishop and archbishop under this Act; anything in any Act or Acts of Parliament or law or laws, or usage or custom to the contrary, notwithstanding." This section appears to us decisive on the subject; it excludes all proceedings not expressly authorised by the Act, and thus relieves us from all obligation of considering the numerous ancient authorities and principles to which we were referred. We only add, with reference to the doubt suggested whether the 98th section of the Act extends to the case of the app., he having been the curate of a resident, not of a nonresident incumbent, that it is a point not material to be considered; for, if the appellant does not come within that clause, he certainly comes within the 6th section of 36 Geo. 3, c. 83, to which the same principles apply. Their Lordships will therefore humbly report to her Majesty that the appeal must be dismissed, no such appeal lying from the decision of the archbishop, and we see no reason for departing from the ordinary rule that it must be dismissed with costs.

POOLE v. BISHOP OF LONDON.

[PRIV. CO.]

Dismissed with costs.

REG. v. THE GUARDIANS OF THE CAMBRIDGE UNION.

Appeal—Part heard—Adjournment to a subsequent sessions.

It is competent to the court of quarter sessions to adjourn the further hearing of a part heard appeal to a subsequent sessions.

This was a case stated from sessions under the following circumstances:—An appeal against a lunatic order, dated the 14th May 1860, came on for trial at the Warwickshire sessions on the 4th July 1860. At the hearing the resps. relied upon a settlement by apprenticeship, and the case stated "that in order to enable them to give secondary evidence of the indenture of apprenticeship of the said pauper, the resps. called evidence to prove a proper search for the said indenture, and the loss of the same. The sessions, on hearing this evidence and on the objection of the appa., held that a sufficient search for the missing indenture had not been made by the resps., and refused to admit secondary evidence of the same. The resps. then applied to the sessions to adjourn the further hearing of the said appeal to the then next quarter sessions of the peace, in order to enable them to make further search for the said missing indenture. On the part of the appa. it was objected that the statute 16 & 17 Vict. c. 97, limited the jurisdiction of the sessions over the said appeal to the particular sessions at which the same was then being tried, and that the sessions had no power to further adjourn the hearing of the said appeal, as contended for by the resps., and that no subsequent sessions had power over the said appeal, and that the said order of the 14th May 1860 ought to be quashed, there being no evidence before the sessions to support the same. The sessions held that they had jurisdiction to adjourn the further hearing of the appeal to the then next quarter sessions of the peace, and they made an order adjourning the same accordingly, on payment of the costs of the day by the resps. to the appa., subject to the opinion of the Court of Q.B. on this point. And at the then next quarter sessions of the peace held at Warwick, on the 16th Oct. 1860, the court, on application of the resps., and for the purposes of, and without prejudice to this case, further adjourned the hearing of the said appeal to the then next quarter sessions of the peace for the said county. If this court should be of opinion that the decision of the court of quarter sessions was incorrect on this point, and that they had no jurisdiction to adjourn the further hearing of the said appeal, then the said order of sessions adjourning the further hearing of the said appeal and the said order of the 14th May 1860 to be quashed."

Macaulay, Q.C. and E. C. Leigh appeared in support of the order of sessions, and contended that the sessions had a power to adjourn a case though part heard: (R. v. Kendal, 2 Ell. & Ell. 249; R. v. Wills, 13 East, 353; R. v. Baker, 11 Q.B. 397; Boorman v. Blyth, 7 Ell. & Bl. 26; R. v. Kimbolton, 6 A. & E. 603; Kees v. The Queen, 10 Q.B. 928.)

Huddleston, Q.C. and Spooner, contra, argued that, notwithstanding the sessions might adjourn a case to give judgment or consult the judges of assize, they have no jurisdiction to adjourn a part heard appeal: (16 & 17 Vict. c. 97, s. 108, s. 128; Bac. Ab. vol. 2, 160; Rez v. Reading, Cas. tem. Hardwick, 2nd vol. 79; Rez v. Kendal, 1 Ell. & Ell. 492, judgment of Crompton, J.; 17 & 18 Vict. c. 125, s. 19.)

CROMPTON, J.—I am of opinion, upon the whole, that the sessions had jurisdiction to adjourn the appeal as they did, but that it should be exercised with very great caution. There are many cases in which it could not be said that such an adjournment would be improper. The only dictum against the power is in Rex v. Kendal. I certainly thought there that it could not be done when the appeal had been part heard. But I was rather hasty in that opinion; I should have said, "it ought not to be done," and not "it could not be done." As regards the particular Act of Parliament upon which this appeal took place, I see no distinction in this case in that respect and others. That there is a jurisdiction in the sessions, either to respite or adjourn by continuances, is clear; but it is said that where a case is part heard, the case itself cannot be adjourned, but the sessions themselves must be adjourned. It was asked by Mr. Spooner what is to be adjourned? I think that the whole appeal should be adjourned, and the whole heard again. It is admitted that it can be adjourned for certain causes, such as to consult with the judges of assize, or to give judgment; and if so it is very difficult to say that it cannot be adjourned when part heard. Now I think that the later authorities show us this may be done. It is said there are no such instances, but I find it laid down in Burrow's Settlement Cases (Rex v. Sible Hedingham, p. 114), an appeal is spoken of as being taken up at a subsequent sessions, which looks as though it had been part heard. That view is very much confirmed by the case in Hardwick, R. v. Reading. After considerable doubt, I come to the conclusion that there is nothing to show that the sessions have not this jurisdiction. There will, therefore, be judgment for the resps. I may say that my brother Hill, before he left the court, came to the same conclusion.

BLACKBURN, J.—The general rule as laid down in Rex v. Wills is, that the court who are to try the appeal have an incidental authority to adjourn it when once properly lodged, if it be necessary for the advancement or convenience of justice, and that the sessions are to judge of the proper occasion for doing so. The question now raised is, whether it is impossible that the sessions can determine that it is for the advancement of justice that they can adjourn it. No doubt, after an appeal is once commenced, it would be very inconvenient to adjourn it, and therefore those who have the power to adjourn should pause before adjourning. But I cannot see any decision which prohibits this. Whether or not in the present case there was sufficient ground for adjourning I will not say; but I may say that in general it ought to be exercised with very great caution. There may be cases, such as a witness being taken ill, or its being discovered that the other side have been guilty of malpractices, in which it would be very proper to adjourn. In the case of Rex v. Reading, it would appear that the justices had part heard the case, and then had adjourned it to ask the opinion of the judges of assize. The case was then taken up by a subsequent court of quarter sessions. I hope it will be understood that the power of adjournment should be very sparingly exercised. (a)

REG. v. THE GOVERNORS, &C., OF THE LICENSED VICTUALLERS' SOCIETY.

Poor-rate—School of the Licensed Victuallers' Society—Rateability of.

The school of the Licensed Victuallers' Society is established under Royal charter, and is of a purely charitable character, no profits being derived from it. There is, however, a large hall in the building in which the quarterly and other meetings of the society are held:

Held, that there is a beneficial occupation, and that the building is liable to be assessed to the poor-rate.

(a) Cockburn, J. was absent through indisposition, and Hill, J. had gone to chambers pending the arguments.

This was a case which reserved the question of whether or not the school of the Licensed Victuallers' Society, in Kennington-lane, is exempt from being assessed to the rate for the relief of the poor. The school was established by Royal charter, and is of a purely charitable character, no profits whatever being derived from it. It appeared, however, that there is a large hall in which the quarterly and other meetings of the society are held. The rate was appealed against upon the ground that there was no beneficial occupation.

Huddleston, Q.C. appeared for the apps., and argued that there was no beneficial occupation, and so the premises were not liable to be rated: (R. v. Waldo, Cald. 358; R. v. Agar, 14 East, 256; R. v. Wilson, 12 A. & E. 94; R. v. Temple, 2 Ell. & B.; R. v. Baptist Infirmary Society, 10 Q. B. 889; R. v. Sterry, 12 A. & E. 84.)

Lush, Q.C. (Knapp with him) in support of the rate, were not called upon.

CROMPTON J.—It is impossible to contend in this case that where a society whose main object is private benefit to their own members, keep the building for that purpose, and hold their meetings there, that it is not liable to be assessed to the poor rate.

HILL and BLACKBURN, JJ. concurred.

Judgment for the resps.

Saturday, April 27.

REG. on the prosecution of the TOWN COUNCIL OF BIRMINGHAM (resps.) v. THE BIRMINGHAM WATERWORKS COMPANY (apps.).

Rate—Land covered with water—Reservoirs—Water-pipes.

By the Birmingham Improvement Act 1851 the town council are empowered, by clause 128, to make and levy a rate to be called "the Borough Improvement Rate," upon any person who occupies any house, shop, &c., except as thereafter excepted, according to the full net annual value thereof respectively; and by clause 129 it is provided that "the occupiers of any land covered with water," &c., shall be rated in respect of the same at one-fourth part only of the net annual value:

Held, that a reservoir of a water company came within the proviso, but that water-pipes did not.

This was a case stated by the Recorder of Birmingham, upon an appeal tried before him, against an assessment of the apps. to the borough improvement rate.

It appeared that the company were incorporated by the 7 Geo. 4, c. 109 (local), for the purpose of constructing waterworks, and to supply, by means of aqueducts, pipes, mains and reservoirs, the town of Birmingham, &c., with water. The company, in pursuance of their Act, made a large reservoir covering about eighteen acres of land. They also constructed a smaller reservoir, and from this reservoir, which is supplied from the larger one by means of underground pipes they supplied the town. The company subsequently obtained another Act, the 18 Vict. c. 34 (local), by which the former one was repealed, and in which was embodied the Waterworks Clauses Act 1847 (10 Vict. c. 17). In pursuance of this Act the company proceeded to construct new reservoirs and lay down new mains and pipes. By the Birmingham Improvement Act 1851, in which the 10 & 11 Vict. c. 34 (the Towns Improvement Clauses Act 1847), so far as relates to sects. 167 to 184, both inclusive, is incorporated, the town council is empowered by clause 128 to make and levy a rate to be called "the Borough Improvement Rate" upon every person who occupies any house, shop, warehouse, counting-house, coach-house, stable, cellar, vault, building, workshop, manufactory, garden, land, or tenement whatsoever, except as thereafter excepted within the limits of the Act, according to the full and annual value thereof respectively; and by clause 129 it is provided that the occupiers of any land covered with water, or used only as a canal or towing-path for the same, or as a railway constructed under the powers of any Act of Parliament for public conveyance, shall be rated in respect of the same to the rates authorised to be levied by this Act, at one-fourth part only of the net annual value; and by clause 131 the following additional clauses of the Towns Improvement Act, namely, the 156th, and 163rd to 166th, both inclusive, are incorporated. The borough improvement rate, which was the subject of the appeal, was made in pursuance of and subject to the provisions of the said Act, at the rate of 2s. in the pound. It was admitted that the company were rated to the full extent as houses, &c., and not at one-fourth part of the net annual value of the reservoir, pipes, mains and other works within the said borough. It was contended (and the case was stated for the opinion of the court thereupon) that the reservoir and pipes and mains ought to have been rated at one-fourth as land covered with water.

Lush, Q.C. (Field with him) appeared for the resps., and contended that, first, as regards the reservoirs, they ought not to be considered as "land covered with water," such words evidently applying to land naturally covered with water, and not to land artificially covered for commercial purposes, and that the mention of "canals" shows that the Legislature meant this, for if they had intended otherwise they would have mentioned "reservoirs." Secondly, as regards the pipes, in no sense could they be considered as "land covered with water."

Huddleston, Q.C. (Adams with him) for the appa., argued, first, that the reservoirs were clearly within the words "land covered with water." [CROMPTON, J.—What do you say to the pipes?] Secondly, the pipes which contain water come under the same description, and that it matters not that the water itself may be covered with land. [CROMPTON, J.—Then a gaspipe would be "land covered with gas!"]

COCKBURN, C. J.—This case is very clear. There is no doubt that the reservoir is "land covered with water." The argument addressed to us by the resps. upon the point would have been a very good one for the committee upon the Bill, but it is clear that the words used bring the reservoirs within the meaning of the Act. As regards the pipes, they are only the medium of conveying the water from the reservoir, and are not privileged.

CROMPTON and HILL, JJ. concurred.

Case sent back, with the opinion of the court that the rate should be amended as regards the reservoirs, and to stand as regards the pipes.

STEPHENSON (app.) v. TAYLOR (resp.)

Volunteer infantry — Turnpike toll — Exemption—3 Geo. 4, c. 126, s. 32.

A member of a corps of volunteer infantry, if dressed in the uniform of his corps, and having his arms, furniture and accoutrements, according to the regulations of his corps, is exempt from toll when passing through any turnpike-gate in a carriage, either to or from any place appointed for and on the days of exercise, inspection, or review, and this notwithstanding the carriage is one hired for the occasion.

This was a case stated under the 20 & 21 Vict. c. 43, by one of the metropolitan police magistrates as follows:—

"The app. in this case is a captain in the 1st Surrey Rifle Volunteers, and the resp. is collector of tolls at Kennington turnpike-gate, Surrey, and on the 12th June 1860 the resp. appeared before me to answer the complaint of the app., "for that he, the said resp., on the 2nd day of June 1860, at the parish of Lambeth, &c., being then and there the collector of tolls at a certain turnpike-gate there situate, did unlawfully demand and take of and from one George Hodgkins, the sum of three pence as and for toll for a carriage drawn by one horse then passing through the said gate, the said George Hodgkins being then and there exempt from the payment of such toll by reason that the said carriage was then and there conveying volunteer infantry, and the said George Hodgkins then and there claiming such exemption," contrary to the provisions of the statutes 3 Geo. 4, c. 126, s. 32, and 4 Geo. 4, c. 95, s. 30 (the General Turnpike Acts). It was proved before me that Hodgkins was a volunteer belonging to the before-mentioned corps, and that on the 2nd of June he and others the members of the corps were assembled at Kennington, by regimental order, for "marching and drill," and did march out and were afterwards dismissed at the head-quarters of the regiment, at Hanover-park, Peckham; that Hodgkins and two other members of the corps there hired a hackney carriage and proceeded towards home, and that it was necessary to pass through Kennington turnpike-gate to do so. There was no one else in the cab, and the volunteers were dressed in their uniform and had their arms and accoutrements according to the regulations of the corps. The resp. demanded threepence for toll, and Hodgkins claimed exemption, which the resp. refused to allow, and Hodgkins paid the amount demanded. Upon the part of the resp. it was contended that the carriage was not then and there employed in conveying volunteer infantry within the meaning of the statute, and that Hodgkins was not entitled to exemption from payment of toll. I was of opinion that the exemption did not extend to carriages used by members of a volunteer corps for their own private ease and convenience, which appeared to be the case on the occasion in question, but was limited to carriages used in performing some public duty requiring the use of a carriage. It was agreed that the nature of the duty to be performed to give the exemption was shown by subsequent words in sect. 3, Geo. 4, c. 126, s. 32, and that if the volunteer was going to or returning from any place appointed for and on the days of exercise, and was dressed in the uniform of his corps, and had his arms, furniture and accoutrements according to the regulations of such corps, he was exempt from the payment of toll; but looking carefully at these words, I could not come to this conclusion. It appeared to me that those words related only to the exemption of horses furnished by or for a person belonging to a corps of yeomanry or volunteer cavalry or infantry, and rode by him on the occasion referred to, and not at all to carriages. That in the consideration of the matter I was confined to the words "carriage conveying volunteer infantry," that I was bound to put a reasonable construction upon those words, in accordance with other provisions in the section relating to the exemption of carriages when used by the regular forces of the kingdom; and that if, under the circumstances of the case before me, the parties were exempt, any carriage with any number of horses, and under any circumstances whatever, so long as the person in whose employment it was belonged to a volunteer corps would be alike exempt, which I thought could not be intended, wherefore I dismissed the information."

By the 32nd section of 3 Geo. 4, c. 126, certain exemptions from toll are enacted (inter alia):—"Or for any carriage conveying volunteer infantry, or for any horse furnished by or for any person belonging to any corps of yeomanry or volunteer cavalry or infantry, and rode by him in going to or returning from any place appointed for and on the days of exercise, inspection, or review, or on other public duty, provided that such person shall be dressed in the uniform of his corps, and shall have his arms, furniture and accoutrements, ac-ording to the regulations of such corps, at the time of claiming the exemption."

Garth appeared for the app., and contended that the magistrate was wrong, for that the exaction of the toll was illegal, the carriage being exempt as conveying members of volunteer corps.

Lush, Q.C. (with him Levy) was called upon, and he argued that there was no exemption in such a case, for that the words "any carriage conveying voluntary infantry" must be taken to mean a carriage employed in the public service; that the exemption from toll of the regular army by the Mutiny Act does not extend to any hired or private vehicle.

COCKBURN, C.J.—I am of opinion that the decision of the magistrate was erroneous, and that he ought to have decided in favour of the complainant; the case, therefore, will be remitted to him, with our opinion upon it. Upon looking carefully at the Turnpike Act, I am of opinion that a carriage bonâ fide employed in conveying volunteer infantry to a place of exercise, and bringing them back, is entitled to exemption. The carriage must be employed substantially in the conveyance of the fare. The act of a volunteer riding upon a public conveyance would not cause it to be exempt, and I think that if bonâ fide occupied by volunteers, the mere accidental circumstance of a person not a volunteer riding in it would not deprive it of its exemption, nor would a public carriage be exempt merely because volunteers were riding in it. Much doubt has arisen in consequence of the faulty punctuation in the published copy of the statute. Attention has been called to the case of the regular army; but there is an obvious distinction between the volunteers who give up a portion of their valuable time, and the regular army, whose whole time is at the disposal of the public. The Legislature, for the purpose of encouraging these useful bodies, have given them an exemption which it did not think it necessary to confer on the regular army. I think, therefore, the exemption applies to such a case where the volunteers were actually returning from exercise.

CROMPTON and BLACKBURN, JJ. concurred.

To be remitted back to the magistrate with the opinion of the court.

V. C. STUART'S COURT.

Reported by JAMES B. DAVIDSON, Esq., of Lincoln's Inn, Barrister-at-Law.

BROCK v. KELLOCK.

Medical law—Proof of live birth—Respiration and pulsation.

Upon a question of whether a child was still-born, or whether it was born alive and died shortly after its birth, the accoucheur who delivered the mother gave evidence that he felt the child move, and, after it was born, he felt a slight pulsation of the funis; also that the chest of the child was arched. He did not, however, notice any movement of the chest subsequent to the child's birth.

In order to establish legal proof that a child was born alive, it is not invariably necessary to show that respiration has taken place.

A single vital act, such as the beating of the heart of the infant after separation from the mother, is a better, because a more easily defined, proof of live birth than any amount of undefined respiratory action.

The sole question in this suit was, whether a child was or was not born alive.

Thomas Corral, of Sheerness, by his will, dated the 1st Oct. 1825, gave all his estate and effects on trust for his widow for life, and after his death for his son Thomas Corral and his daughter Elizabeth Sarah Corral, in equal shares, as and when they should attain the age of twenty-one.

Testator died in 1827. Both the children attained twenty-one. On the 16th March 1841 Thomas Corral the son married the plt. Harriet Elizabeth Beresford Brock, then H. E. B. Patey, spinster. Thomas Corral the son died on the 25th July 1842, intestate, leaving, as the plts. alleged, one child only surviving. This child was a female, and was an infant en ventre sa mere at the time of the death of Thomas Corral the son. It was born on the 22nd March 1843, and died, as the plts. alleged, a few hours after its birth.

The female plt., who had since, viz. on the 9th July 1859, married the other plt. Samuel Brock, claimed—or her husband in her right claimed—to be entitled to one moiety of the trust-estate, i. e. to the whole of her late husband's share in the trust-estate, as the legal personal representative of her late husband, and of her deceased daughter.

The deft. John Kellock had married Elizabeth Sarah Corral, the testator's daughter. She died in 1851. Elizabeth Corral, the testator's widow, died on the 5th April 1860. Letters of administration to the estate of the testator's widow were granted to the deft., and through her he was also the legal personal representative of the testator.

The deft. Kellock had also administered to the estate of his wife. He said he believed that the child of Mrs. Corral, which died on the 22nd March 1843, was still-born. If that were so, the female plt. would be entitled to only one moiety of her husband's share as his widow; and the other moiety of the share of Thomas Corral, the son, would belong to the deft. as representative of his widow, the sister and sole next of kin of Thomas Corral the son.

The suit was for administration; a decree had been made, and inquiries directed, and the contest turned mainly upon the medical evidence.

Dr. Freeman, surgeon, who delivered the child's mother, said: "I verily believe the child was born alive. When it was born it was very weak, and I had great doubts whether I could save its life. When I believe that a child was born alive, I always place it in warm water, which I never do when it is still-born. Believing the child to be born alive, I placed it in warm water according to my usual practice, and used other means to sustain its vitality, but without success. I should not have adopted these measures had the child been born dead."

Mrs. Fowell, widow, who was present, said that about half an hour after the birth, she went into the room to which the child had been taken. She found it was in a warm bath; its eyes were wide open, and she was particularly struck with their brightness and beauty. She remembered calling the nurse's attention to them. They had all the appearance of life in them. She then believed, and still believed, that at that period the child was alive. She afterwards saw the child in its coffin, when the eyes were closed.

Mrs. Brock, the mother, said that the child was born alive, and up to the period of its birth she had a distinct recollection of having felt the child to be alive. She believed the child survived its birth only two hours.

Dr. Freeman was examined. He said: "It was Mrs. Corral's first confinement and she was very ill. I was satisfied that the child was alive. I am quite sure the child was alive immediately before the last expulsive effort. I felt it move, and after it was born I felt a slight pulsation at the funis. It is not unusual for a child not to cry when the labour has been very protracted. The child's existence became separate from the mother at the moment that I divided the funis, and I felt a very weak pulsation of the funis attached to the child, and I therefore believed it to be alive, and applied methods for its restoration. I gave up all hopes of saving the child within a few minutes, as the funis had gradually ceased to pulsate. This was soon after it was put into the bath. When I am not satisfied that a child is dead, I usually order it to be put into a warm bath, and sometimes even if it is still-born. I did not notice whether the eyes were closed or open, and I did not notice that the eyes were very bright or very beautiful when in the bath. . . . I did not observe that the child breathed or moved after it was born; my attention was directed to restoring its vitality, as there was still a feeble action going on at its funis. This feeble pulsation of the funis clearly showed circulation was going on in the child independent of the mother. Although I did not notice that the child breathed, I believe it was quite capable of breathing, from the pulsation which I felt at the funis. I believe the child was alive several minutes after it was separated from its mother, and that it died from the severity of the labour."

BROCK v. KELLOCK.

Dr. Freeman was again examined. He said there were a variety of reasons besides that of the funis having pulsated at the time he divided the child from the mother, which induced him to believe that the child was living. One reason was, the certainty that the child moved one minute before it was born; the great flexibility of every joint and part of the child; there not being the slightest rigidity, and the chest being fully developed and arched, which was a strong evidence of its having breathed. The arching of the chest was always considered evidence of the child having breathed; when the chest was flat, it was evidence that the child had not breathed. The child's chest was arched at its birth; he noticed no movement of the chest afterwards. There was a marked distinction in the child's countenance and appearance different to what it was when it was placed in the bath. He should not expect to see any change in a child that was dead-born, but he should in a child that was born alive. The countenance and pulsation in the funis was an indication that infant circulation was going on in the heart of the child. He considered pulsation one of the principal evidences of life. You could not have breath without circulation, neither could you have continued circulation without breath and without life. He never particularly noticed its breathing, but he had no doubt of its breathing—he meant after its birth. It was usual in practice to wait until the child had breathed, before the cord was divided. He had no doubt of the child's breathing, by his having followed his usual practice.

Dr. Robert Lee, of No. 4, Savile-row, physician, deposed, that having read Dr. Freeman's evidence, he had no hesitation in declaring it to be his opinion that in this case the child was not born alive. He founded his opinion on the following circumstances, viz.:—"According to both Scotch and English law, a child cannot be said to be born alive unless it breathes. If the funis of the child is felt pulsating while the fœtus is within the uterus, that is held by all medical men to be a proof that the child is alive before its birth; whereas, if the funis has ceased pulsating, the conclusion is that the child is dead. The pulsation of the funis continuing after birth, proves that the child is alive in the same sense as it was before birth. I mean by that, that the child has a sign of uterine life still extant; but the pulsation does not prove that the child is alive, because another function of life is required to constitute life, viz. that of respiration. The pulsation of the cord is a symptom that there is that continuing circulation of the heart which has sustained the life of the child while in the mother's womb; but before a child can be said to possess independent life it must respire. The circulation of the heart would induce respiration, and without it respiration cannot take place. The circulation of the heart forms only one symptom of life, and that a minor symptom; and respiration must ensue before a child can be said to live. The gradual cessation of pulsation in the funis is what I should expect to find in a child that had been so weakened during the labour as in this instance, and shows that the circulation of the heart was so weak, and the remains of uterine life so feeble, as to be unable to induce respiration. The heart may act, and in some creatures does act, many hours after it has been cut out of the body, and although the body is actually dead. For these reasons I say that circulation of the heart is not alone a sufficient symptom of life, but there must also be the essential symptom of respiration which Dr. Freeman swears was absent in this case." As to the remaining symptoms, Dr. Lee said: "First, as to the certainty that the child moved one minute after its birth, it has always been held that the fact of uterine life would not establish extra-uterine life, especially as in the cases of primiparous females the labour is frequently so severe that a child who is fully alive, so far as uterine life is concerned, is perfectly dead before its final expulsion from the mother. Secondly, as to there being no rigidity of the body, I should not expect to find rigidity of the body until after a considerable period had elapsed after death. Thirdly, as to the chest being arched, if this is meant to convey any symptom of respiration after birth, the description of the child cannot be correct, as, if the child respired after birth, Dr. Freeman must have observed some movement of its chest, which he swears he did not. If the chest was arched at birth, and no movement of the chest was observed, it must have been a case when the child endeavoured to respire before final expulsion from the womb."

Dr. Ramsbotham, of No. 8, Portman-square, physician, deposed that, having read Dr. Freeman's evidence, he had no hesitation in swearing positively that, if no other symptoms of life could be proved than those which had been mentioned by Dr. Freeman, the child must be pronounced to have been still-born. "I have always, and still do, draw a great distinction between intra-uterine and extra-uterine life, and I do so for the following reasons. When a child is born, if living, it enters on a new phase of existence, &c. The commencement of the function of respiration is universally considered as heralding the entrance into life, and a child that has never breathed is said to be still-born. To constitute a live birth, then, the child must have respired; that is to say, it must have taken upon itself the performance of those functions which will allow it to exist independently of its mother. I cannot admit that a few feeble pulsations in the funis, or a twitch of the lips, or even the movement of a limb, would be sufficient to entitle it to be regarded as born alive."

Mr. Godson, of Barnet, surgeon, said he should have certified the child in the present case as a still-born child; for it was the practice amongst medical men to certify a child still-born unless it had been observed to breathe after death.

Dr. Tyler Smith, of No. 7, Upper Grosvenor-street, physician, deposed as follows:—"In my opinion the fact that pulsation was observed in the funis or umbilical cord after delivery is a physiological proof that the child in question was not born dead. The pulsation of the cord proves that the heart of the child was still beating, and the circulation, at least to some extent, going on. This is wholly incompatible with death. The child may at this time have been dying, but most certainly it was not dead. The action of the heart is at the foundation of all other acts of vitality. It has hence been called by physiologists, "Primum vivens, ultimum moriens." The remarks of Dr. Robert Lee on the contraction of the heart in the lower animals, as fishes and reptiles, after the removal of the organs from the body, do not fairly apply to the heart of the human infant. The human heart has never been seen so to pulsate under like circumstances. Even in the cases referred to, the contraction of the heart is a proof that vitality is not extinct. I do not consider it likely that Mr. Freeman was deceived as to the pulsation of the funis: the frequency of the beat of the foetal heart is very different from the pulse of the accoucheur. Mr. Freeman speaks of it as a positive fact, and it is very common for the heart of a new-born infant to beat a short time after birth and then to cease. . . . In giving a certificate of still-birth or otherwise, medical men or accoucheurs do not consider the question of whether the child is legally alive or dead at or after birth. If a child's heart should beat forcibly for many minutes, if it gasped and performed the movements of respiration again and again, yet if it died within a few minutes after birth, medical men would consider it as still-born and certify accordingly. I believe there could be no question but that such a child would be considered as born alive; a distinction therefore must be made between the medical and legal ideas of still birth and live birth. . . . It is clear from the cases cited in Beck's Medical Jurisprudence, to which I have referred, that perfect respiration is not essential to legal life; and Mr. Chitty appears to depend more upon the circulation of which the heart is the centre, than upon respiration, for its establishment. It is for legal authorities to define the meaning of legal life; but physiologically there can be no question that this child was not dead, or beyond the chance of recovery, as long as the heart continued beating. It was therefore alive at the moment of birth, and subsequently, according to the testimony of Mr. Freeman. I submit that it would be much better to take as proof of live birth a single vital act, such as the beating of the heart after separation from the mother, which can hardly be mistaken, than an indefinite amount of respiratory action, which must always be doubtful and difficult of proof in cases where the child dies shortly after delivery."

BROCK v. KELLOCK.

[V.C. S.]

In an affidavit in reply, Mr. Freeman said it was a mistake on Dr. Lee's part to have stated that he (Mr. Freeman) had sworn respiration to have been absent in this case; on the contrary, he had said he had no doubt that the child breathed after he had separated it from its mother.

Dr. Taylor (author of the work on Medical Jurisprudence), in a letter addressed to Dr. Lee with reference to this case, dated the 27th Feb. last, referring to an old case of Fish v. Palmer, cited in 1 Paris & Fonblanque, 225; John Gordon Smith's Forensic Medicine, 515; and 1 Beck Med. Jur. 355, 10th edit., wrote as follows:—"Most of the writers differ from me, and think that the child should have been (in Fish v. Palmer) pronounced dead. But this depends upon what is considered to be real and absolute death. One fixes on the cessation of the action of the lungs, another of the heart, another of the muscular contractibility. I am of opinion that in a case of this kind we should not affirm that a child is dead in law until it is completely dead in a physiological sense, and all vital actions have ceased."

Bacon, Q.C. and Karslake appeared for the plts.

Malins, Q.C. and Hardy were for the deft.

The following authorities were referred to:—Underwood v. Wing, 4 De G. M. & G. 633; Beck's Med. Jur. 269; Co. Litt. 29 b (n.).

The VICE-CHANCELLOR.—The single question in this case is, whether this child was born alive. The person competent to speak upon the subject is Dr. Freeman, who attended as accoucheur at the birth, and who has given his evidence upon oath three times over so cautiously, yet so clearly, that I am of opinion he has established that this child was born alive, and was not dead at the time when it was separated from its mother. The affidavits on the other side are mere criticisms upon the sworn statement of Dr. Freeman, and whatever may be the ingenuity of these criticisms, they certainly show differences of opinion between medical men. Dr. Lee and Dr. Ramsbotham are of opinion that unless respiration, which is one of the vital functions, be proved to have taken place, there is no sufficient evidence that the child has been born alive. But Dr. Freeman, Dr. Taylor, and Dr. Tyler Smith are of another opinion, and I think upon very sound grounds. A proof of pulsation and of action of the heart is much more easily to be had, and is a thing much more clearly a subject of evidence, than a proof of respiration. The connection between circulation, of which pulsation is evidence, and respiration is so extraordinary, that Dr. Freeman has stated that even Dr. Lee and Dr. Ramsbotham do not affect to controvert that the functions of respiration and circulation must necessarily co-exist. But respiration is a thing that may exist, and yet be extremely difficult to prove. It has been clearly proved in this case that this child respired—that is, that there must have been respiration during parturition. The chest was arched. None of the medical gentlemen whose testimony is adverse to that of Dr. Freeman affects to say that an arched chest is not a clear proof that respiration has taken place. They only say that this child had performed the function of respiration during the period of parturition. Where is the evidence that there was no respiration of any the faintest or most imperceptible kind, after the separation of the funis? None of them venture to swear that there was no respiration. Dr. Freeman, who speaks with extraordinary caution, says that he observed no movement of the chest after the separation of the funis; but that he believed at the time of the birth, and still believes, that the child was alive, from the pulsation of the cord. Now, in order to prove the existence of animal life, I think that proof of the performance of one clear vital function is enough. I think it is enough to prove pulsation in order to prove the existence of life; and speaking of what is legal evidence, I cannot adopt the view of Dr. Lee and Dr. Ramsbotham, whose theory is that unless you have proof of the performance of three functions essential to vitality, you have no proof that vitality existed. They say that respiration, which is most difficult to prove, is a clear evidence of animal life. So it is. But they swear, what surprises me, that, in the absence of clear evidence of respiration, clear evidence of pulsation and of animal motion is not to be taken as proof of the existence of animal life. I think, speaking as a lawyer, that the truth lies in the statement with which Dr. Tyler Smith concludes his affidavit, concurring in the statement of Dr. Taylor's opinion, which Dr. Lee has had the candour to bring forward. The truth lies, I think, in this statement of Dr. Smith: "It would be much better to take as proof of live birth a single vital act, such as the beating of the heart after separation from the mother, which can hardly be mistaken, than an undefinable amount of respiratory action, which must always be doubtful and difficult of proof in cases where the child dies shortly after delivery." Therefore, upon the whole, I am of opinion that it has been proved satisfactorily that this child was born alive, and was not born dead.

Upon the question of costs, his Honour said he had already stated his disapprobation of the course taken by the plts. They omitted to give the deft. the name of the accoucheur, or to supply other information whereby the truth might be ascertained, until after the bill was filed. His Honour disapproved also the amount of costs which had been incurred; therefore, upon the best consideration, he meant to dispose of the costs in the following way: he did not mean to give the plts. costs out of the fund until after that stage in the suit when Dr. Freeman's affidavit was filed. The plts.' costs after the date of that affidavit would be taxed and paid out of the entire fund. Up to that point the deft. would have his costs out of the entire fund, and no costs after that date. Declaration accordingly.

COURT OF QUEEN'S BENCH.

Reported by JOHN THOMPSON, T. W. SAUNDERS, and C. J. B. HERTLETT, Esqrs., Barristers-at-Law.

Wednesday, May 1.

REG. v. THE OVERSEERS OF TOXTETH-PARK.

The Local Government Act 1858—General district rate—Rateability of a workhouse.

Under the provisions of sect. 55 of the 21 & 22 Vict. c. 98 (the Local Government Act 1858), which enacts that "general district rates shall be made and levied upon the occupier of all such kinds of property as by the laws in force for the time being are or may be assessable to any rate for the relief of the poor," a parish workhouse is assessable.

This was a case stated for the opinion of this court under 12 & 13 Vict. c. 45, s. 11. The following were the principal facts:—

Toxteth-park is an extra-parochial place separately maintaining its own poor; part of it lies within the boundary of the borough of Liverpool, and the other part beyond such boundary, and such last-mentioned part is called the rural district of Toxteth-park. Toxteth-park and certain contiguous parishes were for some time united for the administration of the poor-laws, called the Union of West Derby; but in consequence of the increase of the population Toxteth-park was in the year 1857 separated from such union, and since then the poor-laws have been administered and the apps. as a separate board of guardians elected under the provisions of the 7 & 8 Vict. c. 101, s. 66, and poor-rates made in respect of Toxteth-park are entire rates, extending over the whole of Toxteth-park. In consequence of such separation, the board of guardians of Toxteth-park purchased a large piece of land situate in the district of Smithdown-lane hereinafter mentioned, in the said rural district of Toxteth-park, and erected thereon a very extensive workhouse and workhouse hospital for the poor of the whole of the said extra-parochial places. Toxteth-park and such land was before and until the time of such purchase not assessable to any rate for the relief of the poor. Prior to the erection of such workhouse and workhouse hospital, there was no sewer in the said district of Smithdown-lane, but in consequence of the erection of such workhouse and hospital the resps., after the passing of the Local Government Act 1858, commenced and made a sewer, being a work of a permanent nature, under the powers given to them by the Public Health Act 1848, and the Local Government Act 1858, for the purpose of draining the said workhouse and workhouse hospital, and the dwelling-houses within the said district of Smithdown-lane, and for the benefit thereof and at the request of the apps. the resps. have given permission to the apps. to enter such sewer for the use and benefit of such workhouse and workhouse hospital, and the apps. have accordingly entered such sewer, and made drains communicating between the said sewer and the workhouse and hospital. Prior to the passing of the Local Government Act 1858 the resps. had, under the 88th section of the Public Health Act 1848, made and levied special district rates. The said workhouse and workhouse hospital, at the time when the said sewer rates were made, were in fact assessed to rates for the relief of the poor of the said extra-parochial place of Toxteth-park, but whether they were according to law assessable to such rates is a part of the question submitted to the court.

By the 8th section of the 9 & 10 Vict. c. 127, entitled "An Act for the improvement of the sewerage and drainage, and for the sanitary regulation of the borough of Liverpool," after reciting that the powers and provisions of the Act of the 5 & 6 Vict. c. 105, entitled "An Act for the better paving and improving the streets and highways within the extra-parochial place of Toxteth-park, in the county palatine of Lancaster, and for the sewerage of certain parts of the said place, so far as the same related to the construction and repair of sewers, drains and watercourses, and other sewerage purposes, and to the raising of money and the imposition of rates for the last-mentioned purposes," were confined to such parts of the said extra-parochial place as lie within the boundary of the said borough, &c. By the provisional order of the General Board of Health, dated July 30, 1855, the Public Health Act was applied to the parts included within the boundaries of Toxteth-park, as defined in the 5 & 6 Vict., and the commissioners for the time being acting in the execution of the said local Act were appointed the local board of health. After the erection of the workhouse and hospital, and such communication had been made by the apps. into the said sewer, that is, on March 6, 1860, a general district rate was made and published by the resps. for the district of Smithdown-lane aforesaid, for the purpose of paying the first instalment of principal borrowed from the Royal Insurance Company, at the rate of ninepence in the pound, and in that rate the apps. were assessed for the said workhouse to the amount of 37*l.* 10*s.* upon the net annual value of 1000*l.* On June 5, 1860, a general district rate was made by the local board of health, for defraying such expenses as are by the Public Health Act 1848, and the Local Government Act 1858, charged upon that rate, at the rate of 1*s.* 10*d.* in the pound, in which rate the apps. were assessed for their workhouse to the amount of 91*l.* 13*s.* 4*d.* upon the net annual value of 1000*l.* and for their workhouse hospital to the amount of 18*l.* 6*s.* 8*d.* upon the net annual value of 200*l.*

The apps. contended that they were not liable to be rated to the said several rates, on the ground that the resps. are only authorised to levy such rates upon such kinds of property as are assessable to poor-rates, and that such workhouse and hospital being situate within Toxteth-park, and not being united with other parishes for the relief of the poor, is not a kind of property assessable to the poor-rate, and the resps. were precluded from levying the several rates in question upon the said workhouse and hospital. The resps. contended that the said workhouse and hospital were and are a workhouse and hospital for the whole district of Toxteth-park, both within and beyond the boundaries of the said borough of Liverpool, and were and are by the laws in force for the time being assessable to rates for the relief of the poor; and the resps. further contended, that even if the court should be of opinion that the said workhouse and hospital are not assessable to rates for the relief of the poor, the workhouse and hospital are assessable to the said rates, or one of them, as the rural district of Toxteth-park joins only a portion of Toxteth-park aforesaid, for the benefit of the whole of which the said workhouse and hospital were and are erected. The question for the opinion of the court was, whether such workhouse is properly assessable to the said several rates or either of them.

By sect. 55 of the 21 & 22 Vict. c. 93 (Local Government Act), after repealing the 88th section of the Public Health Act 1848 (11 & 12 Vict. c. 63), it is enacted, "that the general district rates shall be made and levied upon the occupiers of all such kinds of property as by the laws in force for the time being are or may be assessable to any rate for the relief of the poor," &c.

Welsby (Baylis with him) now appeared for the resps., and contended that the workhouse was assessable, for that it came within the description of property rateable under the statute of 43 Eliz., and that a workhouse has been held to be exempt from being rated only when built in the parish to which it belongs, upon the ground that it would be useless to rate it, when the sum assessed must afterwards be paid out of the rate; an exemption which does not exist when it is built in another parish, or built in one parish for a union of parishes: (Reg. v. The Wallingford Union, 10 Ad. & Ell. 259; Reg. v. Justices of Hull, 4 Ell. & Bl. 29; Governors of the Bristol Poor v. Wait, 5 Ad. & Ell. 1.)

Overend, Q.C. (Aspinall with him) for the apps., argued that the workhouse was exempt from being rated, the 55th section of the 21 & 22 Vict. c. 98, making it rateable to this rate only where it would be rateable to the poor-rate, and that the workhouse would not be liable to be assessed to the poor-rate; he argued also that the workhouse would not be assessable on account of being devoted to public purposes.

COCKBURN, C. J.—Two different views may be taken of the 55th section—the one, that it refers to the kind of property, the other that it refers to the occupation. It is clear, however, that whatever was rateable under the poor-rate is rateable under this Act. The authorities have an immediate bearing upon the case, and show that, as regards the poor-rate, when the workhouse for two parishes is locally situated in one of them, it is liable to be rated in the one where it is situated. I think the case is not only within the words of the 55th section, but is rateable upon the soundest principles. I think the workhouse was therefore rateable.

CROMPTON, J.—I am of the same opinion. I think that the words "all such kinds of property," point out what is the description of property that may be assessed. Now I think this is the kind of property that may be assessed to the poor-rate, and is therefore liable to be rated to the rate in question.

HILL, J.—I think that the words "all such kinds of property as by the laws in force for the time being are or may be assessable to any rate for the relief of the poor," apply to the kind of property, and not to the nature of the occupation.

BLACKBURN, J. concurred.

GEORGE CURETON v. THE QUEEN.

Indictment—Game-laws—Sufficiency of allegation of previous convictions—9 Geo. 4, c. 69, s. 1.(a)

(a) The stat. 9 Geo. 4, c. 69, s. 1, enacts that "If any person shall, after the passing of this Act, by night unlawfully take or destroy any game or rabbits in any land, whether open or inclosed, or shall by night unlawfully enter or be in any land, whether open or inclosed, with any gun, net, engine, or other instrument, for the purpose of taking or destroying game, such offender shall upon conviction thereof before two justices of the peace be committed for the first offence to the common gaol or house of correction for any period not exceeding three calendar months, there to be kept to hard labour, and at the expiration of such period shall find sureties by recognisance, himself in 10*l*. and two sureties in 5*l*. each, or one surety in 10*l*., for his not so offending again for the space of one year next following, and in case of not finding such sureties shall be further imprisoned and kept to hard labour for the space of six calendar months, unless such sureties are sooner found; and in case such person shall so offend a second time, and shall be thereof convicted before two justices of the peace, he shall be committed to the common gaol or house of correction for any period not exceeding six calendar months, there to be kept to hard labour, and at the expiration of such period shall find sureties by recognisance, himself in 20*l*. and two sureties in 10*l*. each, or one surety in 20*l*., for his not so offending again for the space of two years next following, and in case of not finding such sureties shall be further imprisoned and kept to hard labour for the space of one year, unless such sureties are sooner found; and in case such person shall so offend a third time, he shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and being convicted thereof shall be liable at the discretion of the court to be transported beyond seas for seven years, or to be imprisoned and kept to hard labour in the common gaol or house of correction for any term not exceeding two years."

An indictment alleged that A., on, &c., at, &c., was duly convicted before two justices, for that he within six months, on, &c., by night, after the expiration of the first hour after sunset, and before the beginning of the first hour before sunrise—that is to say, about the hour of five o'clock of the night, &c., did by night then and there unlawfully enter a certain close of land, situate, &c., with a gun, for the purpose of then and there taking and destroying game, contrary, &c., and that he was thereupon then and there adjudged, the same being a first offence, to be imprisoned, &c., for three calendar months, &c. That the said A. afterwards, on, &c., at, &c., was convicted before two justices, for that he within, &c., on, &c., in the night of the same day, &c., by night, unlawfully did enter on certain inclosed land, &c., with certain instruments for the purpose of killing, taking and destroying game thereon; this being his second offence, said A. was then and there adjudged to be imprisoned, &c. for six calendar months, &c. That the said A. afterwards, and after he had been twice convicted as aforesaid, within, &c., on, &c., by night, to wit, about the hour of two o'clock in the night, did unlawfully enter certain inclosed land, &c., for the purpose by night of therein taking and destroying game, &c.:

Held, that the first and second convictions were sufficiently shown to justify a conviction and prolonged sentence of imprisonment as for a third offence, under 9 Geo. 4, c. 69, s. 1, and that the other averments in the indictment were sufficient to sustain the conviction.

George Cureton was indicted at the Stafford January quarter sessions 1861, under 9 Geo. 4, c. 69, s. 1, for a misdemeanor in going armed by night for the purpose of taking game, after two previous convictions for the same offence, when he was convicted and sentenced to nine calendar months' hard labour.

The indictment stated that George Cureton, on the 26th Dec. 1854, at Wolverhampton, in the county of Stafford, was duly convicted before three of her Majesty's justices of the peace for the said county of Stafford, for that he the said George Cureton, within the space of six calendar months then last past, to wit, in the night of the 18th Dec., in the year aforesaid, by night, after the expiration of the first hour after sunset, and before the beginning of the first hour before sunrise, that is to say, about the hour of five o'clock of the night of the day and year last aforesaid, did by night then and there unlawfully enter a certain close of land situate in the parish of Tettenhall, in the said county of Stafford, in the occupation of Lord Wrottesley, with a gun, for the purpose of then and there taking and destroying game, contrary to an Act passed in the ninth year of the reign of his Majesty King George the Fourth, entitled "An Act for the more effectual prevention of persons going armed by night, for the destruction of game." And the said George Cureton was thereupon then and there adjudged for his said offence—the same being his first offence—to be imprisoned in the House of Correction at Stafford, in and for the said county of Stafford, and there kept to hard labour for the period of three calendar months, and at the expiration of such period to find sureties by recognisance, himself in the sum of 10*l*., and two sureties in the sum of 5*l*. each, or one surety in the sum of 10*l*., conditioned that he the said George Cureton should not so offend again for the space of one year then next following, and in case he should not find such surety or sureties as aforesaid, that he should be further imprisoned and kept to hard labour for the space of six calendar months, unless such sureties should be sooner found.

That the said George Cureton afterwards, on the 27th Nov. 1858, at the parish of Shifnal, in the county of Salop, was duly convicted before two of, her Majesty's justices of the peace in and for the said county of Salop, for that he the said George Cureton, within six calendar months next before the making of the information on which the said conviction on the 27th Nov. 1858 was founded, to wit, on the 24th Nov. in the year aforesaid, in the night of the same day, at the parish of Shiffnal, in the said county of Salop, by night unlawfully did enter and be in and upon certain inclosed land in the said parish of Shiffnal, in the occupation of William Henry Slaney, Esq., with certain instruments for the purpose of killing, taking and destroying game thereon, this being his second offence contrary to the form of the statute in such case made and provided, and the said George Cureton was thereupon then and there adjudged for his said offence to be imprisoned in the house of correction at Shrewsbury, in the said county of Salop, and there kept to hard labour for the period of six calendar months; and at the expiration of such period to find sureties by recognisance, himself in the sum of 20*l*. and two sureties in the sum of 10*l*. each, or one surety in the sum of 20*l*., conditioned that he the said George Cureton should not so offend again for the space of two years then next following; and it was further adjudged that the said George Cureton, in case he should not find such sureties as aforesaid, should be further imprisoned and kept to hard labour for the space of one year, unless such sureties should be sooner found.

That the said George Cureton afterwards, and after he had been so twice convicted as aforesaid, and within twelve calendar months now last past, to wit, on the 25th Nov. 1860, by night, to wit, about the hour of two o'clock in the night of the same day, did unlawfully enter and be in and upon certain inclosed land in the parish of Codsall, in the county of Stafford, in the occupation of William Fleming Fryer, for the purpose, by night as aforesaid, of therein taking and destroying game, and was then and there, by night, unlawfully in the said land with a certain gun and other instruments for the purpose, by night as aforesaid, of therein taking and destroying game, against the form of the statute, &c.

To this indictment the said George Cureton assigned errors. First, that the second conviction in the said indictment mentioned is bad and insufficient in law, and shows no jurisdiction in the justices to convict and adjudicate upon the said George Cureton, as therein mentioned; secondly, that the first conviction in the said indictment mentioned is bad and insufficient in law, for that it does not show with sufficient legal certainty that any offence had been committed, and that it does not appear by the said record and indictment that the said George Cureton had been twice duly convicted before two justices of the peace of so offending; thirdly, that the matters in the said indictment are not sufficient in law to warrant the judgment against the said George Cureton, now given, or to convict him of the misdemeanor aforesaid, &c.

Henry Matthews for the prisoner.—The second count in the indictment is bad. There must be shown two good and valid convictions for a first and second offence, and this record does not show any valid conviction for a second offence. On the second conviction no jurisdiction is shown to impose an imprisonment of six months, inasmuch as no valid first conviction is shown. [CROMPTON, J.—To have found him guilty a second time, they must have had evidence of a first conviction.] If the conviction were before the court on certiorari the court would quash it as bad in form; it would have satisfied the terms of that conviction that the former offence was an assault. [HILL, J.—The conviction is set out according to its legal effect. Why should we assume it to be bad?] Because the court will not assume anything against the prisoner. [COCKBURN, C.J.—If the second conviction were bad, but there was a good offence shown and jurisdiction, and it has not been brought up to be quashed, would not that make it good? CROMPTON, J.—And might it not be amended under the 12 & 13 Vict. c. 45, s. 7?] The indictment must show a second valid conviction. [COCKBURN, C.J.—There are two convictions, neither appealed against. Are we to say that they have been unduly made? The prisoner not having chosen to appeal, is it incumbent upon us to say that either is invalid?] In trespass against magistrates the court used to hold that a conviction, if bad, though unreversed would not protect the magistrate. The second conviction is bad for other reasons. It does not appear that it was for an offence under the Act; it says merely that he was on land with certain instruments. [BLACKBURN, J.—Surely, if the instrument had been named it would have been good. Any possible instrument for destroying game would do. CROMPTON, J.—And if you lay one instrument you might prove another.] It is matter of law what instrument is within the statute. [BLACKBURN, J.—I should say it was matter of fact. COCKBURN, C.J.—Are we to scan with the greatest technical nicety each word of this conviction?] Yes. In criminal cases the rule is as strict as it used to be on special demurrer. The first conviction is bad on the authority of Davies v. The King, 10 B. & C. 89. "Then and there" is not an averment of being then by night, or in the close, and "night" is not described in the words of the statute: (Paley on Convictions, 216; Reg. v. Reynolds, 13 L. J. 65, M. C.; Reg. v. Allen, 5 Russ. & Ry. 513; Fletcher v. Calthorpe, 6 Q.B. 880, were referred to.)

Alexander Staveley Hill, contra, was not called on.

COCKBURN, C.J.—I think our judgment should be for the deft. in error. The principal objection made is to the second conviction, and it is said that it does not appear on the face of the indictment that on the first occasion the prisoner was convicted, the answer to which seems to me to be, that although the conviction is not set out in hæc verba, all is shown that is necessary. The indictment sufficiently states a jurisdiction in the magistrates to punish for a second offence, and the requirements of the Act of Parliament sufficiently appear to have been satisfied. The other points have been disposed of in the course of the arguments. The statement that the prisoner did by night then and there enter is, I think, amply sufficient. There will, therefore, be judgment for the deft. in error.

DAWES v. HAWKINS.

Trespass—Highway—Deviation from line of way—User—Evidence of dedication—Substituted way.

On an issue raised in an action of trespass, quare clausum fregit, whether there was a highway over the plt.'s land, there was evidence that there had been a highway over adjoining land, which was then together with the locus in quo, an open common. Furthermore, there was evidence that for many years the highway was obstructed by an inclosure illegally made on such common, and that during twenty years of that period the public had deviated necessarily from the old line of way, by going outside the said inclosure, and over the locus in quo. The track thus made was afterwards stopped up by the occupier of the land building a wall across it; and subsequently the old road was reopened, which during twenty-five years had never been used:

Held, per Erle, C.J. and Byles, J. (dissentient, Williams, J.), that there was no evidence of a dedication of the road over the locus in quo to the public, it having been proved that the deviating track was never used by the public, except when they were shut out from the true ancient highway.

This was an action of trespass for breaking and entering certain land of the plt. situate in the parish of Whitewell, in the Isle of Wight, and near to a certain house, land and premises of the deft. called "The Hermitage," and for pulling down and destroying a wall of the plt.; and also for cutting down, damaging and destroying the trees of the plt. then growing and being in and upon the said land.

For a third plea the deft. pleaded that before and at the time when, &c. there was and of right ought to have been a certain common and public highway into, over and along the said land of the plt., in which, &c. for all the liege subjects of our lady the Queen, to go, return, pass and repass on foot and with horses and other cattle at all times of the day at their free will and pleasure, wherefore the deft., being a liege subject of our lady the Queen, and having occasion to use the said way, did at the said time when, &c. enter into and upon the said land of the plt. and along the said highway, then using the same as he lawfully might for the cause aforesaid, and because the said wall in the declaration mentioned had been wrongfully erected, and was then standing in and across the said highway, and obstructing the same, and because the said trees were planted in and upon, and were then and there preventing the convenient use of the said highway, the deft., in order to remove the said obstructions, and to be enabled to pass and repass along the said highways, did necessarily pull down the said wall and also remove the said trees from the said highway, doing no unnecessary damage, &c. Issue thereon.

At the trial before Martin, B., at Winchester, at the last spring assizes, it appeared that there had always been from the time of legal memory a highway running from the village of Whitewell to the village of Chale, in the Isle of Wight, and that the highway passed over what was formerly a common or down land belonging to a Sir Richard Worsley, and afterwards to the Baroness de Villars. About 1809 or 1813 a Mr. Michael Hoy, who was the owner of adjoining property called the Hermitage, inclosed a part of the common, including a portion of such highway; and afterwards down to the year 1832 the public passing along the highway deviated in consequence of such inclosure to the south side of it, and went over that part of the common which subsequently became the plt.'s garden, and for the alleged trespass on which the present action was brought. No objection appears to have been ever made to this encroachment by Mr. Michael Hoy. In 1832 the Hermitage became the property of Mr. Barlow Hoy, who made some plantations to the east of Michael Hoy's inclosure, which still further stopped the highway; and he formed a new road going towards the south-west and away from any part of the land which was the subject of this action. This new road was adopted as a substitution for the old road, and from that time, viz. 1832 to 1857, the old road was altogether abandoned. The plt. purchased in 1844 from the Baroness de Villars the land on which he erected the garden wall mentioned in the declaration, and which land had been the downland on the south side of and adjoining to Michael Hoy's inclosure. At the same time the trustees of Mr. Barlow Hoy purchased from the Baroness de Villars the land which had been so previously inclosed by Mr. Michael Hoy. In 1857 the deft. bought the Hermitage from the representative of the late Mr. Barlow Hoy, and at the same time the old road through this property, including the inclosure made by Mr. Michael Hoy, was opened by the public, and the defendant received an allowance out of the purchase-money for the Hermitage, as a compensation in respect of such right of way. It was disputed, however, by the deft. at the trial that the right of way for which the compensation was paid him, was the one which went through such inclosure, and it was also contended on his behalf that whether the old road ever existed or not was immaterial, as the public had used the way over the plt.'s land and across that part where the garden wall in question had been built for twenty years, so that even if the old road had existed, the public had gained a new road across this place of the plt.

The learned judge expressed as his opinion that if for convenience a public road was diverted and taken a little to the side of the old road, the public would have a right to use the new substituted road so long as the old one remained closed up, but that if the public insisted on the old road being opened, it would then become the true road, and the obligation of the parish to repair would attach to the old road, and not to the new one; and his Lordship left it to the jury to say whether they believed from the evidence before them the old road ran through the inclosure and plantation made by the Hoys, telling the jury that if such was the case the consequence would be that there was no road where the plt.'s garden wall had been built, and the deft. would be guilty of a trespass in pulling it down.

The jury found a verdict for the plt.

A rule nisi having been obtained calling on the plt. to show cause why the verdict found for him on the trial of the cause at the last assizes holden in and for the county of Hants should not be set aside and a new trial be had between the said parties on the ground that the judge presiding at the trial misdirected the jury in telling them that as a matter of law two parallel public roads running to the same point could not exist together, as a parish could not be compelled or called upon to repair both such roads; and that the judge did not leave the facts proved and necessary to enable the jury as a matter of fact to find whether the locus in quo was a highway or not,

M. Smith and Karlake showed cause.

F. Edwards, Carter and Kingdon supported the rule. Cur. adv. vult.

July 6.—ERLE, C. J. (read by Byles, J.).—On this rule the question was whether there had been a misdirection at the trial. The issue was, whether a highway over the plt.'s land had existed. Some highway was admitted, but the dispute was whether the line of that way was on the plt.'s or the deft.'s side of the roadway separating the lands of these parties. At the close of the evidence the deft.'s counsel contended that, even if the line of highway was found to be on the plt.'s land, still there was evidence from which the jury might find that there was also an additional parallel pathway running on the deft.'s land. The learned judge in substance directed the jury that there was no such evidence, and this was the misdirection complained of. The question is, whether there was any such evidence. It was shown that a highway for horses passed over land which was the property of Lady Villars and those under whom she claimed, and the land was divided into two parcels, and at the southern part of the property, where the common was open, the line of way was very near the boundary between the two parcels; and it was found by the jury to have been on the deft.'s side of that boundary down to 1809, and all the common was open, and the line of roadway must be taken to have been as found by the jury. There was no obstacle to prevent persons passing in any way they pleased over the waste. Between 1809 and 1813, Mr. Hoy, without excuse as against the public, and without lawful right as against the owner of the soil, and without notice, as appears by the evidence in the case, inclosed a part of the common with a ditch, and included in this inclosure the line of way for more than 100 yards; and after this inclosure, down to 1832, persons using the way, on arriving at the inclosure, deviated and were directed by a line of way a few yards to the south, and so passed along the southern side of the inclosure, and returned by a line of way running a few yards towards the north, at the other end, so that the deviation began at the obstruction, and therefore travellers who were thus directed passed over what was the line of inclosure, which became afterwards the line of deviation between the plt.'s and deft.'s land, and these travellers passed on the plt.'s land. There was evidence that the line of deviation continued only till 1832, when the open common was planted, and a way laid out further to the south, and altogether away from the place in question. In 1857 the obstruction was removed, and the original line of way over the deft.'s land was reopened; and it remains to be seen whether, under these circumstances, there is any evidence that the line over the plt.'s land had also become a highway, and was dedicated by the owner of the soil and used by the public for a highway. Express evidence of the dedication by the owner of the soil there was none; and there seems to be no analogy to the case where the owner of the soil of a highway shuts it up and puts down a substituted highway in lieu thereof, which may be express evidence of intention to give the public some right, absolute or otherwise, over the substituted way. Then, was there any evidence of user from which the jury might reasonably infer dedication? The parties who passed that way intended to use the original highway, and probably deviated without knowing it; if they so deviated by reason of the obstruction, and the user of the line of deviation was a user of the highway, is that sufficient to make the user of the highway, as of right, a user of the deviation on the adjoining land by reason of the highway being so diverted? I know of no decision and no principle making a distinction between land impassable by non-feasance or the neglect to repair, and land impassable by misfeasance by putting an obstruction upon it. But even if the deviation be a trespass, and would not be justifiable, still, in either case, would the user of right of the line of deviation be evidence of the exercise of a user of the line of highway? If the user of the line of deviation is not a user of the highway, then the user of the line of deviation for twenty years would not alter the nature of the act. If the first traveller passing did not use the highway, neither did the second. According to this view, the judge was right in directing the jury that there was no reasonable evidence in support of the deft.'s contention, and I have taken this to be the effect of the summing-up. In the argument, much stress was laid on the observations made by the learned judge relating to the right of the public where a highway had been stopped up by the owner of the soil, and a new way in substitution set out by him, and afterwards the original highway reopened. I do not discuss these observations nor the arguments relating to them, for I consider the case to have been rightly disposed of by telling the jury that there was no reasonable evidence before them on these facts of the way in question.

WILLIAMS, J.—I regret that I cannot quite concur with my Lord in the judgment which he has given in this case. I think there was some evidence of the dedication of a way over the plt.'s land used by the public during the time the old highway was obstructed. That user lasted for nearly twenty years, at least; and some of the witnesses described the deviation as having been for that line of road. It is incontrovertible that, if this uninterrupted enjoyment by the public had stood alone, it would have afforded some evidence from which the jury might have inferred an intention, on the part of the owner of the soil—whoever he might be—to dedicate the way to the public. But in the present case, it is said that no such intention can be inferred, because the user may be accounted for by the circumstance that the adjoining way, by which the public had a right to travel, had been wrongfully inclosed and obstructed, that the deviation was not a trespass, but had been done in the exercise of a public right of going on the adjacent ground when the common highway has become impassable. It is remarkable that, in the text-books, that right is confined to cases where a highway is foundrous and out of repair (2 Saund. 160 B, note, 12, and Rex v. Stoughton, 1 Russell on Crimes, 34; 2 Smith's L. Cas. 119, 4th edit., note to Doraston v. Payne); and on principle it may be doubtful whether the burden to which the adjacent soil is subjected when the parish has been guilty of a nonfeasance in respect of the nonrepair of a highway ought to be likewise inflicted, because some wrong-doer has put an obstruction on the highway, which may be abated as a nuisance by any one who has occasion to use the road, unless the obstruction be of such a nature that it practically cannot be abated, and so the road is in effect impassable. However, in the case of Absor v. French, 2 Show. 28; it seems to have been held a good plea in an action of trespass where the plt. himself stopped a highway, so as that the deft. could not pass, that therefore he went over the plt.'s close, doing as little damage as he could. But even supposing the right exists of only going on the adjacent soil along the highway obstructed, still, if the owner of the soil for a great many years submitted to such a burden, instead of causing the obstruction to be removed, this would afford some evidence of intention to dedicate the substituted road to the public. It does not appear to have been distinctly shown who was the owner of the soil during the public use of it, whether it was the same person who obstructed the old highway or somebody adjacent. The law is clear, if there had been of right such a public, uninterrupted user of the road for such a length of time so as to satisfy the jury that the owner of the soil, whoever he might be, intended to dedicate it to the public, this is sufficient to show the existence of the highway, though it cannot be ascertained why, during the same period, it has been so used by the public. If the soil over which the road passed in the present case had been made a road open, and the same person who made the inclosure had obstructed thereby the old highway, I think it plain that he intended dedication, because I apprehend he must surely be deemed to have been aware that the inclosure should always be over it, that the public should be deprived of the old road, and in lieu thereof have the substituted one. If the soil belonged to the owner of the land, Lady Villars, her acquiescence in the existence of the inclosure which necessarily stopped the old highway, coupled with the uninterrupted continuance of the public user of the substituted road, afforded evidence which ought to have been laid before the jury of an intention on her part to dedicate. The effect of this evidence was certainly much weakened by the circumstance that, after the substituted road had been used by the public for nearly twenty years up to 1832, the use of it was destroyed by reason of the new way having been laid out in a different direction. But if, having regard to all the circumstances of the case, the jury had thought fit to negative any intention to dedicate, I should have approved of their verdict; and though I do not at all regret that my learned brethren should have come to the conclusion that there ought to be no new trial in this case, at the same time I think it is of such importance to adhere to what I conceive to be the law as to the evidence of dedication of a highway, that I think it my duty to express my opinion for the reasons above stated, that there was some evidence of it in the present case. As it appears to the majority of the court, however, that the effect of the summing up was to direct the jury that there was no reasonable evidence of that given at the trial, and as it likewise appears to them that this direction was right, the rule must be discharged. I abstain, as my Lord has done, from expressing any opinion on the other points raised on the rule.

BYLES, J.—I think the direction of the learned judge was substantially correct. It amounts to this: that at the time in question, that is to say, after the old road had been reopened, the alleged new road did not exist; indeed, I conceive there is no evidence to be submitted to the jury that the alleged new road ever had existed. It is clear that there can be no dedication of a way to the public for a limited time, certain or uncertain; if dedicated at all, it must be dedicated in perpetuity—and it is also an established maxim, once a highway, always a highway for the public. Therefore, unless that limits it, there is no distinct presumption of prescription. The only methods of legally stopping a highway are by mandamus or ad quod damnum, and proceeding before the magistrates under the statute. The true question therefore seems to be this, Was there any evidence of the alleged dedication of the way to the public by the owner of the soil? I collect from the evidence that the material facts were these:—The road was an ancient and undoubted highway, and was illegally stopped about the year 1813. The old road being stopped, the public in consequence deviated on the adjoining land, which was open down, traversing over various parts of the down, but the principal tracks were nearly parallel with the old road; the ownership of the soil of the old and the new road was in the same person. About 1832 the principal track, called at the trial the “new road,” was stopped up by the occupier of the land building a wall across the track; but in the year 1857 the old road was reopened, which for those twenty-five years had never been used. The contention of the deft. at the trial and since was, that the principal track of deviation was no deviation at all, but was the true ancient road. Upon that contention the jury decided against him; but the learned counsel for the deft., in his summing-up to the jury, for the first time raised the point that the deviated road, even if not the ancient road, had been dedicated to the public, and had been a public highway, even as the old one. The facts, as above stated, do not appear to me to amount to any reasonable evidence of a dedication to the public. It was proved that the public had never used the deviating track except when they were shut out from the true ancient highway; the public user was therefore lawful, and of right, when the public so deviated on the adjoining land: (see Absor v. French, 2 Shower.) And it further appears that the deviation was not confined to a single defined track, but the right was occasionally exercised all over the down. It is difficult to suppose that the owner of the soil could have assented to such a dedication. Lastly, the deviating track has been shut up and disused for twenty years. These facts seem to me very consistent with the public right of user of the deviation during the temporary obstruction of the old road, and inconsistent with a dedication to the public of the new way. The new road and the old road were parallel, the old road still continuing to exist in point of law. But assuming the facts to be as consistent with the deft.'s hypothesis as with the plt.'s hypothesis, there is still no balance of probability in favour of the deft.'s hypothesis; and if that be so, the burden of proof lying on the deft., there is no evidence to be left to the jury. Lastly, assuming some evidence of the new road to exist, it is at most such a scintilla of evidence that if the jury had found a verdict for the deft. upon it, that verdict would have been set aside: (see the observations of the Ex. Ch. in Avery v. Bowden, 6 Ell. & B. 972.) For these reasons I am of opinion that the rule for a new trial should be discharged. The rule in this case will be discharged.

Rule discharged.

WALLINGTON (app.) v. WHITE (resp.)

Highway—Liability to repair—Dedication to public—Public Health Act 1848.

In the year 1830 a street in a town (connecting two streets which were common and public highways) was made by the owner of the land, and opened throughout to the public, and the same has ever since remained open. At the time when he opened it, he intended the said street or road to be used as and to be a common and public highway, and the same has been ever since adopted and used uninterruptedly as such. In the year 1825 a local Act was passed, for paving, lighting and cleansing the said town; and by it commissioners were appointed for carrying its purpose into execution. By sect. 7, when any new streets, &c., are made in the town, and well and effectually flagged and paved to their satisfaction, the commissioners, on application of the owner or owners of the soil, are required by writing under their hands to declare the same to be public highways; and from and after such declaration the same shall be deemed and taken to be highways, and be repaired by the said commissioners.

In the year 1852 the provisions of the Public Health Act 1848, with the exception of sect. 50, was applied to and put in force in the said town. By sect. 69 of the said Act, the local board of health, in case any street, &c. be not paved and sewered to their satisfaction, may by notice in writing call upon the owners or occupiers of premises fronting them, to pave, &c. the same, and if such notice be not complied with, the said local board of health may execute the work of paving, &c., and recover the expenses thereof from the last-mentioned owner in a summary manner.

The local board gave notice to the resps., who were owners of the premises in the above-mentioned street, requiring them within a month to pave, flag, channel and make good so much of the said street as their premises respectively abutted upon. Such notice was not complied with, and the local board thereupon executed the work, and demanded from the resps. payment of the expenses so incurred, which being refused, they took proceedings in a summary manner for the recovery thereof.

Upon the facts proved at the hearing of the information, it appeared that if the said street was not on the 1st Sept. 1858 a highway within the meaning of the 69th section of the Public Health Act, the resps. were liable to the payment of the sum demanded of them; but if it was a highway within the meaning of that section, they were not liable to such payment. The commissioners under the local Act never exercised their option of declaring the said street a highway, so as to render it repairable by them, and neither they nor the local board of health, nor the resps., had ever repaired the said street:

Held, that the order made by the local board of health requiring the owner to repair was a lawful order, the said street not being a highway repairable by the inhabitants at large.

This is a case stated by us the undersigned justices of the peace under the stat. 20 & 21 Vict. c. 43, for obtaining the opinion of the court on a question of law which arose in the exercise of our summary jurisdiction under the Public Health Act 1848. The following are the circumstances of the case:—

In the year 1852 the parish of Leamington was, by a provisional order of the General Board of Health, confirmed and made absolute by the Public Health Supplemental Act 1852 (No. 2), created a district for the Public Health Act 1848, and the said Public Health Act, with the exception of sect. 50, was applied to and put in force within the said district.

By sect. 69 of the Public Health Act 1848, it is WALLINGTON v. WHITE.

[C. B.]

enacted, "In case any present or future street, or any part thereof (not being a highway), be not sewered, levelled, paved, flagged and channelled to the satisfaction of the local board of health, such board may, by notice in writing to the respective owners or occupiers of the premises fronting, joining, or abutting upon such parts thereof as may require to be sewered, levelled, paved, flagged, or channelled, require them to sewer, level, pave, flag, or channel the same within a time to be specified in such notice; and if such notice be not complied with, the said local board may, if they shall think fit, execute the works mentioned or referred to therein, and the expenses incurred by them in so doing, shall be paid by the owners, in default according to the frontage of their respective premises, and in such proportion as shall be settled by the surveyor, or in case of dispute as shall be settled by arbitration (having regard to all the circumstances of the case) in the manner provided by this Act; and such expenses may be recovered from the last-mentioned owners in a summary manner, or the same may be declared by order of the said local board to be private improvement expenses and be recoverable as such in the manner hereinafter provided."

The Local Government Act 1858 took effect in the said district of Leamington from the 1st Sept. 1858. By sect. 38 of this Act it is enacted that, "the powers given to local boards of health by the 69th and 70th sections of the Public Health Act 1848, to compel the sewerage, levelling, paving, flagging and channelling of streets that are not highways repairable at the public expense, shall extend to providing the means of lighting, metalling, or making good such streets, and may be exercised in respect of the carriage-way, footway, or any part of such streets, and the said powers shall also be deemed to have extended, and shall extend and be exercised in respect of any street or road of which a part was at the time of the application of the Public Health Act 1848, or is or may be a public footpath, or repairable at the public expense, as fully as if the whole of such street or road had been or was a highway not repairable at the public expense."

After the 1st Sept. 1858 a certain street or road within the district of Leamington, called Springfield-street, was not sewered, levelled, paved, flagged, channelled, metalled and made good to the satisfaction of the local board of health for the said district; thereupon the local board, by notice in writing to all the owners within the meaning of the said Act of the premises fronting, adjoining, or abutting upon the whole of the said street or road, required them respectively, within one calendar month from the service thereof, to sewer, level, pave, flag, channel, metal and make good so much of the said street or road as their said premises respectively parted or adjoined to, or abutted upon. Such notice was not complied with by any of the said owners, and the local board thereupon executed the works mentioned or referred to in the said notice, and incurred certain expenses in so doing. The resps. were and are owners of certain premises abutting upon the said street or road, and the proportion of the expenses, calculated according to the frontage of their said premises, and settled by the surveyor under the said Public Health Act, as due from them, was and is 49*l.* 10*s.* 1*d.* Payment of this amount was demanded from the resps. and refused by them, and thereupon the local board (the said expenses not having been declared to be private improvement expenses) took proceedings under the said Public Health Act for the recovery in a summary manner of the said amount, with interest at the rate of 5 per cent. per annum, amounting in all to the sum of 49*l.* 14*s.* 4*d.*

Accordingly, upon the 4th July 1860, an information was laid before John Johnson Bradshaw, one of her Majesty's justices of the peace in and for the county of Warwick, by the app. Richard Archer Wallington, who was and is clerk to the said local board, and who hid such information as such clerk, and on the behalf of the said local board, and a copy of such information, marked A accompanies and forms part of this case.

The said information afterwards came on to be heard upon the 18th July 1860, and by adjournment on several other days, and finally upon the 22nd Nov. 1860, before us the undersigned justices of the peace in and for the said county assembled and acting together. The resps. having been duly summoned, attended by their attorney on each of the said occasions.

Upon the facts and circumstances proved, it appeared that if the said street or road called Springfield-street was not on the 1st Sept. 1858 a highway within the meaning of the 69th section of the Public Health Act, the resps. were liable to the payment of the said sum of 49*l.* 14*s.* 4*d.*, and the app. as such clerk was instructed to recover the same; but if the said street or road was a highway within the meaning of the said section, the resps. were not liable to the payment of the said sum, or any sum whatever in respect of the expenses incurred by the local board as aforesaid. The facts and circumstances as to whether the said street or road was or was not a highway at the time aforesaid were and are as follow:—

In and long before the year 1820 there were two streets or roads within what is now the district of Leamington, called respectively Tachbrook-road and Brunswick-street, which run nearly parallel to each other, and both of which were common and public highways. The houses belonging to the resps. in Springfield-street were erected in the year 1820. In or soon after the year 1830 a person of the name of John Smith laid out upon his own land a new street or road running across from Tachbrook-street to Brunswick-street, and connecting those two streets or roads, and about the same time he and others built several houses along the line of the street or road so laid out by him. In the same year the said John Smith opened through-out to the public the new said street or road so laid out by him, which is that now known as Springfield-street, and referred to above, made a sewer thereunder, and the same has ever since remained open. At the time when he opened it, the said John Smith intended the said new street or road to be used as and to be a common and public highway; and the same has, in fact, ever since been adopted and used by the public as a common and public highway, and been used uninterruptedly by any persons who have desired to make use of the same. In the year 1825 an Act of Parliament (6 Geo. 4, c. 133, local and personal) was passed, the title of which is, "An Act for paving or flagging, lighting, cleansing, watching, regulating, and improving the town of Leamington Priors, in the county of Warwick, a copy of which Act, marked B, accompanies and forms part of this case. By sect. 1 of this Act certain persons were appointed to be commissioners for paving, lighting, watching, regulating and improving the town of Leamington, and for putting that Act into execution.

By sect. 26, it was enacted that "it should be lawful for the said commissioners, and they were thereby authorised and required, from time to time and at all times thereafter, as often as they should think fit, to cause, order and direct all or any of the present and future streets, lanes, highways, passages and other public places, as well carriage-ways as footways, in the said town, to be repaired, made, formed, amended and sustained in such manner and with such materials as the said commissioners should think proper."

By sect. 47 it was enacted that "when any new streets, squares, crescents, ways, lanes, or passages shall be laid out and made in the said town of Leamington Priors, and the footways and carriage-roads thereof shall be well and effectually flagged, paved, stoned, gravelled and put in good order and repair, to the satisfaction of the said commissioners, then, on application of the owner or owners of the soil, or a majority of them, it shall be lawful for the said commissioners, and they are hereby empowered and required, from time to time, by writing under their hands, to declare the same to be public highways and passages; and from and after such declaration made, such new streets, squares, crescents, lanes, ways and passages as aforesaid, and every of them, shall be deemed and taken to be public highways and passages, to all intents and purposes, and be repaired by the said commissioners, as the other parts of the streets, squares, crescents, lanes, ways and public passages within the said town, are by this Act directed to be managed and governed."

The said Act continued in force (except so far as it was repealed or altered in certain particulars immaterial to the present purpose by a subsequent local and personal Act of the year 1843) until the year 1852, when by the said provisional order of the General Board of Health, as confirmed by the said first-mentioned Act, the following sections of the said local and personal Act of the year 1825 were repealed (except in so far as the same related to any rate, assessment, composition, mortgage, assignment, annuity, or contract, made, executed, or granted by any act, matter, or thing done, or any offence committed, or penalty incurred, before the passing of the said Act confirming the said order); that is to say, sects. 1 to 27, 29 to 47, 68 to 81, all inclusive; 94, 99, 104, both inclusive; 108, 112, 121, 122, 137, 139, 155, 158, 164, all inclusive.

The said street or road, called Springfield-street, was within the town of Leamington Priors, but the commissioners under the said local Act did not at any time declare the same to be a public highway or passage, nor was any application ever made to them so to do, pursuant to the provisions of the said 47th section of the said local Act, nor was there any evidence of the commissioners having at any time adopted the said street or road as a public highway.

The houses in Springfield-street were from time to time rated or assessed by the commissioners under sect. 128 of the said local Act prior to 1835, and in the rate-book of that year they are described as being in Springfield-street, and such rate or assessment was always at the rate of 1s. in the pound of the yearly rent or value thereof, and not upon either of the higher proportions mentioned in that section.

The local board caused the street to be lighted with gas in the year 1854.

No notice was given at any time after the passing of the stat. 5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 50, of any intention to dedicate the said street or road to the public, nor was any certificate granted by two justices or enrolled at the quarter sessions as directed by that Act, and the said local board of health did not at any time before the execution of the said works as before mentioned declare the said street or road to be a highway under sect. 70 of the Public Health Act 1848.

Up to the time of the execution of the said works by the local board as before mentioned, neither the commissioners, nor the local board of health, nor the resp. had ever repaired the said street or road or any part thereof, or executed any works of sewerage, levelling, paving, flagging, channelling, metalling, or making good to or upon the same, or any part thereof, nor had the expenses of any such repairs or works, or any part thereof, been borne or paid out of any parochial district or any rates or assessments, or by the inhabitants of the said parish or district at large: any repairs that were executed were done at the expense of the said John Smith. Upon these facts and circumstances it was contended by the present app. that the said street or road had never become a public highway under the provisions either of the said local Act, or of the Act 5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 50, or of the Public Health Act 1848, and that the same was not on the 1st Sept.

1858 a highway within the meaning of the said Public Health Act 1848. On the part of the resp. it was contended that the said street or road became a highway at some time between the year 1830 and the coming into operation of the stat. 5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 50, by dedication to and adoption and user by the public, and is a highway within the meaning of the 69th section of the Public Health Act.

In order that the question might be conveniently raised by a case to be stated under the statute 20 & 21 Vict. c. 43, we the said justices dismissed the said information, upon the ground that the said street or road was a highway on the 1st Sept. 1858, as contended by the resp.

The question for the opinion of the court is, whether our decision in dismissing the said information, on the ground aforesaid, was or was not right in point of law. If our decision was right, our order dismissing the said summons is to stand good; if not, the court are to remit the said matter to us in order that we may proceed further therein.

Quain, for the resp., cited Rex v. Inhabitants of St. George, Hanover-square, 3 Camp. 222; 3 Burn's Justice, 515, tit. "Highway;" Bussey v. Storey, 4 B. & Ad. 93; Roberts v. Hunt, 15 Q.B. [ERLE, C. J. referred to Reg. v. Inhabitants of Leake, 5 B. & Ad. 469.]

ERLE, C.J.—I am of opinion that the judgment of the justices in this instance was wrong, and that the order of the board of health in this instance was a lawful order, and that order was made under sect. 69 of the Public Health Act, and dealt with Springfield-street as a street in Leamington not being a highway repairable by the inhabitants at large. The justices held it to be a highway repairable by the inhabitants at large. I am of opinion that in that the justices were wrong, and that it was not a highway repairable by the inhabitants at large. The facts appear to be these: that Springfield-street was dedicated by the owners of the soil to the public in 1830. It is within the town of Leamington, and within the town of Leamington the commissioners have considerable powers for raising money for repairing roads within the town, and, if it stood merely at common law, the dedication to the public in 1830 made it a highway. Although the commissioners would have had certain powers to repair it as a highway, and might have repaired it as they pleased, yet there would have been auxiliary powers in the parish to repair it; being dedicated to the public, it would have been a highway which the inhabitants at large would have been bound to repair under the operation of the 6 Geo. 4. The Act for the paving and lighting of Leamington has reference to a highway repairable by the inhabitants at large. The Act was passed in 1825, and the dedication was in 1830, and therefore, this being within the town of Leamington, it could not become a highway after 1825, unless the commissioners chose to adopt it: it would be without the jurisdiction of the board of health. Now the commissioners, by sect. 26, are authorised and required to repair "all present and future highways" within the parish. Sect. 49 appears to me to give to the commissioners a power of dedicating; when any new street is dedicated to the public, the commissioners have the power of deciding, under sect. 49, whether it shall become one of the public highways, repairable by them within the operation of this statute. And it is perfectly clear that the commissioners never did exercise their option of dedicating it to a public highway within this statute, and therefore they have never become liable to repair it under sect. 26, which authorises and requires them to repair all future and present highways. It was not a highway then, and if dedicated afterwards to the public by the owner, that dedication could not make it a highway unless, by sect. 49, the commissioners choose to adopt it as a highway. They never did choose to adopt it, and it is therefore not repairable by them. But it is said the parish might continue liable, notwithstanding this auxiliary liability on the part of the commissioners, unless there were words in the private Act exempting the parish from the order and liability, if it chose to repair the highway dedicated to the public within these bounds. And I think there are words which do go to exempt the parish from that order and liability, and it is the exemption arising from the power to impose rates, and by sect. 28 the commissioners are authorised to rate all the rateable inhabitants within the ambit of the town liable to be rated. But sect. 27 is the clause upon which my judgment turns, because sect. 27 enacts, "that every person who shall be discharged from all highway-rates within the town of Leamington," and it seems to me that this is an exemption within the town of the parishioners from the order and liabilities. The commissioners have made rates, and it is to be presumed they have made the rates properly, and if they have made them properly, they have rated the occupiers for every rateable subject within the parish, and then every rateable subject within the parish that has been rated for that rate under the local Act by sect. 27 is exempted from all liability whatever to the ordinary public parochial highway-rates that is imposed on all the other parishes. This statute, then, does contain an exempting clause from ordinary parochial liability, and differs from the cases which Mr. Quain has adverted to, where the commissioners have power to repair, and there it was held the power or duty to repair did not exempt the parish, if there were not express words creating the exemption. I have alluded to the argument about the dangers and difficulties which the public would be under if the highway were a highway for all purposes of passage, and yet that no one was bound to repair it. I am sensible there might be danger in going over a foundrous highway, or a street that was left in an imperfect and unsound state, but I think that the Legislature have considered that by no means an insurmountable obstacle there. Under the General Highway Act of the 5 & 6 Will. 4, there is an exemption applicable to all parishes throughout the island, that unless they adopt a highway dedicated by the public, they are not bound to repair it. The general enactment to all the community was by the local Act rendered applicable to streets that were dedicated to the public, and not adopted by the commissioners in Leamington; and it appears to me that there is very good reason for it. The commissioners may adopt and make highways and streets dedicated to the public, provided they have been paved, flagged, channelled and sewered. It is a private Act relating to an increasing town, because it contemplates the constructing and making of new streets, and the result of the enactment is, that the proprietors of such new streets should be bound to go to the expense, at the inception of their streets, of making it what we should consider a good, sound, and perfect street for passage; that they should go to the expense of the paving, the flagging, the channelling and the sewerage that I have adverted to, and not leave it a mere piece of ground, and then call on the rest of the town to go through the expensive operation I have alluded to. It is contemplated that if a person completes houses on each side of his street, he should complete the road in a proper way; the commissioners therefore have power to say, and they may say, they will not adopt the street until the new street has been completed for passage. When this has been done they may adopt it, and then it would for the future be repairable out of the funds of the town. It seems to me that there was very good reason for the enactment at the time it was passed—that the statute was enacted for that purpose, and I think our construction gives force to it. I am of opinion the adjudication of the justices should be reversed.

Re FERNANDEZ.

WILLES, J.—I am of the same opinion.

BYLES, J.—I am also of the same opinion. At first, I confess, I had some difficulty, but I think that with respect to sect. 29 it is quite clear that when the Act of Parliament took away from the inhabitants of the parish their means of perfecting the new operations, the effect is the same as if they had said in express terms they should be no longer liable. Sect. 26 makes the new body assigned of the parish who are liable to future and present highways. As to the present highways, their liability seems to be absolute; but with respect to future highways, to all purposes there is a discretion. Sect. 49 seems to be the one applicable to the case of future streets. On due deliberation, I really think that will be found to be the true construction of the statute. Judgment for the app.

COURT OF EXCHEQUER.

Reported by F. BAILEY and H. LEIGH, Esqrs, Barristers-at-Law.

April 19 and 23.

Re FERNANDEZ.

Contempt of court—Refusal of witness to answer question—Commitment for, under general warrant—Habeas corpus—Authority of assize court—Old Bailey sessions court.

*The courts of assize are Superior Courts, and have power to commit for contempt by general warrants. Where, therefore, a witness on the trial, at the assizes, of an information for bribery, refused to answer a question put to him, on the alleged ground that the answer would tend to criminate him, and the judge committed him to prison for six months, and adjudged him to pay a fine of 500*l.* for contempt, by a warrant which did not state what the question was, or set forth the particulars of the offence; and a writ of habeas corpus was moved for to bring up the prisoner, in order to his being discharged on the ground that the warrant was bad for generality:*

Held, that the warrant was good, and that the writ should not be issued.

The circumstances under which the application hereinafter made to the court in this case arose are as follow:—In Nov. 1859 Mr. Jose Luis Fernandez was examined as a witness before the commissioners appointed (under the 15 & 16 Vict. c. 57) to inquire into alleged corrupt practices at an election for the borough of Wakefield, and had subsequently, in Jan. 1860, received from the said commissioners "a certificate in writing under their hand" (sect. 10 of the above Act) stating that he had made a true disclosure touching all things to which he had been examined.

On the trial before Hill, J., at the York assizes, in March last, of an information filed by the Attorney-General against Mr. J. B. Charlesworth, for bribery at the last election for Wakefield, J. L. Fernandez was produced, sworn and examined as a witness on the part of the Crown. In the course of his examination he was asked the following question by the Solicitor-General:—"Did you, in the month of April 1859, receive any money from Mr. Charlesworth?" He refused to answer this question, on the ground that his answer might tend to criminate himself.

It was proved that he had been examined before the commissioners as above stated, and that he had received the above-mentioned certificate, protecting him (under sect. 9 of the above Act) "from all penal actions, forfeitures, punishments, disabilities and incapacities, and all criminal prosecutions to which he may have been or may become liable at the suit of her Majesty, her heirs or successors, or any other person, for anything done in respect of such corrupt practice."

Ex.]

Re FERNANDEZ.

The witness, however, alleged that he was acting under the advice of counsel, who were of opinion that the certificate, though protecting him in all other respects, did not extend to freeing him from impeachment by the House of Commons. The question was put to him by the learned judge, with the like result. Hill, J. thereupon consulted his brother judge, Keating, J., and then informed the witness that they were both of opinion that he was completely protected by the certificate, and was bound to answer the question. Upon his still refusing to answer, the learned judge told him he had been guilty of a contempt of a most serious character, and thereupon sentenced him to be imprisoned for six months, and to pay a fine of 500*l.* for contempt of court, under the following warrant:—

"Yorkshire to wit.—At the assizes held at the Castle of York, in and for the said county, on Thursday, the 7th day of March, in the 24th year of the reign of our Sovereign Lady, Victoria, by the grace of God of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, Queen, Defender of the Faith, and in the year of our Lord 1861, before the Hon. Sir Hugh Hill, Knight, and the Hon. Sir Henry Singer Keating, Knight, two of her Majesty's justices assigned to take the said assizes, according to the statute, &c.

"Reg. v. John Barff Charlesworth.—On the trial of the information against the deft. for bribery alleged to have been committed by him on the election of a Burgess to serve in Parliament for the borough of Wakefield, Jose Luis Fernandez, a witness produced, sworn and examined on behalf of the Crown, having refused to answer a certain question, touching the matter in issue in the said information, put to him by her Majesty's Solicitor-General of counsel for the Crown in that behalf; and this court having adjudged that the said Jose Luis Fernandez was bound by law to answer the said question, and having required him so to do, he wilfully and in contempt of the court refused to answer the said question, and he having wilfully persisted, and still so persisting, in such his refusal, the said court doth therefore adjudge that the said Jose Luis Fernandez has been and is guilty of a contempt of court, and the said court doth order and adjudge that the said Jose Luis Fernandez be for such his contempt committed, and he is hereby committed, to the custody of the sheriff of the said county of York, and to his keeper of her Majesty's gaol of the Castle of York, in and for the said county, to be there detained and kept in safe custody for the term of six calendar months from the date and year first above mentioned; and the said court doth further order and adjudge that the said Jose Luis Fernandez also for such his contempt shall and do pay to our said Lady the Queen the sum of 500*l.*, and that he be further detained in custody aforesaid until the said sum of 500*l.* shall have been paid.

"By the Court.

BEILL, Associate."

Bovill, Q.C. (with whom were Price, Q.C. and T. Jones) now moved on affidavits for a writ of habeas corpus ad subjiciendum, directed to the governor of York Castle, to bring up the body of the said J. L. Fernandez, in order that he might be discharged from custody on the ground that the commitment was illegal. The warrant under which the committal took place is in general terms. Now although the two Houses of Parliament and the Superior Courts at Westminster have power to issue general warrants (for which Lord Shaftesbury's case, 1 Mod. 144, R. v. Flower, 8 T. R. 314; Burdett v. Abbott, 14 East, 1; and Howard v. Gossett, 10 Q. B. 359, are respectively authorities), it is submitted that what is said in those cases, and what it is admitted is true of Superior Courts, has no application to a warrant issued under the circumstances in this case. The warrant here professes to be signed by the associate, and to be made "at the assizes held at York." Now a court of assize is not a Superior Court, and has not the power of one. The judges of assize determine some matters by virtue of their commissions, others by virtue of the statute of Westminster 2nd; and by the common law (4 Inst. 159, 160), these commissions are various: there is, first, the commission of oyer and terminer and gaol delivery; another is the commission of assize, by virtue of which and the statute of Westminster 2nd issues are tried; and thirdly, a general commission of the peace. In each of these commissions there are associated with the judges other persons of less dignity; as, for instance, in the commission of oyer and terminer, Queen's counsel, serjeants, and even justices; and now by recent Act of Parliament Queen's counsel are also included in commissions of assize. Such being their constitution, these courts are not like the Superior Courts at Westminster, nor do they emanate therefrom, but are held under a royal commission; and it would be strange to say, nor can it have been intended, that any one sitting under such a commission, as Queen's counsel, serjeants, or magistrates, should have an unlimited power to fine and imprison (it may be for life) by virtue of a general warrant. [POLLOCK, C. B.—There is no difference whatever between the Lord Chief Justice of England sitting at assizes and the youngest Queen's counsel sitting under these commissions.] However that may be, it is contended that there is a vast difference between persons acting under these commissions and the Superior Courts at Westminster; and the question as to the power of such commissioners to issue general warrant is a serious and important one. The power of a court of record to fine and imprison is admitted, but that power does not affect this question. In Bacon's Abridgment, tit. "Court," D. 1, our courts are divided into three classes—supreme, superior, and inferior; and the superior are subdivided into more or less principal—the "less principal ones," he says, "are such as are held by commissions of oyer and terminer, assize, Nisi Prius, &c. by custom or charter, or by virtue of Acts of Parliament and the King's commission, as the court of sewers, justices of the peace, &c., thus placing courts of oyer and terminer, of assize, and Nisi Prius, in the same category as courts of sewers, &c. Bushell's case, Vaughan's Rep. 135, is a distinct authority to show that the court of sessions at the Old Bailey, which is a court of oyer and terminer, is an inferior tribunal, and has not the power to commit by a general warrant. The court of sessions at the Old Bailey is similar in its constitution to a court of assize, and is composed in the same manner of judges and others of subordinate authority; and if, therefore, the one court has not the power, neither has the other. That such courts have the power of punishing contempt by fine and imprisonment is not disputed; but such authority is subject to revision by a superior tribunal, and the warrant must therefore set forth the grounds and circumstances under which the committal took place, in order to enable the court above to see whether a correct conclusion has been arrived at. (Bullock v. Parsons, 1 Salk. 454, was also referred to.) The authority of Bushell's case is recognised by Lord Ellenborough in Burdett v. Abbott, 14 East, 69, 70; and more recently by Lord Denman, C.J., who plainly shows the reason for accuracy and particularity in the warrant, when he says, "What injustice might not have been committed by the ordinary courts in past times, if such a course had been recognised, as, for instance, if the recorder of London in Bushell's case had suppressed the fact that the jurymen were imprisoned for returning a verdict of acquittal:" (Sheriff of Middlesex case, 11 A. & E. 292.) In Lord Shaftesbury's case, this distinction between the powers of a superior and inferior court is referred to; that was a committal by the House of Lords for contempt, and the return to a writ of habeas was to the effect that the committal was under a general warrant, and in giving judgment, remanding the prisoner, it is expressly said: "Such a return, if made by an ordinary court of justice, would have been ill and uncertain:" (1 Mod. 157.) And in Reg. v. Patey, 2 Ld. Raym. Rep. 1106, Gould, J., in giving judgment, says: "If this had been a return of a commitment by an inferior court it had been naught, because it did not set out a sufficient cause of commitment." As to what ought to appear on the face of general warrants, he referred to judgments of Coleridge, J., in Howard v. Gossett, 10 Q. B. pp. 380-1, and Lord Denman, C.J. Ib. p. 407. Again, the court of assize exercises its power by virtue of a statute, and where special jurisdiction, independent of the ordinary power of the court, is exercised, it is necessary to show plainly the facts giving the jurisdiction: (Christie v. Unwin, A. & E. 373, per Coleridge, J., p. 379; Harrison v. Wright, per Parke, B., 13 M. & W. 818; Ex parte Leake, per Parke, B., 9 B. & C. 240; Rex v. Brown, 8 T. R. 26; Thomlinson's case, 12 Rep. 104.) Another objection is, that the warrant does not show whether the offence was committed during a civil or criminal trial, or whether or not before a jury. It says, "At the assizes held," &c., and "this court having adjudged," &c. It is impossible to say whether this took place under the commission of oyer and terminer, or of assize, or whether it was an information laid by the Attorney-General before the justices, as commissioners of the peace. It is bad too for not showing special authority and jurisdiction. Wilde, B. refers to the judgment of Ashurst, J. in R. v. Jolliffe, that although judges of assize derive authority under a particular statute, yet all that is done by them is virtually done under the authority of the court above. Again, it ought to appear on the warrant whether it emanated from a Superior Court, which the court of oyer and terminer is not. [BRAMWELL, B.—There were two judges assigned to take the assizes: records are drawn up under different captions, according to the business done—the criminal business under the commission of oyer and terminer; the civil, under the commission of assize.] Then if it is to be assumed, from the caption, that it was under the commission of assize, it is bad for not showing that the proceedings were under an information sent down by the Court of Q. B. Further, the warrant does not state what the question was, nor that it was material. In such a case nothing must be presumed. But, apart from all question as to jurisdiction and the validity of the warrant, the witness was not bound to answer the question; the 9th and 10th sections of the 15 & 16 Vict. c. 57, do not extend to impeachment by the House of Commons. The certificate, however powerful to shelter the witness from any other proceedings, cannot stop the House of Commons—it is a casus omissus. Nor could the judge protect him by his opinion. The witness alone can determine whether an answer has a tendency to criminate him, and it is his privilege so to do; and even if he were mistaken in supposing himself liable to impeachment, he is still entitled to the privilege, and it is not to be assumed that the tendency to criminate must have reference solely to bribery. Suppose he had embezzled the money; the certificate would have been no protection there, whilst the answer might be a link in the chain to convict him hereafter. In Fisher v. Ronalds, 12 G. B. 765, Maule, J. clearly states the nature of the privilege, and his view has been adopted by Pollock, C. B. in Adams v. Lloyd, 3 H. & N. 361, and was referred to in Garbett's case, 2 Carr. & Kir.

[WILDE, B.—The result would be that you would never be able to obtain an answer to the simplest question: a man might refuse to tell his name.] Lastly, the witness should have been asked if he had any cause to show why he should not be adjudged guilty of contempt, and then the matter and the bona fides of the refusal could have been inquired into. But this was not done, and no proper opportunity was given to the witness to explain his conduct. In his affidavit the witness swears to his bona fide belief that the answer would have a tendency to criminate him; that he was not acting in collusion with J. B. Charlesworth, and that he had no intention to commit a contempt of court.

POLLOCK, C.B.—We think we ought to take time to consider the argument which has been prepared with so much pains, and presented to us with such ingenuity, and here we do no wrong to the applicant, because, if we gave judgment now, it would probably be adverse to his application. Cur. adv. vult.

April 23.—POLLOCK, C.B. now delivered the judgment of the court.—I have the written judgment of the court in the matter of Fernandez, and I now proceed to deliver it. This was a case moved by Mr. Bovill, on Friday last, and the motion was for a writ of habeas corpus to bring up the body of the deft. in order to his being discharged on the ground of the commitment being illegal. The argument occupied a considerable time, and was founded on cases not very often cited in court, and some of them of an ancient date. We had little doubt at the close that the writ ought not to issue, but we thought it desirable to take a short time to look into the state of the law upon the subject, and we are now clearly of opinion that no writ ought to be granted. The only question in reality before us is, whether the court of assize at York which ordered this commitment is a superior or an inferior court. If superior, it is not required to set out the cause of commitment with the particular circumstances—it is sufficient to state the cause generally; and the case would be otherwise if it be an inferior court. To support the view of Mr. Bovill, that a court of assize is an inferior court, two authorities, and two authorities only, were cited. The first was in Bacon's Abr. tit. "Courts," D; upon referring to which it appears to be an authority directly the other way. The courts of record are there divided into supreme, superior, and inferior. Superior Courts of record are more principal or less principal; the more principal are—Parliament, Chancery, Queen's Bench, Common Pleas, and Exchequer, the justices itinerant, &c.; the less principal courts are such as are held by commission of gaol delivery, oyer and terminer, assize, Nisi Prius, &c. All these seem to stand on the same footing. A court of assize, or of Nisi Prius, is therefore a Superior Court, although a less principal one, and as such, as far as this authority goes, has authority to commit for contempt without setting forth the particulars of the contempt in respect of which the commitment is awarded. The other authority was Bushell's case, the comments on which by Lord Ellenborough, in Burdett v. Abbott, 14 East, pp. 69 and 70, show that for this purpose Bushell's case is no authority. It was cited to show that an order of the court of commissioners at the Old Bailey ought to set out the cause of commitment, and therefore that that court is to be considered as an inferior court. In p. 70 Lord Ellenborough called Mr. Holroyd's attention to the fact that in Bushell's case it was laid down generally that the cause of commitment ought to appear, and that the necessity of setting out the case with particularity is not confined to the case of an inferior court, but ought to be observed whether the court be inferior or superior. Mr. Holroyd admitted, as he could not avoid doing, that it was laid down generally. Now, so far Bushell's case was wrong, although the decision was undoubtedly quite right in law to the extent of holding that the cause of commitment must appear in the commitment of the inferior court. The argument therefore fails to show that the court of commissioners at the Old Bailey was an inferior court. But there is an authority, not cited by Mr. Bovill, which goes directly to show that that court is a Superior Court, in the opinion at least of Abbot, C. J., and also was expressly so held by Wood, B., in the case of Rez v. Clement, 4 B. & Ald. 218, and 11 Pri. 70. In that case the court at the Old Bailey had made an order forbidding any publications of a portion of certain trials until the whole were concluded. This order had been disobeyed by the deft, and the court fined him 500*l.* for his contempt in disobeying the order, not stating what was the order he had disobeyed. The presiding judge at that session was Abbot, C. J., and we have no doubt that the order, imposing the fine for the contempt of the deft. in disobeying the order, was very carefully considered and prepared. It is set out at full in the report in 11 Price, and it is an authority to show that the court, at that time, Abbot, C. J. being the commissioner, claimed to act and did act as a Superior Court, not setting out the particulars of the contempt it proposed to punish, and Wood, B. in his judgment (11 Price, 87), expressly speaks of the court as a Superior Court of Record. Assuming, therefore, that a court of assize is a Superior Court (and it certainly may be taken without any doubt that a court of assize is as much a Superior Court of Record as a court of commissioners at the Old Bailey was before it was superseded by the present court established by Act of Parliament), assuming a court of assize to be a Superior Court, the law applicable to this commitment is really not open to any doubt. It was solemnly decided in the H. of L., in Burdett v. Abbott (in error, 5 Dow. Rep. 200), as it had been in the court below, 14 East, and in The Sheriff of Middlesex case, 11 Ad. & Ell. 292, that in a warrant of commitment by a Superior Court, the adjudication of the contempt may be general, and the particular circumstances need not be set forth. This is all that is necessary for the purpose of the decision of this case now before us; but we do not regret that Mr. Bovill brought under our notice all the circumstances that took place at the trial, as it affords us an opportunity of saying that we entirely concur in the view taken by the learned judge who presided (Hill, J.), as to the whole course of proceeding on that occasion. There will be no writ of habeas corpus issued.

Writ refused.

REG. on the prosecution of MAPPIN AND OTHERS (resps.) v. YOULE (app.)

Master and workman—Absenting from service—Conviction for by justices under 6 Geo. 3, c. 25—Second leaving service under bonâ fide claim of right—Statutes 6 Geo. 3, c. 25, and 4 Geo. 4, c. 34—Repeal of former by latter Act.
Where at the time of the original departure from the master's service the workman means it to be a permanent departure, and has no intention to return to such service:

Held (per Pollock, C. B. and Martin, B.; dissentiente, Bramwell, B.), that the master puts an end to the contract of service by proceeding against the workman summarily under the Act; and that the justices have no power to convict the workman a second time for not returning to the service after the expiration of the first imprisonment.

Where a workman declines to return to the service after his first imprisonment, under a bonâ fide claim of right founded on his belief in the advice given him by his attorney that he is not bound to return in consequence of the previous conviction having put an end to the contract, but the justices nevertheless convict him for not returning:

Held (per totam curiam), that the workman in acting upon such bonâ fide claim of right is not liable to be proceeded against before the justices a second time, and that the second conviction is bad on that ground.

Held also, that a conviction under 6 Geo. 3, c. 25, s. 4, is bad on the ground that that statute is repealed or practically superseded (quoad these particular proceedings) by the 4 Geo. 4, c. 34, s. 3.

Special case under 20 & 21 Vict. c. 43, stated by two justices of the borough of Sheffield for the opinion of the court, as to the validity of a conviction by said justices under 6 Geo. 3, c. 25, s. 4, of a workman for absenting himself from his master's service before his contract had expired. The facts found by the case are as follow:—

The app., a journeyman cutler, was in the service of Messrs. Mappin, of Sheffield, under a written agreement, signed by both parties, in the following form:—

"An agreement made this 19th Dec. 1859, between Robert Youle of the first part, and Edward Mappin and Joseph Charles Mappin of the second part. The said R. Youle doth hereby hire himself and agree to work for the said parties of the second part as a journeyman springknife cutler, for the term of three years from the date hereof, during all which time the said Robert Youle shall and will diligently and wholly employ and apply himself in the service of the said parties of the second part, and shall not work for, serve, or assist any other person or persons whatsoever," and in consideration thereof the said E. and J. C. Mappin did thereby "hire and agree fully to employ the said R. Youle in the capacity and for the term aforesaid," and to pay him as in the said agreement mentioned for the work which he should do, with a proviso enabling either party to determine the hiring at the end of two years, on giving to the other of them one month's notice in writing; "and if the said R. Youle be the person giving such notice, on his paying to the said parties of the second part at the time of giving such notice the whole of any debt which he may then owe to them."

The app. was to be paid by piecework—that is to say, not by wages by the week or month, but in proportion to the value of the work done according to a certain scale of prices. Under this contract he entered and remained in Messrs. Mappin's service until the 7th July last, when he absented himself without their consent, and continuing so absent, a complaint was laid against him on the 3rd Aug. After hearing evidence upon oath on both sides, the justices convicted the said R. Youle of a misdemeanor in respect of his contract, "for that he did on the 7th July, and still did, unlawfully absent himself from his said master's service, without leave or lawful excuse, and without his said master's consent, and neglected to fulfil the conditions of the said contract, contrary to the statute in that case made and provided;" and the said justice did thereupon adjudge that the said R. Youle should be "imprisoned in the house of correction at Wakefield, and kept to hard labour for the space of twenty-one days, and that during the said term the wages of the said Robert Youle should abate."

In pursuance of the above conviction, which was made under the 4 Geo. 4, c. 34, s. 3, the app. was committed to prison for twenty-one days. He did not return to Messrs. Mappin's service at the expiration of his imprisonment, whereupon on the 12th Sept. they preferred a second complaint against him, "for that he did, on the 29th Aug. last, before the term of his contract was completed, unlawfully absent himself without leave or lawful excuse." This complaint was heard on the 13th Sept., before the two justices who state this case.

[Ex.]

REG. on the prosecution of MAPPIN AND OTHERS v. YOULE.

[Ex.]

It was proved before them that the app. entered Messrs. Mappin's service under the aforesaid agreement and was absent therefrom on the day named in the information (29th Aug.), and had not returned since that day; that he was found on the 11th Sept. working at another manufactory, when, on being asked why he had not come to his work now he was out of prison, he said he "had offered to pay Mr. Mappin the money he owed him, and he thought Mr. Mappin ought to accept it, and release him from the agreement, for he was earning more money there and did not want to return." His previous committal on the 3rd Aug., and that he had not returned to his service since his discharge from prison, were also proved. In answer to a question by the justices, he said he declined now to return to Messrs. Mappin's service in consequence of his solicitor having advised him not to do so. It was urged on his behalf before the justices that, having been once convicted for leaving the service, he could not again be convicted for not returning; that the justices had no jurisdiction, inasmuch as it was one offence which had been satisfied. The justices, however, convicted him "of having on 29th Aug. last past, at the borough aforesaid, without notice, and before the term of his contract was completed, unlawfully, without the consent of his said masters, or either of them, and without just or lawful excuse, absented himself from his said service; and of not having fulfilled his said contract, contrary to the form of the statute made and passed, &c. (6 Geo. 3, c. 25), and did adjudge the said R. Youle to be imprisoned in the house of correction at Wakefield, in the West Riding of Yorkshire, for the space of one month."

Being dissatisfied with the above decision, as erroneous in point of law, the app. applied to the justices for a case, under 20 & 21 Vict. c. 43, and was admitted to bail in the meantime.

The justices say: "We were of opinion that the deft. was proved to be guilty of the offence charged in the information and complaint, and against the provisions in that behalf contained in the statute of 6 Geo. 3; and we were also of opinion that deft. was liable under the above statute to be again convicted and imprisoned for not returning after his said imprisonment, under the same agreement, but on the contrary, advisedly, absenting himself from the service of his masters, and working for others, after his former imprisonment and before the time of his agreement with Messrs. Mappin had expired; and we accordingly adjudged him to be imprisoned in the house of correction at Wakefield for one month. If the court shall be of opinion that the said determination is not erroneous in point of law, then the said determination shall be confirmed; but if the court shall be of a contrary opinion, then the said determination shall be reversed."

The case came on for argument in Hilary Term, when the court directed the case to be sent back for amendment and more specific statement by the justices on the two following points:—

1. If any evidence was given before them to show whether the absence of the app. in respect of which the first conviction was made was a temporary absence, or an absence with intention not to return at all, and not to fulfil the contract? and if there was, to state it, and the conclusion they draw from such evidence.

2. Whether on the last occasion on which he refused to return to the service, he bonâ fide believed that he was not bound to return to the service, in consequence of the previous conviction?

The amended case states in substance, first, that there was no evidence to show whether the first absence was temporary only, or an absence with intention not to return at all, and not to fulfil the contract except that, on the 11th Sept., eighteen days after his imprisonment had expired, the app. had stated, in answer to the question why he had not returned to his work at Messrs. Mappin's, that he was willing to pay them the money he owed them for advances, which they ought to accept, and release him from his contract, as he was earning higher wages elsewhere, and more than Messrs. Mappin would allow him to earn; and secondly, that he absented himself from his work owing to a dispute with his master about the prices allowed for work, and also about the kind of work on which he had been employed; and that he was advised by his attorney that the contract was at an end, and that he was not compellable to return, and the justice thought it very probable that he bonâ fide believed the opinion of his attorney.

The following are the sections of the two statutes bearing on the question:—

The 6 Geo. 3, c. 25, "An Act for better regulating apprentices and persons working under contract."

Sect. 1. Recites, that persons employed in several manufactories of this kingdom frequently take apprentices, and such apprentices frequently absent themselves from their service, for remedy whereof it is enacted, that "if any apprentice shall absent himself from his master's service before the term of his apprenticeship shall have expired, every such apprentice shall, at any time or times thereafter, whenever he shall be found, be compelled to serve his said master for so long a time as he shall have absented himself from such service, unless he shall make satisfaction to his master for the loss he shall have sustained by his absence from his service; and so, from time to time as often as such apprentice shall, without leave of his master, absent himself from his service before the term of his contract shall be fulfilled; and in case any such apprentice shall refuse to serve as hereby required, or to make such satisfaction to his master, such master may complain, upon oath, to any justice of the peace for the county or place where he shall reside, which oath such justice is hereby empowered to administer, and to issue a warrant under his hand and seal for apprehending any such apprentice; and such justice, upon hearing the complaint, may determine what satisfaction shall be made to such master by such apprentice; and in case such apprentice shall not give security to make such satisfaction according to such determination, it shall and may be lawful for such justice to commit every such apprentice to the house of correction for any time not exceeding three months."

Sect. 4. "And whereas it frequently happens that artificers, calico printers, handicraftsmen, &c. and others, who contract with persons for certain terms, do leave their respective services before the terms of their contracts are fulfilled, to the great disappointment and loss of the persons with whom they so contract, for remedy whereof be it further enacted, that if any calico printer, handicraftsman, &c., or other person shall contract with any person whomsoever, for any time or times whatsoever, and shall absent himself from his service before the term of his contract shall be completed, or be guilty of any other misdemeanor, that then and in every such case it shall and may be lawful for any justice of the peace of the county or place where any such artificer, &c. shall be found, and such justice is hereby authorized and empowered, upon complaint thereof made upon oath to him by the person with whom such artificer, &c. shall have so contracted, or by his or her steward or agent, which oath such justice is hereby empowered to administer, to issue his warrant for the apprehending every such artificer, &c., and to examine into the nature of the complaint; and if it shall appear to such justice that any such artificer, &c. shall not have fulfilled such contract, or hath been guilty of any misdemeanor, it shall and may be lawful for such justice to commit every such person to the house of correction for the county or place where such justice shall reside, for any time not exceeding three months nor less than one month."

The 4 Geo. 4, c. 34, "An Act to enlarge the powers of justices in determining complaints between masters and servants, and between masters, apprentices, artificers and others."

Sect. 1 recites the 6 Geo. 3, c. 25, and other Acts, and that "it is expedient to extend the powers of the said Acts," &c.

Sect. 4. "And be it further enacted, that if any servant in husbandry, or any artificer, &c., shall contract with any person or persons whomsoever, to serve him, her, or them for any time or times whatsoever, or in any other manner, and shall not enter into or commence his or her service according to his or her contract (such contract to be in writing, and signed by the contracting parties), or having entered into such service shall absent himself or herself from his or her service before the term of his or her contract, whether such contract shall be in writing or not in writing, shall be compelled, or neglect to fulfil the same, or be guilty of any other misconduct or misdemeanor in the execution thereof, or otherwise respecting the same, then and in every such case it shall and may be lawful for any justice of the peace of the county or place where such servant in husbandry, artificer, &c., shall have so contracted, or be employed or be found, and such justice is hereby authorised and empowered, upon complaint thereof made upon oath to him by the person or persons, or any of them, with whom such servant in husbandry, artificer, &c., shall have so contracted, or by his, her, or their steward, manager, or agent, which oath such justice is hereby empowered to administer, to issue his warrant for the apprehending every such servant in husbandry, artificer, &c., and to examine into the nature of the complaint; and if it shall appear to such justice that any such servant in husbandry, artificer, &c., shall not have fulfilled such contract, or hath been guilty of any other misconduct or misdemeanor as aforesaid, it shall and may be lawful for such justice to commit every such person to the house of correction, there to remain and be held to hard labour for a reasonable time, not exceeding three months, and to abate a proportionable part of his or her wages for and during such period as he or she shall be so confined in the house of correction; or in lieu thereof, to punish the offender by abating the whole or any part of his or her wages; or to discharge such servant in husbandry, artificer, &c., from his or her contract, service, or employment, which discharge shall be given under the hand and seal of such justice gratis."

April 29.—Mellish, Q.C. for the deft.—The question is, whether a workman who has been convicted for absenting himself from his employment, and sentenced to imprisonment, and who declines to return to his service after his discharge, is liable to be summoned and punished again. Assuming that he was bound to return, he could not be convicted criminally for not returning, if he bona fide believed he was not bound. The case of Ryder v. Wood, 29 L. J. 1, M.C., is an express authority to that effect. No doubt in that case the man thought he had complied with the contract. Here the deft. acted on a supposed right, and under the advice of his attorney, and adopting the view expressed by Pollock, C.B., in Ex parte Baker, 2 H. & N. 219, Ex., he declined to return to the service. But, secondly, the prior conviction put an end to the contract. The leaving the service permanently was one offence, and having been once punished, he cannot be punished a second time: the justices have no further jurisdiction in the matter. An ordinary case of contract of service is put an end to by the party going away and abandoning it, and the remedy a master has is by an action for damages. So if a servant be wrongfully dismissed an action lies, and damages may be recovered, but in both these cases the service is at an end, and the remedy adopted for compensation is taken once and for all. So here the leaving the service is an offence against the Act, for which a workman is to be punished once for all. His liability to serve is gone after he has once wilfully absented himself and been punished; the service is at an end, and he cannot be again punished under the Act, any more than a second action could be brought in either of the last-mentioned cases. [MARTIN, B.—Suppose a contract of service for five years, and at the end of three months the man chooses to leave and refuses to return; can the master by the assistance of the justices keep him in prison for four years and three-quarters?] Again, the former conviction was under 4 Geo. 4, c. 34, s. 3; the present one is under the 4th section of 6 Geo. 3, c. 25; there is nothing about "and so from time to time" in this section; those words occur in the 1st section of this very Act, with respect to "apprentices," which makes the remarks of the Lord Chief Baron, in Ex parte Baker, on the omission of those words altogether from the 4 Geo. 4, c. 34 (which was the Act under consideration in that case) stronger in favour of the deft. Thirdly, the 6 Geo. 3, c. 25, is impliedly repealed by the 4 Geo. 4, c. 34; the latter Act extends the powers of the justices in favour both of master and servant; the previous statute gave a minimum punishment of a month; by the latter Act the justices may either imprison for a reasonable time not exceeding three months, with abatement of wages; or abate the whole or any part of the wages, or discharge the servant from the employment. The two statutes are inconsistent with each other. Cases must often occur between master and workman in which the minimum punishment of one month would be very unjust; the Legislature intended to remedy that evil, but if it be held that the statute of Geo. 3 remains in force and unmodified by the subsequent statute, then, if the master choose to proceed under the former statute, he may still imprison a servant for a month, in a case where under the subsequent statute a small abatement of wages, or may be, in a case where both were in fault, a discharging of the contract, would be the fitting and adequate adjudication. [WILDE, B.—How is it brought before the magistrate? Has the magistrate no power to decide under 4 Geo. 4, even though the information is laid under 6 Geo. 3?] The argument on the other side is that it is cumulative. The case states that the deft. having been charged with an offence "contrary to the statute 6 Geo. 3," the justices sentenced him in terms under that Act; and the reason, it is apprehended, why they rely on that statute is, that as the justices must, under 4 Geo. 4, adjudicate on wages, they could not do so where a man is paid by piecework, as there the wages would deduct themselves, since he could not do any work whilst in prison. No doubt the last-named Act says the justices are so to adjudge, but it does not follow because the nature of the contract is to do without their adjudication what the Legislature intended should be done, that therefore the conviction must be under the 6 Geo. 3. The justices have fairly stated the case, but they were wrong.

Quain, contra, in support of the conviction.—There are so many Acts in pari materia regulating the dealings between masters and workmen, that it would be difficult to exaggerate the importance of this question, especially if the court should accede to the view of this case propounded on the other side. He contended that the first conviction did not put an end to the contract for the purpose of a second conviction. In Ex parte Baker, 7 El. & Bl. 697, there is the unanimous judgment of Lord Campbell, C.J. and Erle and Coleridge, J.J. to that effect. That case first came before the Q.B. It was under the 4 Geo. 4, but for the purpose of this argument it is no matter on which

REG. on the prosecution of MAPPIN AND OTHERS v. YOULE.

[Ex.]

statute the question arose. [POLLOCK, C.B.—Was the attention of the Q.B. drawn to the difference between the two statutes?] No. Your Lordship first stated that distinction when Ex parte Baker came before this court. The main point there was, could there be a second conviction upon an absenting himself after the first imprisonment had expired? And the Q.B. held that there could, and of that opinion also were Bramwell and Watson, BB. when the case afterwards came before this court; Pollock, C.B. being of a contrary opinion, and Martin, B. doubting: (S. C. 2 H. & N. 219.) As to the policy of these statutes, it was of immense importance to hold artificers to their contracts. To bring an action against men in their position would be nugatory; without this statutory remedy the contracts of hiring would be unilateral; the masters would be bound, whilst practically the men would be free. The Legislature intended these Acts as a mode of compelling performance of the contract—a kind of bill in equity to enforce performance, as distinguished from an action to recover damages for the breach of a contract; and if this conviction is reversed the court will impliedly repeal these useful and salutary statutes. The effect will be very disastrous to the masters who are in the habit of advancing money and buying tools for their workmen, on the faith of their contracts, the work being piecework, and taken by the men to their own homes. No master will prosecute for misconduct on the part of his workmen if twenty-one days' imprisonment is to annul the contract, and thus the men will have the upper hand of their masters. The 20 Geo. 2, c. 19 is the earliest of this class of statutes, and throws light on the construction of the statutes in question. By the 2nd section of that Act, three modes of punishment were given alternatively. The 4 Geo. 4 is founded on that, and it cannot be said that the latter statute, any more than the former one, meant to put an end to the contract of service certainly. Where the Legislature so intends it says so expressly, as in the 3rd section of 39 & 40 Geo. 3, c. 43, s. 3, relating to colliers, where it says: "And upon such conviction every such contract shall become void." [POLLOCK, C.B.—In Ex parte Baker I did not mean to say that the contract was at an end, but that there was no power to convict a second time; and looking at the way that case is reported in the Q. B., it is not an authority against that view. It is a matter of very large substance, and which I consider to be of immense importance. MARTIN, B.—The 1st section of 6 Geo. 3, c. 25, in which alone the words "from time to time" occur, obviously points to the apprentice's refusal to serve or to make satisfaction; and in case of such refusal he may be imprisoned. BRAMWELL, B.—The words "from time to time" refer not to the justices punishing, but to the apprentice's refusal to make satisfaction.] The analogy of an action for breach of contract fails; there, in bringing an action, a person elects to rescind, and recovers damages once for all. Here the master goes before the justices, not to rescind, but to compel performance of the contract; and the conclusion seems inevitable that, after punishment for one offence, he may, if he offend again, be punished again. Rex v. Inhabitants of Barton-upon-Irwell, 2 M. & S. 329; and Rex v. Inhabitants of Hallow, show that imprisonment under the 20 Geo. 2, c. 19, was held no dissolution of the contract of service. [POLLOCK, C.B.—Those are settlement cases; and Lord Eldon once complained of such cases being cited as authorities upon other branches of the law.] With regard to the guilty intention, he absented himself wilfully, and to get higher wages. It was only at the last moment that the dissolution of the contract was rested upon. Then he says, "My attorney tells me there is the opinion of one judge in my favour, so I'll break my contract, and take the chance of a point of law being in my favour." Such a course would dispense with the criminal law altogether. No bona fide was shown here. [MARTIN, B.—Suppose a man imagines his masters are not working out his contract fairly by him, and so leaves, is not that bona fide?] In Ryder v. Wood, the mens rea was absent. Not so in this case. He refers also to Willett v. Boote, and judgment of Bramwell, B., 30 L. J. 6, M. C. The advice given by his attorney is no excuse; if he stands on it he must take his chance; and both in fact and in law it fails. As to repeal, a later statute which is general and affirmative cannot repeal a prior affirmative statute unless in express terms, or unless there is some gross inconsistency between them. There are provisions in the prior Act which are not in the subsequent Act, and there is an appeal given in the former Act, but not in the latter; and the effect of holding the prior Act repealed will be to throw a large number of operatives throughout the kingdom out of the operation of the statute altogether. [POLLOCK, C.B. referred to the judgment of Bramwell, B. in Ex parte Baker, 2 H. & N. 242, on this point.]

Mellish, Q.C. in reply.—It is not necessary to say whether the Act is entirely repealed or not. The question is, is it superseded quoad this particular case? (Here he was stopped by the court.)

POLLOCK, C.B.—I am of opinion that this conviction is bad. It appears to me that the deft. acted perfectly bona fide in refusing to return; and having proceeded against him once, the justices could not compel him to return. I also think his original departure was intended to be permanent; and, without discussing the question whether the justices can interfere more than once where the absence is temporary (on which I retain my former opinion), I think, where the man clearly shows an intention to leave altogether, the magistrate should deal with the case once and for all: and whatever may be the power of the justices to punish a short absence, such as an unpermitted holiday more than once, yet where the workman means to quit the service altogether, the punishment should include the whole question of compensation, and be final. On that ground I think the present conviction not sustainable. The conviction is under the 6 Geo. 3, expressly, with imprisonment for one month, being the minimum allowed by that statute. Possibly the justices committed him for that period, thinking they could not commit for less; but the 6 Geo. 3, being repealed by the 4 Geo. 4, they were wrong, and the conviction is bad on that ground also.

MARTIN, B.—I also think the conviction, being expressly under 6 Geo. 3, is not supportable. I agree with what my brother Bramwell said in Ex parte Baker on the question of the repeal of that statute by the 4 Geo. 4, and I think the Legislature must be taken to have intended that the one Act shall be substituted for the other. It is a plain superseding of the one Act by the other. We cannot apply the strict rules laid down for construction to such a case; we must take a common-sense view of the matter. The justices are confined to the 4 Geo. 4, and had no right to fall back on 6 Geo. 3. True there is an appeal under the 6 Geo. 3, and none under the 4 Geo. 4, and so it may be said there is a hardship done in holding the former Act repealed; but that objection is removed by the very statute under which this case comes before us. I may say that my brother Wilde intimated to me, before he left the court, that on this point he concurred in opinion with me. As to the other point, I adhere to the opinion I expressed in Ex parte Baker, that it is one offence, and can only be dealt with once for all if the man absent himself meaning to leave altogether. In contemplation of law all men are equal, and we must not look at the ability of people to pay damages. The master has a right to act upon the statute, but if he do so act he must do so once for all; neither the master nor the justices may split the matter up into many bits. As to bona fides, it is a difficult question to deal with, but I think it was sufficiently established in this case. My judgment will, therefore, be for the app.

BRAMWELL, B.—There seems to be some peculiarity in these cases which prevents the courts from agreeing in their reasons for coming to the same conclusions. As to the repeal of the 6 Geo. 3, I agree with the app.; I cannot see why "piecework" is not within the 4 Geo. 4. I own I think there can, as a general proposition, be a second conviction, and but for the opinions of my Lord and my brother Martin, I should think so strongly. Ordinarily in breaches of contract the remedy is by action, but there are necessary exceptions in certain cases—e. g. a breach by a fraudulent bailee. I cannot see why a man, who otherwise would be able to break a contract with impunity, may not be punished for doing it wilfully and with dishonest intentions. Why is it not a crime? I know it is not so called. The law generally redresses broken contracts by civil remedy, but in the case of a workman it is nugatory and idle to say that the master has a remedy by action—it is like the advice said to have been once given by a learned judge to a labourer prosecuted before him for bigamy. The workman is benefited by having a cheap remedy for recovery of his wages, and I see nothing unreasonable in the Legislature having given that mode of punishment for breaches of the contract of service. Now, is the contract put an end to? The 4 Geo. 4 contemplates an abatement of wages and no discharge of the service, and why should not the master have the same power of punishing a misdemeanor by breach of contract again as he had in the first instance? I see no inconvenience, no injustice, in his having such a power. I confess (with the greatest respect for my Lord and my brother Martin, so far as they differ from me) I entertain the opinion that there is a power of punishing again under this statute, in cases where the contract of service is not put an end to. But entertaining this opinion, and the opinion of the policy of the law in this respect, which I do, I should be sorry if the law were not as it is laid down in Ryder v. Wood, an authority with which I express my humble agreement—it would be harsh indeed if it were not so, but as it is I think it is not harsh. In the case of a man acting under a bona fide belief of right, it would be monstrous that he should be punished under this Act instead of the master being left to his civil remedy. There are many instances of jurisdiction being taken away by a claim of right, and a recent case in the Q. B. settles that where summary jurisdiction is given, it must be with the qualification that the man knows that he is doing wrong. Surely there is no difficulty in ascertaining whether a man have a bona fide excuse. I see nothing contrary to any rule or principle of law in this. It is a reasonable thing, without which the Act would be tyrannical. Did the justices find here that the man had a lawful excuse? They find that he was strongly advised not to return, and that they think it very probable he really believed the opinion of his legal adviser. I cannot think he was wrong in believing that opinion, founded as it was on the opinion of the Lord Chief Baron. I think, therefore, the justices ought not to have convicted him on the ground of bona fides; and I decidedly think that the conviction is bad, on the ground that the original Act (6 Geo. 3, c. 25) is no longer in force in the matter.

WILDE, B. left the court before the conclusion of the argument.

WOODARD v. THE EASTERN COUNTIES RAILWAY COMPANY.

Railway traveller—Bye-laws—Production of ticket on request—Annual ticket—Conviction.

The bye-laws of the Eastern Counties Railway Company provides that "each passenger booking his place will be furnished with a ticket which he is to show and deliver up when required to the guard in charge of the train, or to any officer or servant of the said company authorised to inspect or collect tickets. Each passenger not producing or delivering up his ticket when required is hereby subjected to a penalty not exceeding 40s." The said company granted annual tickets for passengers up and down their line, which ticket expressed that it was to be exhibited when required, and the holder was required to sign a memorandum in which it was provided that he would "abide by and conform to the company's present and future bye-laws," and also that he would produce his ticket on entering the company's carriages, or whenever required by the company's servants, "or in default thereof pay the ordinary fare."

Held, that a passenger who had an annual ticket was subject to the above bye-law, and that he incurred the penalty of 40s. for refusing to produce his ticket when required by the company's officer.

This was a case stated by justices under the 20 & 21 Vict. c. 43, for the opinion of this court, as follows:—

At a petty sessions held for the divisions of the Half-hundred of Beacontree, in the county of Essex, at Little Ilford, before us, the undersigned and others, her Majesty's justices of the peace, acting in and for the said county, on the 16th Feb. 1861, Edward Woodard, of Billericay, in the said county of Essex, and of 106, Fenchurch-street, in the city of London, solicitor, appeared to answer an information laid against him at the instance of the Eastern Counties Railway Company, for having on the 4th Feb. 1861, at Stratford, in the parish of Westham, in the said county, refused to show his ticket when required so to do by one of the servants of the said company duly authorised to inspect and collect tickets, he, the said Edward Woodard, being then and there a passenger on the said Eastern Counties Railway, contrary to the bye-laws of the said company in that behalf duly made and published by the said company pursuant to the several Acts of Parliament relating to their railways.

On the hearing of the information it was proved by Charles Pratt, a ticket collector of the company, that the deft. was a passenger from Brentwood by a train to London, due at Stratford at 8.46 a.m. on the day in question, and that on the arrival of the train at Stratford station, where the passengers' tickets are collected, he requested the deft. to show his ticket, which the deft. declined to do, at the same time stating that he did not intend to produce his ticket on that or any future journey; whereupon Pratt demanded the deft.'s fare, which the deft. refused to pay. The witness Pratt, on cross-examination, stated that he was aware the deft. was the holder of an annual ticket, entitling him to travel upon the line of railway between London and Brentwood, and it was admitted by the company's attorney that such ticket had been taken out and paid for by the deft., and would not expire until the 9th May 1861.

The bye-laws of the company under their corporate seal, and the seal of the Commissioners of Railways, were put in evidence, and their publications at the stations of the company at Stratford, Bishopsgate, and Brentwood duly proved.

The following is a copy of the bye-laws under which the information was laid against the deft. :

"The bye-laws of the Eastern Counties Railway Company.—Notice is hereby given, that the Eastern Counties Railway Company, acting under the powers and provisions contained in the several Acts of Parliament relating to their railways, have made the following bye-laws for regulating the travelling upon and the use of their railways by travellers and passengers; which bye-laws have been duly allowed and confirmed as by law is required.

"1. No passenger will be allowed to take his seat in or upon any of the company's carriages, or to travel therein upon the said railways, without first having booked his place and paid his fare.

"Each passenger booking his place will be furnished with a ticket, which he is to show and deliver up when required to the guard in charge of the train, or to any officer or servant of the said company authorised to inspect or collect tickets. Each passenger not producing or delivering up his ticket when required, is hereby subjected to a penalty not exceeding 40s.

"2. Every person attempting to defraud the company by riding in or upon a carriage of higher class than that for which he has booked his place and paid his fare, is hereby subjected to a penalty not exceeding 40s.

"3. Passengers at the road or intermediate stations will only be booked conditionally; that is to say, in case there shall be room in the train for which they are booked, and without any warranty as to the time of arrival and departure of trains; and in case there shall not be room in the train for all passengers booked, those booked for the longest distance shall have priority according to the order in which they are booked. The passengers cannot rebook at any intermediate station for proceeding by the same train, further than they were originally booked to proceed.

"No passenger shall be permitted to ride upon the roof, steps, or sideboard of any carriage, and any passenger persisting in doing so, after being warned to desist by the guard in charge of the train, or any officer of the company, is hereby subjected to a penalty not exceeding 40s.

"5. Smoking is strictly prohibited both in and upon the carriages, and in the company's stations. Every person smoking in a carriage or elsewhere upon the company's premises, is hereby subjected to a penalty not exceeding 40s., and every person persisting in smoking in a carriage or station, after being warned to desist by any officer of the company, shall, in addition to a penalty not exceeding 40s., be immediately, or if travelling at the first opportunity, removed by the company's servants from the company's carriages and premises, and shall, if a passenger, forfeit any fare he may have paid.

"6. Any person found in the company's carriages, stations, or premises in a state of intoxication, or committing any nuisance, or otherwise wilfully interfering with the comfort of other passengers, is hereby subjected to a penalty not exceeding 40s., and shall immediately, or if travelling at the first opportunity, be removed by the company's servants from the company's carriages and premises, and if a passenger forfeit any fare he may have paid.

"7. Any person cutting, tearing, or soiling the linings, removing or defacing the number plates, breaking, scratching, or cracking the windows, or otherwise wilfully damaging or injuring any of the company's carriages, shall forfeit and pay a sum not exceeding 5*l.* in addition to the amount of damage done.

"8. No person will be allowed to get into or upon any carriage after, or to quit any carriage when, the train of which it forms part has been put on or is in motion, and every person doing so or attempting to do so is hereby subjected and made liable to a penalty not exceeding 40s.

In answer to the information the deft. produced the annual ticket granted to him by the company in the following words:—

"(No. 2170.) Eastern Counties Railway, first-class season ticket, between London and Brentwood, not transferable. Granted to Edward Woodward, Esq.

"Expires 9th May 1861."

"This ticket is to be exhibited when required, and the holder of it is subjected in all respects to the regulations as regards passengers."

And it was proved that when the ticket was granted the company required the deft. to sign, and he did sign a memorandum in the following words:—

"London, 9th May 1860.

"To the Eastern Counties Railway Company. I hereby acknowledge the receipt of ticket, entitling me to travel by all Eastern Counties trains, in a first-class carriage, between London and Brentwood, for the term of twelve months from this date, in consideration of my having paid 23*l.* (deposit 10*s.*), and I agree that I have received such ticket upon condition, that in the event of the loss of this ticket, that I abide by and conform to the company's present and future bye-laws, as approved, or hereafter to be approved, by the Commissioners of Railways, and also all rules and regulations as regards alterations of trains without notice or liability to me, security against improper use of such tickets, and all other matters, not holding the company answerable for any stoppage, hindrance, change or delay, in the proper starting or running of any train, arising from negligence, accident, or any other cause, and that I produce the said ticket on entering the company's carriages, or whenever required by the company's servants, or in default thereof pay the ordinary fare, and that I return the said ticket whenever called upon to do so by you, for the purpose of exchange or removal, and I agree that I will not transfer or part with such ticket, and in the event of its being transferred or parted with, or used by any other person, or in the event of my not abiding by or conforming to such bye-laws, rules and regulations as aforesaid, such ticket to be null and void, and all my rights thereunder to cease and determine, and I agree to pay the usual fares for travelling over the line for the remainder of the said term, as if such ticket had never been granted me, and I agree to deliver up such ticket or other changed or renewed ticket to the secretary of the company, on the 9th day of May 1861, or on demand of the same shall have become forfeited as before-mentioned.

It was contended on behalf of the deft. that the justices had no jurisdiction to convict him in a penalty under the company's bye-law, inasmuch as the annual ticket and memorandum formed a special contract between him and the company, and that he was not for this reason liable to be dealt with in a summary

[BAIL.]

ONLEY v. GEE.

[BAIL.]

manner before justices as a passenger booking his place and taking a ticket for a specific journey, to which cases alone the bye-laws applied; and further, that if any breach of the contract had been committed, the remedy of the company was by action at law against the deft., and not by information before justices for recovery of a penalty, or forfeiture under the provisions of the Railway Acta. The justices were of opinion that the company's bye-laws extended to the holders of annual tickets as well as to passengers booking their places for return or single journeys only, and they convicted the deft. in the mitigated penalty of 10s. and costs for refusing to produce his ticket to the servant of the company when required so to do.

Keane now appeared in support of the conviction, and argued that the app. came within the operation of the first bye-law, for that whether he had a ticket for the single journey or an annual ticket, he was equally a passenger, and it was equally necessary that he should be placed under the obligation of producing his ticket when required, an obligation which, by his express contract, he has admitted.

T. Chilly, for the app., contended that the bye-law was framed obviously to meet the case of ordinary daily passengers who had a ticket given them for each journey and who had to give it up; and not to affect annual ticket-holders, who, by their contract, stipulated that in default of producing their tickets they would pay the ordinary fare.

WIGHTMAN, J.—I am of opinion that the decision of the justices was right, and that the app. was liable to the penalty imposed upon him. Here he has an annual ticket, and whilst on his journey to London, the railway official at Stratford, where the train stops and the tickets are shown and collected, requires him to produce his ticket. He declined, however, to do so, and said he did not intend to produce it then or at any other time. It may, therefore, be taken that, in fact, he had it and refused to produce it; so that none of the questions of hardship which have been urged arise. Now it is just as important to enforce the production of annual as of ordinary tickets; for, unless the railway officer knows the person, he may be told that he has an annual ticket when in fact he has not. But it is said, however that may be, he is not within the terms of the bye-law. Now the bye-law is this: "Each passenger booking his place will be furnished with a ticket which he is to show and deliver up when required to the guard in charge of the train, or to any officer or servant of the said company authorised to inspect or collect tickets. Each passenger not producing or delivering up his ticket when required, is hereby subjected to a penalty not exceeding 40s." Now, it is said, he has already paid his fare, and he has not to deliver his ticket up. But he is furnished with an annual ticket instead of daily ones, and he may be required to show it without giving it up. There is, therefore, a distinction between producing and delivering up. Here he does not produce it when called upon to do so. It appears to me, therefore, that he does come within the meaning of the bye-law. But, it is said, there is a distinction arising upon the contract. The ticket itself says little except that "this ticket is to be exhibited when required, and the holder of it is subjected in all respects to the regulations as regards passengers." It is said there is a distinction between bye-laws and regulations, and that there are regulations distinct from the bye-laws. But I think from their very terms that the bye-laws do form regulations. Now the ticket is granted upon the ground that it is to be produced when required. It is said, however, that the contract he entered into excludes this bye-law, for it says that in default of producing the ticket he will pay the ordinary fare. If he had paid the fare when demanded he would so far have complied with this provision, but he did not do so. It seems to me there is no comparison between the inconvenience of requiring the holders of annual tickets to produce them, and their being at liberty not to produce them. I don't suggest that the app. intended any fraud—he has merely raised a question of right. Still it seems to me that, under the bye-law and the contract, he was bound to produce his ticket, and that by not producing it he incurred the penalty, and that the justices were justified in convicting. — Conviction affirmed.

ONLEY (app.) v. GEE (resp.)

Conviction — Keeping a betting-house — Continuous offence—Information—16 & 17 Vict. c. 43, ss. 1, 9 and 10.

The app. was convicted summarily by justices upon an information preferred against him under sect. 3 of the 16 & 17 Vict. c. 119 (An Act for the suppression of betting-houses), which charged him "with having on the 5th day of Oct. in the year aforesaid, and on divers other days and times between the said 5th of Oct. and the laying of the said information" (16th Nov. following), "being then and there the occupier of a certain house in the said city" (Manchester), "knowingly and wilfully opened, kept and used the same for the purpose of the said Bartholomew Onley betting with persons resorting thereto." The justices convicted him of the offence committed on the 8th Nov., and in a case stated for the opinion of this court, they stated that it was established to their satisfaction that he did so keep and use the house on the 8th Nov., but not on the 5th Oct. or on any other day:

Held, that the information was good, and did not allege more than one offence, and that upon such information the justices were warranted in convicting of the offence as committed on the 8th Nov.

Case stated under the 20 & 21 Vict. c. 43, by the magistrates of Manchester, upon a conviction under sect. 3 of the 16 & 17 Vict. c. 119 ("An Act for the suppression of betting-houses"), in the following form:—

"City of Manchester to wit.—At the police court in the said city, before the undersigned, two of her Majesty's justices of the peace for the said city, on the 26th day of November 1860, Bartholomew Onley was charged, on an information laid on the 16th day of November, in the year aforesaid, under the 3rd section of the 16 & 17 Vict. c. 119, with having on the 5th day of October, in the year aforesaid, and on divers other days and times between the said 5th October and the laying of the said information, being then and there the occupier of a certain house in the said city, knowingly and wilfully opened, kept and used the same for the purpose of the said Bartholomew Onley betting with persons resorting thereto, contrary to the form of the said statute." Besides this there were eight other informations varying the charge against the deft., and amongst them was one stating the above offence to have been committed on the 8th of Nov., in the year aforesaid, but omitting the words "and on divers other days," &c. On the information being read by the counsel for the prosecution, the counsel who appeared for the deft. raised these objections thereto: First, that on the hearing of the information charging the offence as having been committed on the 5th Oct. and divers other days, evidence could not be received as to what took place on the 8th Nov; secondly, that owing to the words "and on divers other days," it was too general, and thereby placed the deft. in the difficulty of being unable to defend himself against other charges of the same offence; and, thirdly, that those words laid more than one offence, in contravention of the 10th section of the 11 & 12 Vict. c. 43. The justices, however, decided against the objections, and the case was proceeded with. Evidence was given by the prosecution to show that the deft. kept and used his house for the purpose stated in the information on the 5th Oct. and the 8th Nov., and it was established to the satisfaction of the justices that he did so keep and use the same on the 8th Nov., but not on the 5th Oct., or any other day. The justices were of opinion that, under the authority of the 11 & 12 Vict. c. 43, the information was sufficient, and that the variance between the information and the evidence on the part of the informant was not material; and, after having heard the arguments of counsel, they retired, and on their return convicted the deft. of the offence committed on the 8th Nov. The deft. being dissatisfied with such conviction, as being erroneous in point of law, demanded a case for the opinion of her Majesty's judges of the Court of Q. B., which the justices hereby state and sign accordingly."

The 3rd section of the 16 & 17 Vict. c. 119, enacts that "Any person who, being the owner or occupier of any house, office, room, or other place, or a person using the same, shall open, keep, or use the same for the purposes hereinbefore mentioned (described in sect. 1), or either of them, and any person who, being the owner or occupier of any house, room, office, or other place, shall knowingly and wilfully permit the same to be opened, kept, or used by any other person for the purposes aforesaid . . . shall, on summary conviction thereof before any two justices of the peace, be liable to forfeit and pay such penalty not exceeding one hundred pounds as shall be adjudged by such justices," &c.

Mellish, Q.C., for the resp., contended that the conviction was good, and was founded upon a valid information, for that the offence being a continuing one, and not consisting of the doing of a particular act, it may well be described as committed on a certain day, and on divers other days and times, as upon an indictment for a common nuisance; that the app. being convicted of having committed the offence on the 8th Nov. was warranted by the information which covered that day, and that the 9th section of the 11 & 12 Vict. c. 43, rendered the misstatement of time in an information in such a case immaterial.

Torr, for the app., argued that the conviction was bad, as not being warranted by the information, it not being competent to the justices to convict of an offence committed on the 8th Nov., when the day laid in the information was the 5th Oct. [WIGHTMAN, J.—The offence is of keeping open a house for the purpose of betting; each time there is betting there is evidence of the house being kept for that purpose, and if that is found to have taken place on a particular day, it is evidence that on that day the house was kept open for that purpose. The day laid would seem to be immaterial, if within the time stated during which the house is kept open for the purpose.] The information was bad, as alleging the commission of several offences, the 10th section of the 11 & 12 Vict. c. 43, directing that every information shall be for one offence only. Upon a subsequent information for a similar offence committed between the 5th Oct. and the 16th Nov., he would be unable to protect himself, for he is convicted only of an offence upon the 8th Nov.: (Paley on Convictions, 155; Martin v. Pridgeon, 28 L. J. 179, M.C.)

Mellish, in reply, referred to the last proviso in sect. 1 of the 11 & 12 Vict. c. 43.

WIGHTMAN, J.—That proviso certainly cures any defect arising from a variance between the information and the evidence. It seems to me that the information would have been perfectly good if one day only, the 8th Nov., had been stated in it as the time when the offence was committed, and I think that though the information lays the offence not on that day, but on the 5th Oct., and on divers other days and times, it is still well laid. Conviction affirmed.

REG. v. TOTT.

Alcove—Refusing to admit a police-officer—Out-house—Second conviction—Penalty—4 & 5 Will. 4, c. 85, s. 7.

A police-officer has, under sect. 7 of the 4 & 5 Will. 4, c. 85, a right to enter any portion of premises licensed to sell beer or spirituous liquors, though such premises are merely an outhouse, and a refusal to permit him to do so is an offence within that section.

For a second offence under the above section the punishment is suspension of the licence alone, and the convicting justices have no power to add a pecuniary penalty.

This was a case stated by the Middlesex Sessions upon an appeal against a conviction of a metropolitan police magistrate, under sect. 7 of the 4 & 5 Will. 4, c. 85. The case was as follows:—

By the 4 & 5 Will. 4, c. 85 s. 7, it is enacted: "That it shall be lawful for all constables and officers of police, and they are hereby authorised and empowered, to enter into all houses which are or shall be licensed to sell beer or spirituous liquors to be consumed upon the premises, when and so often as such constables and officers shall think proper, and if any person having such licence as aforesaid, or any servant or other person in his employ or by his direction, shall refuse to admit, or shall not admit, such constable or officer of police into such house or upon such premises, such person having such licence shall for the first offence forfeit and pay any sum not exceeding 5*l.*, together with the costs of the conviction, to be recovered within twenty days next after that on which such offence was committed, before one or more justices of the peace, and it shall be lawful for any two or more justices, before whom any such person shall be convicted of such offence for the second time, to adjudge (if they shall so think fit) that such offender shall be disqualified from selling beer, ale, porter, cider, or perry by retail for the space of two years next after such conviction, or for such shorter space of time as they may think proper."

William Tott (app.) was, by a licence in the form contained in the schedule to the said Act, duly licensed to sell beer, ale, &c., in order that it might be consumed in a dwelling-house of the said William Tott, situate in Bow-common-lane, in the parish of Bethnal-green, in the county of Middlesex, and in the premises thereunto belonging. Next to the house was a yard, and at one side of the yard adjoining to, but not under the same roof with it, was an outhouse used as a cellar. This was in the occupation of the app., and formed part of the premises belonging to the house, but had no direct internal communication with the house, and the only mode of getting to this outhouse was by going through the taproom and ground-floor of the dwelling-house into the yard. The app. had been previously convicted under the above section for refusing to admit the police, and was convicted of a second offence by the conviction which was now appealed against. (The conviction was here set out, charging that the app. had before been convicted of a similar offence, and it adjudged him to forfeit and pay the sum of 5*l.*, and be disqualified from selling beer, ale, porter, cider and perry for the space of two years.) The case then proceeded as follows:—

On Sunday the 17th June, at about a quarter to twelve in the forenoon, a police constable was passing the said house, and hearing several persons talking at the bar to the potman of the app., applied for admission at the door of the house which opened into Bow-common-lane. After doing so, and before he was admitted, he heard several persons go to the back part of the premises. When the constable was admitted into the house, he heard several persons in the said outhouse, and upon going into the yard he knocked at the door of the outhouse and applied to be admitted, but the app. refused to admit, and did not admit him into such outhouse. It was contended on behalf of the app. that the section above mentioned gave the police power to enter the house of the app., but did not give them power to enter such an outhouse as that above mentioned; that therefore the refusal to admit to the outhouse was not an offence within the section. It was further contended that the conviction was bad, because it adjudged the app. to forfeit and pay 5*l.* for the offence, and also to be disqualified from selling beer, ale, &c. by retail for two years, and that the section above mentioned did not empower the infliction of a fine and suspension of the licence. The court of quarter sessions decided against both the objections and confirmed the conviction, subject to a case for the opinion of the honourable court.

BAIL.]

REG. v. OWEN PRITCHARD.

[C. CAS. R.]

The opinion of the court is therefore requested, whether under the above section it was an offence to refuse the police admittance to the above-mentioned outhouse, and whether upon a conviction of a second offence the person convicted is liable to a fine, in addition to the suspension of his licence.

Poland appeared in support of the conviction, and contended, first, that no portion of the premises was exempt from the inspection of the police officers, and that the outhouse or cellar was covered by the licence, and so was subject to be entered by the officers, as much as the dwelling-house itself; secondly, that the penalty upon a second conviction, of a suspension of the licence, was cumulative, and that were it not so, the words "if they shall so think fit" would have no meaning, for if the punishment of suspension were not thought fit, there would be then no other.

M'Intyre, for the app., argued, first, that the officer had no right to enter upon any premises which were not occupied for the sale of beer, &c. [WIGHTMAN, J.—Under his licence he may have sold beer in this outhouse.] Had he done so the case would have been different. Secondly, the punishment for a second offence is suspension of the licence only, and no fine is authorised to be imposed, which is the punishment alone for the first offence.

WIGHTMAN, J.—Two objections have been taken to this conviction. First, that the officer was not authorised to enter into the cellar, which was a part of the premises. The licence, however, is no doubt large enough to include the cellar, for it is in this form: "to sell beer, ale and porter by retail, in order that it may be consumed in the said dwelling-house of the said A.B., and in the premises thereunto belonging." So that there is nothing in the Act to prevent his carrying on his business in the cellar. That being so, it seems to me that the officer had authority to require to be admitted into that part of the premises; and indeed, if not, the Act would be constantly evaded, for nothing would be easier than when he finds an officer coming to his house to send his company into the cellar. That objection, therefore, I think, cannot be sustained. As to the second objection, I have very great difficulty in agreeing with the magistrate in the construction he has put upon the section. I can only take the words of the clause to mean that for the first offence a penalty of 5*l.* may be imposed, and for the second offence the licence may be suspended. It is said that for the second offence there is to be the double penalty. But if the Legislature had intended this, it should have used different words. It may be that the penalty for the second offence is much more onerous than the first, and that the suspension of the licence is intended to be so. It is said, however, that the words "if they shall so think fit" show that a qualification was intended as to the penalty. I think not, however, and that the penalties are distinct; and that for the second offence there is no pecuniary penalty to be added to the suspension. I cannot say what was the intention of the Legislature, but there is not sufficient to show that a double penalty was intended.

REG. v. OWEN PRITCHARD.

Larceny—Ownership of property—Joint-stock bank
—7 Geo. 4, c. 46, s. 9—7 Geo. 4, c. 64, s. 14.

In an indictment for larceny, the property was laid to be in J. C. G., the manager of the Dudley and West Bromwich Bank. The property belonged to the banking company, a joint-stock company consisting of more than twenty partners, but no registration of it, nor appointment of any manager or public officer, was proved. The indictment was amended at the trial, by laying the property in P. W. and others; P. W. being one of the partners:

Held, that the ownership, as amended, was rightly laid under 7 Geo. 4, c. 64, s. 14, and that it need not have been laid in the public officer (presuming there to have been one), under 7 Geo. 4, c. 46, s. 9.

Case stated by Channell, B. for the opinion of this court.

The prisoner, Owen Pritchard, was convicted before me, at the last assizes for Denbighshire, of stealing 8*lbs.* weight of brass.

The conviction is to be taken to be correct, subject only to the question whether the indictment sufficiently describes the ownership of the property which is the subject thereof.

The property charged to be stolen consisted of certain brasses or caps which had formed part of an engine and machinery used in the working of colliery works, known as the Llywernian Colliery works.

The indictment on which the prisoner was arraigned, and to which he pleaded, described the property as the property of "John Cleveland Green."

Edward Green was called as a witness for the prosecution. He swore, "that he was the son of John Cleveland Green; that John Cleveland Green was the manager of the Dudley and West Bromwich Bank; that he was sent by his father to reside near the colliery works; that he had the engines and works belonging to the colliery under his care at the time when the brasses and caps were severed and taken from the machinery; that he could not actually say that he was a servant of the company, but that he received from his father payment for taking charge of the machinery and works; that he believed the money came from the company; that with money he got from his father he paid the men on the works; and that the engines and machinery belonged to the Dudley and West Bromwich Company.

No registration of the Dudley and West Bromwich Company as a joint-stock company, or of the appointment of any manager or public officer thereof, was proved.

It was objected by the prisoner's counsel that the ownership of the property in John Cleveland Green was not proved.

The witness stated that Philip Williams was one of the partners in the Dudley and West Bromwich Bank; that there were more than twenty partners or shareholders in the bank; and that it was, as he understood, a joint-stock banking company.

C. CAS. R.]

REG. v. JAMES BRAMLEY.

[C. CAS. R.]

I was thereupon requested to amend the indictment. I did so by striking out the words John Cleveland Green, and stating the property to be the property of Philip Williams and others.

The prisoner was convicted and sentenced, and is now undergoing his sentence.

On the same day on which he was tried, and shortly before the verdict was recorded, my attention was called by the prisoner's counsel to the statutes and cases collected in Archbold's Criminal Law, 14th edit., pp. 36 and 37.

I then reserved for the opinion of this Court the question whether, upon the evidence set out, the ownership of the property was sufficiently described in the indictment as amended; and if not, whether the description in the indictment before the amendment was made was sufficient, if that question could after the amendment be properly reserved.

The question submitted is, whether the indictment as amended, or as it stood before amendment (supposing it can in its original form be referred to), sufficiently described the ownership of the property according to the evidence to sustain the conviction.

W. F. CHANNELL.

McIntyre, for the prisoner.—It is submitted that, after the amendment had once been made, and the verdict recorded, the judge had no power to amend further, and that the property was wrongly laid to be in Williams and others. It ought to have been laid to be in the public officer of the banking company. The 39 & 40 Geo. 3, c. 28, s. 15, provides that no other bank than the Bank of England shall be established or allowed by Parliament, and that it shall not be lawful for any number of persons exceeding six to issue notes payable on demand at any less time than six months, during the continuance of the privileges granted by that Act to the Bank of England. Then, taking this to be a joint-stock company, and to consist of more than six partners, it must have a public officer according to the 7 Geo. 4, c. 46, s. 4. And then sect. 9 enacts, "That all indictments, informations and prosecutions by or on behalf of such copartnership for any stealing or embezzlement of any money, goods, effects, &c., or other property of or belonging to such copartnership, or for any fraud, forgery, or crime or offence, committed against or with intent to injure or defraud such copartnership, shall and lawfully may be had, preferred and carried on in the name of any one of the public officers nominated as aforesaid for the time being of such copartnership." [WILLES, J.—Under the 7 & 8 Vict. c. 113, the property may be laid to be in the body corporate.] But there is no evidence that this company was incorporated under the 7 & 8 Vict. c. 113. [POLLOCK, C. B.—May any one go and steal their property if they have not appointed a public officer? WILDE, J.—That is, if they have not complied with the statute.] It is to be assumed that the company has acted legally and appointed a public officer. The words "shall and may" in the 9th section are obligatory; and in Chapman v. Milvain, 5 Ex. 61, it was held that a joint-stock banking company under the 7 Geo. 4, c. 46, were bound to sue in the name of their public officer. In Reg. v. Beard, 8 C. & P. 143, which was referred to in the judgment in Chapman v. Milvain, Coleridge, J. intimated an opinion that a registered joint-stock banking company was not bound to prosecute in the name of their public officer, but the point was not argued. [BLACKBURN, J.—How do you reconcile your construction of the 7 Geo. 4, c. 46, s. 9, with sect. 14 of the subsequent Act, 7 Geo. 4, c. 64? "And in order to remove the difficulty of stating the names of all the owners of property in the case of partners and other joint owners, be it enacted, that in any indictment or information for any felony or misdemeanor, wherein it shall be requisite to state the ownership of any property whatsoever, whether real or personal, which shall belong to or be in the possession of more than one person, whether such persons be partners in trade, joint tenants, parceners or tenants in common, it shall be sufficient to name one of such persons, and to state such property to belong to the person so named, and another or others, as the case may be, &c.; and this provision shall be construed to extend to all joint-stock companies and trustees." That means all lawful joint-stock companies, not such an one as this, regulated by a peculiar statute. In Archbold's Pleading and Evidence in Criminal Cases, 35, 12th edit., it is said that it would seem now to be settled that the property must be laid in a public officer of the company. 2 Russ. on Crimes, 104, was also referred to.

V. Williams, for the prosecution, was not called upon to argue.

POLLOCK, C. B.—We are all of opinion that the question submitted to us, whether the indictment as amended sufficiently described the ownership of the property, must be answered by saying that it did. The 7 & 8 Geo. 4, c. 64, s. 14, expressly applies to the case of partnership and joint owners, and to all joint-stock companies and trustees, and provides that it shall be sufficient to name one of such persons, and to state such property to belong to the person so named and another or others, as the case may be. It cannot be supposed that, although their banking business may not have been carried on according to law, they are not possessed of the property. They were the possessors of it, and the possession of it was properly laid to be in the one named and others, within the meaning of the 7 Geo. 4, c. 64, s. 14. The conviction, therefore, will stand.

WILLIAMS, J.—I am of the same opinion. Chapman v. Milvain would bind us to the extent that in a civil action the words "shall and may," in 7 Geo. 4, c. 46, s. 9, are imperative, and that an action cannot be maintained in such a case in the name of any other person than the public officer. But the question is, whether that decision applies to an indictment. The 7 Geo. 4, c. 64, s. 14, makes it plain that they do not, and that an indictment which states the property to belong to one member by name, and others, is good. That provision, it is expressly enacted, shall be construed to extend to all joint-stock companies. This is a joint-stock company, and the 7 Geo. 4, c. 64, s. 14, is the last provision on the subject.

The rest of the COURT concurring,

Conviction affirmed.

REG. v. JAMES BRAMLEY.

Larceny—False pretence—Obtaining goods by an artifice.

Prisoner went to a colliery professedly to buy a load of the best soft coal; the cart was accordingly loaded by the prosecutor's servant with that description of coal. It was the prisoner's duty then to have gone with the cart to the weighing machine and have it weighed, and then to have paid the weighing clerk for it. He, however, previously to going to the weighing machine, covered over the top of the coal in the cart with a very inferior description of coal, called "slack," and then went with the cart to the weighing machine, and told the weighing clerk that he had got "slack," who weighed the cart and charged for it as containing "slack" only. The prisoner paid for the coal as "slack," and left the colliery:

Held, that the property in the soft coal had not been parted with, and that the prisoner could be convicted of larceny.

Case reserved for the opinion of this court.

C. CAS. R.]

REG. v. JAMES BRAMLEY.

At the last Nottinghamshire quarter sessions held at Nottingham, James Bramley was indicted for feloniously stealing, on the 19th day of Nov. last, at Basford, 15 cwt. of coal, of the value of 8s. 6d., the property of Thomas North.

The prosecutor was the owner of a colliery. The prisoner was a higgler, and in the habit of coming to the colliery to purchase coal. Both coal and small coal or slack were sold by retail at the colliery to higglers and others, but it was proved that none (except to certain private customers of Mr. North, with whom an account was kept) was allowed to be taken away until it had been paid for, and that when the carts were loaded they were taken to the prosecutor's weighing machine in the colliery yard, where the weight and price of the coals having been ascertained, the coals were paid for to the prosecutor's clerk in charge of the weighing machine.

The weighing machine is at the entrance of the prosecutor's yard, and so placed that carts entering and passing out of the yard have to pass the machine, and within view of the clerk in charge of it, and as the carts go into the yard empty they are weighed. On returning loaded they are again weighed, and from the gross weight so ascertained the weight of the empty cart is deducted, and the residue is taken to be the net weight of the coals in the cart.

The prisoner, having frequently before the day in question fetched coals from the prosecutor's yard, was acquainted with the above regulations, and knew that he would not be permitted to take coals out of the yard until they had been weighed and paid for as above mentioned.

The price of soft coal was about double that of slack.

On the day named in the indictment the prisoner brought his cart to the colliery, and said, "I want a load of the best soft coal." The cart was loaded with the best soft coal by a servant of the prosecutor, whose business it is to load the carts of the customers, assisted by the prisoner himself.

Having finished loading the coals, the prosecutor's servant went away to his work in another part of the yard, leaving the prisoner to take his cart to the weighing machine to be weighed, which ought at once to have been done.

Near the place where the coals were so loaded was a heap of slack, and after the prosecutor's servant had left the prisoner as before mentioned, the prisoner (as appeared by a statement subsequently made by him) placed a quantity of this slack on the top of the load of soft coal, thereby covering over the coal, and making the cart appear to be loaded with slack only.

The prisoner then took the cart to the weighing-machine, and the clerk in charge of the machine said to the prisoner, "What have you got?" He said, "Slack." The clerk, seeing only slack in the cart, thereupon weighed the cart and charged the prisoner for the load as slack, and the prisoner paid such charge and went away with his cart. Had the cart contained slack only, the amount paid by the prisoner was all that would have been due from him; but, as the fact was, the sum paid by the prisoner was considerably less than the real price of the load.

Shortly after the prisoner had gone away the weighing clerk having communicated with the prosecutor's servant, who had loaded the prisoner's cart with the coal, as before mentioned, sent after the prisoner, who was overtaken with the cart on the highway, proceeding towards Nottingham. The prisoner returned with the messenger to the prosecutor's yard, and was charged by the clerk with obtaining soft coal as slack. The prisoner said to the clerk, "What's the difference and I will pay you, and we will have no more bother about it." The clerk said, "Oh, shan't we?" Prisoner said, "It's the first time I have done anything of the kind before, and I'll never try it any more." The clerk told the prisoner the difference in the price between slack and the best soft coal, and the prisoner paid the clerk. The prisoner said, "You have not said anything about it, have you?" The clerk said, "I have, and shall say more." The prisoner then went away, and the clerk gave information of the facts to his employer.

The prisoners's counsel submitted that there was no case to go to the jury to charge the prisoner with stealing the coal, and that if there was any offence committed, it would be obtaining the coal under false pretences.

The Court overruled this objection, and told the jury that if they were of opinion that the prisoner at the time when he went to the colliery for the coal intended fraudulently to take the same away and appropriate it to his own use on paying for the soft coal the price of slack only, and that he actually carried out his intention by fraudulently placing slack over the soft coal, and making the false representation above mentioned to the weighing clerk, they might convict the prisoner of larceny of the coal.

The jury found the prisoner guilty of larceny, but the court of quarter sessions respited judgment until the next quarter sessions, and discharged the prisoner upon his own recognisance, with two sureties, to appear at the next sessions to receive judgment, should the Court for Crown Cases Reserved be of opinion that he was properly convicted.

The opinion of the Court for the Consideration of Crown Cases Reserved is requested whether the prisoner was rightly convicted of larceny?

Case for the prisoner.—It is admitted that the conviction of the prisoner for larceny was wrong. Although the evidence might be sufficient to support an indictment for obtaining the coal by false pretences, the authorities show that it is not sufficient to support larceny. The distinction between false pretences and larceny is laid down in 2 East, P. O. 688, and a number of cases cited, which show that where the intention of the prosecutor is to part with the property in the thing obtained by the prisoner, it is a case of false pretences; and where the intention is to part with possession only of the property, it is a case of larceny. In R. v. Parkes, 2 East P. O. 67, the deft. bought goods and desired them to be sent to him with a bill and receipt, and the shopman who took them left them upon being paid for them by two bills, which turned out to be mere fabrications. The judges held that this was not larceny, because the prosecutor had parted with the property as well as the possession. So in R. v. Jackson, Russ. & Moo. 119, where the prisoner was indicted for stealing a diamond brooch and other articles, and it appeared that they had been pledged, and that the prisoner obtained them and some money from a pawnbroker's servant, by pretending to deposit another pledge of greater value in lieu of them, it was held that it was not larceny, because the servant, who had a general authority from the master, parted with the property and ownership, and not merely with the possession. [WILLIAMS, J.—The difference between that case and the present is this: the pawnbroker's servant, having a general authority, was induced to part with the property in the old pawn; but in the present case the cart was not to be allowed to go out of the prosecutor's yard without payment of the price of the coal.] This is the converse of the ordinary case of obtaining money by false pretences. The court must be satisfied that the prisoner could not have been convicted of obtaining the deft.'s coal by false pretences. If the soft coal had been of nearly the same value as the slack, would it have amounted to larceny? Here there is strong reason for saying that the property in the soft coal had been parted with. [WILDE, B.—Suppose the case of a shop, in one part of which the customer selects the goods, and then has to take them to another for the purpose of having the bill made out and paying for them, but that instead of taking the goods to that part to have the bill made out and paying for them, the man slips away with the goods without paying for them.] In such a case there would be no consent at all to the man's taking away the goods. [WILDE, B.—Here the weighing clerk consented only to the carrying away slack, not the soft coal which was invisible.] Here it is contended, the clerk intended to part with the cart load of coal which was standing before him.

C. CAS. R.]

REG. v. URIAH WEEKS.

[C. CAS. R.]

Boden, for the prosecution, was not called upon to argue.

POLLOCK, C. B.—We are all of opinion that the conviction was right. This case does not at all differ from that which was suggested by my brother Wilde—viz. where a man receives goods in one part of an establishment, and has to take and pay for them in another part, but he slips away without paying for them. In such a case it cannot be said that the goods are absolutely delivered to him, and therefore the man acquires no property in them. In this case the soft coal was delivered to the prisoner by the prosecutor's servant for the purpose of being taken to the weighing-machine to be weighed and there paid for. The prisoner, when the servant was away, covered the soft coal with slack, and took it to the weighing-machine, and caused it to be weighed and paid for as slack. It cannot be said that there was any permission to take away the soft coal, or that it was paid for or delivered. Suppose the case of a mine consisting partly of silver and partly of lead, if a man professing to take away a certain quantity of silver, were to cover it over with lead and then smuggle it out and pay for it as lead only, that would be merely a mode of concealing and stealing the silver.

WILLIAMS, J.—I am of the same opinion. It was contended that this is a case of false pretences, and not a case of larceny; but the distinction has been settled to be that where the owner, of property, by means of a trick or subterfuge, is induced to part with the possession, it amounts to larceny; but where he intends to part with the property, it is a case of false pretences. In the present case the jury have found that the prisoner went to the colliery with a preconceived and dishonest intention of obtaining possession of the soft coal; and having so obtained it, instead of taking it to the weighing-machine to be weighed, and paying for it as soft coal, he used the artifice of covering it over with slack, and by that trick altogether prevented the weighing clerk from seeing the soft coal was beneath the slack. The prisoner had no permission to take away the soft coal without paying for it; and indeed the weighing clerk was altogether ignorant of the fact that any soft coal was beneath the slack. Instead of obtaining any property in the soft coal, the prisoner obtained the possession of it merely. The case was, therefore, one of larceny.

REG. v. URIAH WEEKS.

Coining—Having possession of a mould—2 Will. 4, c. 24, s. 21—Guilty knowledge—Previous offence.

The prisoner, jointly with several others, was indicted for a felony, viz., for knowingly and feloniously having in their custody and possession a mould (for coining) of the obverse side of a half-crown. The mould and other coining materials, and also all the persons charged, with the exception of the prisoner, were found and taken in a house occupied by the prisoner. At the time of the capture, the police were attacked, and attempts made to destroy the coining materials, and the prisoner then came to the house, and entered the house, notwithstanding some of the others called out to him "that the police were there." He was then captured. It was also proved that the prisoner, about thirteen days before, had passed a bad half-crown, but it did not appear that that half-crown was made in the mould found in the house:

Held, that there was sufficient evidence to be left to the jury on the charge of felony, and that the evidence of the passing of the bad half-crown was admissible to prove guilty knowledge.

Case reserved by Blackburn, J. for the opinion of this Court.

Uriah Weeks was indicted before me at the last Monmouth assizes, along with John Loveridge, Elizabeth Loveridge, Mary Weeks, and Valentine Trew, for knowingly and without lawful excuse, feloniously having in their custody and possession a mould on which was impressed the figure and apparent resemblance of the obverse side of a half-crown.

On the trial it was proved that the prisoner Uriah Weeks had for about a month occupied a house in Pontypool. On the night of the 15th March the police went to that house, and on entering found the prisoners John Loveridge, Elizabeth Loveridge, Mary Weeks, who was the wife of the prisoner Uriah Weeks, and Valentine Trew. The two men attacked the police and attempted to keep them at bay, whilst the two women snatched up something from the table which they threw into the fire. The police overpowered the men in sufficient time to preserve part of what the women were endeavouring to destroy, which proved to be fragments of a plaster of paris mould of a half-crown, parts of which were still wet.

The men Loveridge and Trew were taken into custody to the police station by some of the police whilst the others remained to take charge of the women and search the house.

Uriah Weeks shortly afterwards came to the house. The women called out to him that the police were there. He nevertheless came in and was taken into custody.

On searching the house, which was a house with two rooms on each floor, a quantity of plaster of paris was found in a cupboard up stairs, along with several bottles containing liquids, and some bags with different powders in them; but no evidence was given of what their contents were. There was also found in a cupboard in a room down stairs an iron ladle such as might have been used for melting metal, and on the hearth in one of the rooms upstairs was found a small portion of white metal, and amongst the cinders some plaster of paris moulds.

It was proved that Uriah Weeks had on the 2nd March, thirteen days before the night in question, passed a bad half-crown, but there was no evidence to show that the bad half-crown which he passed had been made in the mould found in his house on the 15th of March.

An objection was taken on behalf of Uriah Weeks, that there was no sufficient evidence to show that he had the possession of the moulds.

By 2 Will. 4, c. 24, s. 21, it is enacted that where the having any matter in the custody or possession is in that Act expressed to be an offence, if any person shall have any such matter in his personal custody or possession, or shall knowingly and wilfully have any such matter in any dwelling-house, &c., whether occupied by himself or not, every such person shall be deemed to have such matter in his custody and possession within the meaning of this Act.

I left the case to the jury, who found the prisoner Uriah Weeks guilty, and in answer to a question from me said that they were satisfied that he knew the mould was in his house.

He was afterwards tried and convicted of uttering the base half-crown.

Sentence was passed upon him of twelve months' imprisonment for that offence, and concurrently with that imprisonment penal servitude for three years for the felony; but, as I had some doubts whether there was sufficient evidence to justify a conviction on the felony, I respited the sentence of penal servitude till the opinion of this Court could be obtained upon the point.

The question for the opinion of the Court is, whether there was sufficient evidence to be left to the jury on the charge of felony.

No counsel appeared for the prisoner.

G. R. N. Somerset, for the Crown, was stopped.

POLLOCK, C. B.—We are all of opinion that there was enough evidence to be left to the jury to enable them to say whether the mould was knowingly and feloniously, and without lawful excuse, in the custody and possession of the prisoner, and that the conviction for the felony must be affirmed. It was found in a house of which he was the master, and it was there apparently for a felonious purpose. In order to prove the scienter evidence of other substantive offences of any sort having a tendency to prove guilty knowledge may be given. If a man is charged with the commission of one felony, and his commission of another felony has a tendency to prove guilty knowledge on his part, no doubt you may give evidence of that fact collaterally. This conviction, therefore, must be affirmed.

HUGHES v. THE METROPOLITAN BOARD OF WORKS.

The 19 & 20 Vict. c. 120 (An Act for the better Local Management of the Metropolis) sects. 135-144, and sects. 150-153—Land or easement, purchase of.

The Metropolitan Board of Works have, under the above-stated sections of their Act, an optional right of purchasing for the purposes of that Act, either land or easements in land, upon payment of compensation for damages (if any) done in the formation of their works.

The North London Railway Company v. The Metropolitan Board of Works, 1 John. 405, followed.

The plt. in this case had obtained an injunction to restrain the defts. the Metropolitan Board of Works from making a sewer through his land without his consent, or until proper compensation had been made to him. It appeared that he was entitled to a piece of land at East Dulwich; and that the defts., in pursuance of the powers contained in the 18 & 19 Vict. c. 120, had some time since commenced the construction of the southern high level sewer. That sewer, as planned, was carried under the plt.'s land. The defts., however, had not given him any notice of their desire to purchase or take on lease the land, or any right or easement over it; but the plt. ascertained that some part of his land, or a right or easement therein, would be required by the defts. for the purposes of their Act. He accordingly instructed his solicitor to write in Dec. 1860 to the defts., stating that he had originally bought the land for the sole purpose of building, and had laid out the ground accordingly; in consequence of which he would sustain permanent damage by the contemplated sewerage works. He estimated the extent of that damage at the amount of 9*l.* 12*s.* per annum, with respect to ground-rent, for which he accordingly claimed the sum of 240*l.*, being twenty-five years' purchase on the rent—but he stated that he was willing to treat with the defts. forthwith, and in case of difference he was desirous of having the compensation settled by arbitration, and he required the defts. not to proceed with the works till his claim was settled. In reply to that letter the defts. wrote to say that the Board of Works sanctioned the erection by the plt. of buildings over the line of sewer passing through his land; and that they would construct such works around it, for the foundation of the houses and the protection of the sewer, as might be deemed necessary. Under those circumstances, the defts. presumed that the plt. would not make any claim for compensation on that head. The plt. replied that he objected to the prosecution of the intended works on his land before his original claim had been disposed of. The defts., however, on the 16th March, entered upon the land and began their works; whereupon the bill in this suit was filed, and the plt. obtained an ex parte injunction to restrain the defts. from making or continuing to make the sewer without his consent, or until a proper compensation should have been paid to him in respect of the land, right, or easement required by the defts. for the construction of the sewer.

The general scope of the sections of the defts.' Act, the 19 & 20 Vict. c. 120, on which the decision of the case mainly rested, may be shortly stated as follows:—

The 135th and next sections of the Act regulate the duties of the Metropolitan Board of Works; and by the 135th section the main sewers are vested in the board, with full powers to make and maintain other sewers in connection therewith. By the 136th section plans of those sewers are to be submitted to the commissioners of her Majesty's works. By the 137th and subsequent sections down to the 144th, the Metropolitan Board of Works are empowered to make and do various things and matters with reference to those works, and jurisdiction; and by the 144th section they are enabled to take by agreement or gift any land, rights in land or property, for their special purposes.

By the 150th section the Metropolitan Board of Works and district boards and vestries are authorised to make any works, and buy or take on lease any land, or any right or easement in or over land, and to effect other things for the purposes of their Act; but they are prohibited from carrying water by supply pipes into any house or factory for domestic, manufacturing, or commercial purposes. By the 151st section certain provisions of the 8 & 9 Vict. c. 18, are incorporated with the Metropolis Local Management Act: by the 152nd section the powers conferred by the Lands Clauses Act, "of purchasing and taking lands otherwise than by agreement," are incorporated, but in a qualified manner only, with the powers of that Act (18 & 19 Vict. c. 120); and no land, or right or easement in or over land, for the purposes of that last-mentioned Act, is to be compulsorily taken by the board without the sanction of a principal Secretary of State. And by the 153rd section previous notice of the intention of the board to take such land, right or easement, with plans of the proposed works, are to be given to or furnished for the information of the owners, lessees, or occupiers of such property, together with the terms on which any compensation for damage is to be assessed.

The case now came on upon a motion by the defts. to dissolve the injunction.

R. Palmer, Q.C. and Charles Hall, in support of the motion, contended that by the 135th section of the 18 & 19 Vict. c. 120, the defts. had full power to execute any works within the terms of the section (making compensation for the damage occasioned thereby), without first purchasing or obtaining the land or easement therein, under the sects. 150-153; although such works might involve the taking of such land or easement. The latter clauses were only enabling clauses, giving the Board of Works the right of taking the land itself, where they preferred that course to proceeding under the 135th section. They relied upon the case of The North London Railway Company v. The Metropolitan Board of Works, 1 John. 405, as precisely in point, and in their favour. The defts. were willing to pay whatever compensation might be awarded to the plt. in respect of the damage occasioned to his property by their works.

Cole, Q.C. and F. S. Draks appeared for the plt. and opposed the motion. The construction put upon the statute by the other side would virtually enable the defts. to confiscate any property they might require for the purposes of their Act, which could not have been the intention of the Legislature. If the defts. required a legal easement in land they must pay the owner for it.

The MASTER of the ROLLS.—I have no doubt that this case is governed by the decision of Wood, V.C., which was referred to in the argument. If it had not been for that decision, I should have thought it right to give further consideration to this matter. It appears to me, however, obvious that the 135th section of the Metropolis Local Management Act gives powers to the defts. distinct from those contained in the 150th and two following sections. The 135th section, by itself, gives powers to the Metropolitan Board of Works to make sewers as they may think fit. If that section is controlled by any subsequent one, it must be so by clear and distinct words. But the only controlling word which I can see in the subsequent sections, is the word "easement." Now I very much doubt whether, when that word "easement" was mentioned in the Act, it was intended to refer to the kind of easement stated in this bill. I must own the inclination of my opinion is that it was not so intended, and so also Wood, V.C. seems to have thought, after hearing a most elaborate argument. The exercise of the optional right given to the defts. by the statute, of proceeding under the 135th or other sections, does not involve any question of honesty or dishonesty on their part, but depends upon this consideration whether, when contemplating the making of the sewer, they can make it without affecting the surface, or may find it more convenient to drive it nearer to that, in which case it may be necessary for the board to take the land and buy the easement. If that latter course should ultimately be the one which the board must pursue, they would have to proceed under the 150th and 153rd sections: if the former, under the 135th section, and the only question then would be one of damages. Those, however, are to be settled according to their amount by the justices of the peace, or by arbitration, under the provisions of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act. That being so, the defts. appear to me to have acted within the powers given to them by their Act, and as they are quite willing to pay such compensation for the damages sustained by the plt. as may be settled; and as their plan does not involve the taking of the land or the easement under the 150th and 153rd sections, there is no necessity for them to proceed by public advertisement. The defts. have only done what they are justified in doing, and the injunction must be dissolved with costs.

COURT OF COMMON BENCH.

DRAPER (app.) SPERRING (resp.)

Nuisance—Sheep droppings in market—Liability of owner of tolls to remove—18 & 19 Vict. c. 121, s. 2 and 12—"Recurring nuisance."

The app. claiming to be the owner of markets and fairs held in the town of Crewkerne, erected a sheep-pen in front of a house in the said town and took toll for sheep exposed for sale therein. After the removal of the sheep their droppings and urine remained, and a complaint was lodged against app. by the resp. (who was inspector of nuisances) in respect thereof. For fifty-five years and upwards the inhabitants of the houses before which the sheep were penned had been in the habit of clearing away the droppings, and app.'s servants never cleared them away, except in cases where houses before which the pens were placed were unoccupied.

The justices being of opinion that app. was a person by whose "permission or sufferance" the nuisance was created, and that the ground inclosed by app. with hurdles for the aforesaid purpose was "land or tenement" within the meaning of sect. 12 of the Nuisances Removal Act, and that the nuisance was recurring nuisance within the said Act, issued their prohibition to the app.

Held, on appeal, that the justices were right.

This was a case by way of appeal from the decision of justices, stated for the opinion of this court under 20 & 21 Vict. c. 43, s. 2.

CASE.

At a petty sessions holden at Crewkerne, in and for the division of Crewkerne, in the county of Somerset, on the 16th day of June 1860, before us the undersigned two of Her Majesty's justices of the peace in and for the said county, the following complaint was heard and determined by us the above-named parties being present. The complaint was preferred by John Sperring, the inspector of nuisances appointed by the nuisances removal committee for the tything of Crewkerne (hereinafter called the resp.) against Martha Draper (hereinafter called the app.) under sect. 12 of the Act 18 & 19 Vict. c. 121, being the Nuisances Removal Act for England 1855, and charged that on the 3rd day of April 1860 there was on a certain pavement or causeway situate in Sheep-market-street, in Crewkerne aforesaid, in front of a messuage or dwelling-house in the possession of Sidney Morris Cornelius, an accumulation or deposit of dung or filth caused by the penning and standing of sheep on the said pavements on Saturday the 31st day of March previously, being a market-day at Crewkerne aforesaid, and that the same not being washed or cleared away after the removal of the said sheep, was a nuisance or injurious to health, and that the said nuisance was caused by the act or default of the app., by reason that the app. used or occupied the said pavement or causeway for letting pens for the standing of sheep thereon, for hire and reward, and had on the said 31st day of March allowed sheep to stand and be penned for a long space of time on the said pavement or causeway, and had received tolls and profits in respect thereof, and that in consequence of such standing or penning the said dung or filth was deposited and left, and the app. had neglected to cleanse or wash away the same and to remove the said nuisance so thereby created, and that although the said nuisance had since the said 3rd day of April been removed or discontinued there was reasonable ground for believing that the same or the like nuisance was likely to recur on the said premises. And upon such hearing we, the said justices, considering that the cause of nuisance complained of did exist on the said pavement on the said 3rd day of April and was caused by the act, permission, or default of the said Martha Draper, and that though the same had since been removed a similar nuisance would be likely to recur on the said premises, did by our order in writing bearing date the said 16th day of June prevent the app. from allowing to remain on the said premises after the sheep are removed therefrom, any dung or filth which shall be deposited or left on the said premises by reason of the penning or standing of such sheep thereon, being by the act or sufferance, and for the profit of the said Martha Draper. And if our said order of prohibition should be infringed, then we did authorise and require the said nuisance removal committee for the tything of Crewkerne aforesaid, from time to time to enter upon the said premises, and to do all such works, matters and things as should be necessary for carrying the said order into full execution according to the said Nuisances Removal Act for England 1855. And whereas the app., being dissatisfied with our determination upon the hearing of the said complaint, as being erroneous in point of law, hath, pursuant to sect. 2 of the stat. 20 & 21 Vict. c. 43, applied to us in writing within three days after the said determination to state and sign a case setting forth the facts and grounds of such our determination as aforesaid, for the opinion thereon of Her Majesty's Court of Common Pleas at Westminster. Now therefore we, the said justices, in compliance with the said application of the app. and the provisions of the statute aforesaid, do hereby state and sign such case as aforesaid as follows:—At the hearing of the aforesaid complaint, it was proved on the part of the plt., the resp. in this appeal, that on the 3rd April last a nuisance existed on the pavement facing and adjoining a house in Sheep-market-street, Crewkerne, occupied by Sidney Morris Cornelius, in consequence of sheep having been penned there on the previous Saturday, the 31st March, which was a market day; that the nuisance was occasioned by sheep droppings and urine, and was likely to recur; that on the said 31st March the sheep were put up by Richard Lacey, who was employed for the purpose by Thomas Taylor March, the market bailiff of the app.; that the app. claims to be the owner of the markets and fairs held in the town of Crewkerne, and to receive tolls in respect thereof; that on the said 31st March the said market bailiff received of a Mr. Harding a toll of 5s. for 100 sheep, part of which were penned on that day on the aforesaid pavement; that the hurdles used for penning the said sheep belonged to the app.; that on large market days the pens extend over the pavement two or three feet into the road, and on fair days eight or nine feet into the road; but on the said 31st March only the pavement and a shallow open gutter between the pavement and the road were inclosed by the pens; that there is on market days an accumulation of droppings from cattle in the public road where they are exposed for sale; that there are surveyors of the highways of the parish of Crewkerne; that toll is always paid to the market bailiff for sheep sold in the market, even if they are not penned; that the toll for sheep is 1s. a score at the markets and 1s. 6d. at the fairs. It was contended on the part of the deft., the app. in this appeal, that there is no occupation or ownership in the app, within the Nuisance Removal Act for England 1855; that the toll is inherent to the market claimed by the app., and that she is entitled to an easement; that it is not a messuage, land, or tenement, within the interpretation clause of the Nuisance Removal Act; that the right or privilege of a fair or market is only a temporary easement, and the enjoyment of it is not an occupation within the 2nd section of the Act; that there being surveyors of the highways, and the nuisance being on the highway, the liability to cleanse it is between the occupiers of the houses and the surveyors of highways; that the toll is payable in respect of the animal, and not for the occupation of the land. It was proved on the part of the app. that a toll of 1s. a score was payable for sheep penned at the market, even not sold; that for the last fifty-five years and upwards the droppings of the sheep have been swept away by the occupiers of the houses against which the sheep were penned, and that the market bailiff never cleared them away, except any that might be on the pavement which come against the house of the app. in Sheep-market-street, and these droppings be only cleared away at such times as the house was unoccupied; that sometimes the droppings have been allowed by the occupiers of some of the houses to remain until washed away by the rain; that occasionally some of the occupiers of houses in Sheep-market-street, instead of employing their own servants to clean the pavement after a market, paid a man to do it.

DRAPER v. SPERRING.

The poor-rate book for the parish of Crewkerne was put in, and in it the app. was rated as follows:—

Names of Occupiers.	Name of Owner.	No. relating to Men.	Name or Description of Property Rated.	Situation.	Quantity.	Estimated Rental.	Rateable Value.
					P.	£. s. d.	£. s. d.
Draper, Martha.	Herself	14A	The Market house and Market place.	Market place.	33	00 0	40 0
			The Markets and Fairs of Crewkerne.	Duke William Barton, West-street.	...	1 10
		273A	Hurdle House.	1 1

We being of opinion that from the app.'s exercise of the right she claims to erect hurdles on a market day at Crewkerne aforesaid, and to inclose ground with such hurdles without the consent of the resp.; and from her allowing the ground when so inclosed to be used for the purpose of penning sheep, during the time of which penning the ground could not be used as a highway, and the nuisance having been created in consequence of the penning of sheep, she is a person within the 12th section of the Nuisances Removal Act for England 1855, by whose permission or sufferance the nuisance arose, and the ground while so inclosed is land or tenement within the meaning of the Act. And we therefore gave our determination against the app. in the manner above stated.

The question of law arising on the above statement is, whether the ground over against the house of Sidney Morris Cornelius in Sheep-market street, Crewkerne, which the app. inclosed with hurdles on the 31st March last, was whilst so inclosed land or tenement within the meaning of the Nuisances Removal Act for England 1855; and whether the inclosing of the ground by the app. and her allowing sheep to be penned thereon rendered her liable under the 12th section of the same Act, as the person by whose act, default, permission, or sufferance the nuisance arose; whereupon the opinion of the Court of Common Pleas is asked on the said question of law, whether or not we the said justices were correct in our determination as aforesaid, and as to what further should be done or ordered by the said court in the premises. (Signed.)

Welsby for the app.—By the interpretation clause of the Nuisances Removal Act 1855, 18 & 19 Vict. c.121, s. 2, the word "owner," includes any person receiving the rents of the property in respect of which that word is used from the occupier, or as trustee, or agent, or receiver, or sequestrator, or who would receive the same if such property were let to a tenant, &c. The word "premises" extends to all messuages, lands, or tenements, whether open or inclosed, whether built on or not, and whether public or private, &c.; the word "person," and words applying to any person or individual, apply to and include corporations, whether aggregate or sole, &c. The justices have acted under sect. 12, which enacts, that where a nuisance is ascertained by the local authority to exist, or where the nuisance in their opinion did exist at the time when the notice was given, and although it since may have been removed or discontinued is in their opinion likely to recur or be repeated on the same premises or any part thereof, they shall cause complaint thereof to be made before a justice of the peace, who shall thereupon issue a summons requiring the person through whose act, default, permission, or sufferance the nuisance arises or is continued, or if such person cannot be found or ascertained the owner or occupier of the premises on which the nuisance arises, to appear before any two justices, who shall inquire, &c., and if it be proved to their satisfaction that the nuisance exists, or did exist at the time when the notice was given, or if removed and discontinued, &c., that it is likely to recur, or to be repeated, the justices shall make an order in writing, &c., on such person, owner, or occupier, for the abatement, or discontinuance, or prohibition of the nuisance as hereinafter mentioned, and shall also make an order for the payment of all costs, &c. There is here an absolute right for persons to resort to the market bringing their sheep to be penned and sold; and there is no occupation or ownership by the app. within the meaning of the Nuisances Removal Act. Neither can it be said this is a recurring nuisance, for app. is not at all liable. How can the lord of the market be said to be a person who is owner of the premises where the alleged nuisance was committed, so as to be liable to remove it. The app. is not an owner within the definition laid down in the interpretation clause. The only act of the app. was to put up by an agent the hurdles for penning the sheep. There was no evidence that she has the soil; so she is not an owner within the meaning of the statute. She may be a lessee of the franchise, but that is not enough.

Kingdon for the resp.—It should be observed that the justices do not leave for the court the question whether this was a recurring nuisance, therefore it will not be necessary to enlarge upon that point, nor contend that this is "land" within the meaning of the statute. This is a case where the grantor of a market places sheep in a particular spot; the market is not in any particular spot within the limits included in the franchise. [WILLES, J.—There is strong evidence that highways are subject to market rights.] The nuisance is clearly by the act, default, permission, or sufferance of the app., and she is therefore within the words of the 12th section. He referred to Curwen v. Salkeld, 3 East, 538.

Welsby, in reply, referred to a learned note by Parke, B., in The Mayor, &c. of Macclesfield v. Chapman, 12 M. & W. 18.

ERLE, C.J.—I am of opinion that the adjudication of the justices in this matter was right, and it ought therefore to be affirmed. The case shows that this was a complaint against the app., as owner of a market. She set up hurdles and penned in sheep before the houses of the resp., and thus caused the nuisance. The contention by the resp. is, that the app. having the profits from the sheep-pens, should also bear the duty of removing the nuisance arising from the sheep so penned. The right to the soil and occupation is not before us. The pen is erected on the pavement. With regard, then, to the first question put by the case to the court, I should answer it in the affirmative, holding that this was, whilst inclosed by hurdles, "land or tenement" within the 12th section of the Act. The justices also put a second question, which was, whether the inclosing of the ground by the app. and her allowing sheep to be penned thereon rendered her liable as the person "by whose act, default, permission, or sufferance" this nuisance arose. Now, the pavement in question is part of the street, and app. chooses to pen sheep in front of resp.'s house. She is called on to remove the nuisance caused by the droppings of the sheep, and has not done what she was called on to do, but disputes her liability to do it. This is, in my opinion, substantially a recurring nuisance. I am not satisfied the justices were wrong, our judgment will be therefore for the resp.

WILLES, J.—I am of the same opinion. At first I was strongly disposed to accede to Mr. Welsby's argument that the app. was entitled to enjoy her right according to the grant under which she is authorised to receive tolls from persons bringing their sheep into the market. But on considering the facts more closely that does not appear to be the correct view. The app. claims a right, not only to take tolls, but to make an inclosure; what she did was to make an inclosure by hurdles, in which sheep were penned, and so a nuisance arose in that place. It is quite clear that the owner was not bound to provide that accommodation, and the persons bringing their sheep to the market have no right to it except by permission of the owner of the market. It is an exercise of proprietary right, distinct from the general franchise. [His Lordship referred to Mayor of Northampton v. Ward, 2 Stra. 1238.] I think the app. comes within the language of the statute, which may even interfere to some extent with the enjoyment of the franchise. As to the argument that the owner of a franchise ought not to be interfered with in such a case as this, I do not think that has any force.

BYLES, J.—I am also of the same opinion; our judgment will therefore be for the resp.

Vagrant Act, 5 Geo. 4, c. 83, s. 4—"Running away"—Desertion of children by mother—5 Geo. 1, c. 8, s. 1.

A widow residing in a borough applied to and obtained from the relieving officer of the union an order for the admission of herself and her two children, aged seven and four years, to the workhouse; and in the evening of the same day she took them to the outer gate of the workhouse, rang the bell, placed the order of admission in the hands of the eldest child, and went away leaving the children at the gate; they were admitted to the workhouse, and continued chargeable; their mother did not leave the neighbourhood, but returned to the borough and there resided.

On complaint made under the Vagrant Act, 5 Geo. 4, c. 83, s. 4, the justices dismissed the information on the ground that the facts proved did not amount in law to a "running away and leaving her children chargeable" within the meaning of the Act:

Held, on appeal, that the justices were right.

This was a case stated by way of appeal from the decision of justices, for the opinion of this court, under stat. 20 & 21 Vict. c. 43, s. 2.

CASE.

It was proved before us that the resp., being a widow, on the 1st Nov. 1860, applied to the relieving officer of the said union, and obtained an order for the admission of herself and her two children, aged respectively seven and four years, into the workhouse of the said union, situate at the borough aforesaid, and at six o'clock in the evening of the same day she took them to the outer gate of the said union workhouse and rang the bell; she then put the order for admission into the hands of her eldest child, and immediately went away, leaving the said two children at the gate. The porter who answered the bell saw a woman (who was proved to be the resp.) in the act of leaving the said gate, and that when he arrived at such gate she had left, and the two children were waiting there with the said order for admission to the said workhouse, and that he thereupon admitted the said two children, and they continued in the workhouse and chargeable to the common fund of the said union from that time until the time of hearing the said complaint.

The resp. did not, either at or after the time of the alleged offence, leave the said borough where the said workhouse is situate, and where she usually resides.

The ground of our determination to dismiss the said complaint was, that the facts proved against the resp. did not amount in law to the offence charged in the information.

The question for the opinion of the Court of C. P. is, whether the leaving of her children by the resp. under the circumstances proved, was a running away and leaving her children chargeable within the meaning of the Vagrant Act, 5 Geo. 4, c. 83.

Given under our hands at the borough of Cambridge aforesaid, the 21st day of Nov. 1860.

Couch for the appa.—The words of sect. 4 of the Vagrant Act, 5 Geo. 4, c. 83, are, "Every person running away and leaving his wife, or his or her child or children chargeable, or whereby she or they, or any of them, shall become chargeable to any parish, township, or place, shall be deemed a rogue and vagabond, and be liable to imprisonment and hard labour for a time not exceeding three calendar months." The words "running away" in that section cannot be construed literally. The substantial words are "leaving his wife, or his or her child or children, chargeable" to the parish. [BYLES, J.—She simply goes to her house; she does not conceal herself within the borough.] It is submitted that the younger of the two children, which is within the age of nurture, cannot be separated from the mother even with her consent; and here she has deserted it. The overseers were bound to receive and relieve the children, and if the court should hold that this statute does not apply, the parish authorities could have no power to compel the mother to be with her children and take care of them: (Reg. v. The Inhabitants of Birmingham, 5 Q. B. 210.) By applying for and obtaining an order for admission to the union workhouse, the mother made the workhouse the home of herself and children; and she therefore did run away and leave them; it is not necessary that she should leave the parish. In stat. 5 Geo. 1, c. 8, s. 1, the words used are different from those in the Vagrant Act; they are "divers persons run or go away from their places of abode into other countries or places, and sometimes out of the kingdom, leaving their wives or child or children, and some mothers run or go away leaving a child or children upon the charge of the parish." Under that statute it has been held that the parent leaving or deserting the child or children, must leave the parish: (Burn's Justice, tit. "Poor," 106.)

No counsel appeared on behalf of the resp.

ERLE, C.J.—I am of opinion that the decision of the justices in this case, dismissing the complaint, was right; and it must therefore be affirmed. The words of the statute were evidently directed against parents who "run away," leaving their children chargeable to the parish. I think that, to satisfy the meaning of the statute, the parent must have absconded, or have concealed herself, or absented herself by going a long distance. Here the woman, residing at her accustomed abode, obtained an order for the admission of herself and two children to the union workhouse; she took the children there, and left them with the order of admission in their hands at the gate of the workhouse, and then returned to her usual residence. I do not think this enough to justify her conviction under the Vagrant Act, as a person who runs away within the meaning of the 4th section. The judgment of the court will therefore be for the resp.

BYLES, J.—I am quite of the same opinion. I cannot help thinking that the Act Mr. Couch referred to expresses legitimately the same meaning as the section of the Vagrant Act now under consideration.

Judgment for the resp.

Wednesday, May 22.

HOLLIDAY v. THE VESTRY OF ST. LEONARD, SHOREDITCH.

Liability of vestrymen acting under the Metropolis Management Act (18 & 19 Vict. c. 120,) for the acts of their workmen.

The surveyor appointed by the vestry to look after the highways in the parish employed men to do some work in one of the streets, who left some stones in such a position as to cause the cart in which the plt. was driving to be upset, whereby he sustained serious damage:

Held, in an action against the vestrymen, that, as they were acting gratuitously as a public body, and did not participate in the wrong done, they were not liable.

This was an action brought against the vestry of Shoreditch for damage done to the plt. by reason of some stones being left in one of the public streets in that parish, which caused a cart in which the plt. was riding to be upset.

The declaration stated that the defts., on the 12th Sept., in a certain street called Shaftesbury-street, in the parish and county aforesaid, laid, put and placed a quantity of stones on and above the level of the surface of the said street, and wrongfully, carelessly and negligently suffered and permitted the same to be left and remain in the said street, on and above the level of the surface thereof, during the night, the same being a dark one, without a sufficient or any light or signal at or near to the said stones, to cause the same to be seen by persons driving in and along the street, and without having any watchman or person to take care of the same, and without having any board or protection, and without taking any reasonable or proper means or precautions to prevent the said last-mentioned persons from driving against or upon the said stones, and being injured thereby, and by means of the premises, the plt., who was then riding and being driven in a cart in the said street on the said night was driven, and the said cart ran against and came into collision with and upon and against the said stones, and the deft. was cast and thrown from and out of the said cart, down to and upon the ground, and was much hurt, bruised, wounded and injured, and was put to expense, to wit, 150*l.*, in and about endeavouring to get healed, &c.

Pleas:—Not guilty.

The action was tried before Erle, C.J. and a special jury, at the sittings after last Hilary Term, when the verdict was found for the plt., leave being reserved for the defts. to move to enter a verdict for themselves, or a nonsuit, on the ground that there was no evidence to support the verdict, and also that there was no evidence to show that the defts. were liable.

A rule having been obtained accordingly,

Shee, Serjt. showed cause.—The question is, whether the surveyor was not the servant of the parish, and as such, whether he did not employ the workmen; if he was, then this comes within the rule of law that where a person employs men to do any act, and damage occurs thereby, the person so employing is liable, and the vestry are therefore liable: (Ruck v. Williams, 27 L. J. 357, Ex.) Then as to there being no funds out of which damages could be paid, it does not follow that because the Act does not show out of what funds

HORWOOD v. POWELL.

[BAIL.

the damages are to be paid, that therefore there is no liability: (Kendal v. King, 17 C. B. 483; The Southampton and Itchen Bridge Company v. The Local Board of Health of Southampton, 28 L. J. 41, Q.B.)

Francis and Galway followed on the same side.—The case of Scott v. The Mayor of Manchester, 2 H. & N. 41, is a direct authority. There an action was brought against the defts., a municipal corporation, who were empowered by Act of Parliament to construct gas-works and supply gas, for damage done to the plt., the declaration alleging that they employed workmen to lay down the pipes, who so negligently conducted themselves that a piece of metal was projected against the plt., and it was held that the defts. were liable. Surely, then, it must be equally of advantage to the parish of Shoreditch that their roads should be well paved as to the inhabitants of Manchester to have gas, and therefore that case is an authority to show the defts.' liability. In Jones v. Bird, 5 B. & Ald. 837, which was an action brought against the defts., who were employed under the Commissioners of Sewers, Bayley, J. says: "It is contended that the defts. are protected, if they acted bonâ fide and to the best of their skill and judgment; but that is not enough. They are bound to conduct themselves in a skilful manner, and the question was properly left to the jury to say whether the defts. had done all that any skilful person could reasonably be required to do in such a case." They also cited Laugher v. Pointer, 5 B. & C. 547; Alston v. Scales, 9 Bing. 3; Davis v. Curling, 8 Q. B. 226; Gibbs v. The Liverpool Docks, 3 H. & N. 164; Whitehouse v. Fellowes, 4 L. T. Rep., N. S., 177; and distinguished between the present case and Hall v. Smith, 2 Bing. 157; Harris v. Baker, 4 M. & Sel. 27; Sutton v. Clarke, 6 Taunt. 29; Boulton v. Crouther, 2 B. & C. 703; Overton v. Freeman, 11 C. B. 867.

Raymond (Watkin Williams with him) in support of the rule.—In 1 Chitty on Pleading, 87, 7th edit., it is said that trustees and commissioners acting gratuitously in the execution of Acts of Parliament for the benefit of the public, and entrusted with the conduct of public works, are not liable for an injury occasioned by the negligence or unskilfulness of workmen and contractors necessarily employed by them in the execution of the works. I do not know whether they contend that this proposition is not law, or that the present case does not come under it. Hall v. Smith is an authority in our favour, and has been recognised in the later cases, and is mentioned in Humphreys v. Mears, 1 Man. & Ry. 187; and was also recognised in the case of Duncan v. Findlater, 6 Cl. & Fin. 894, and shows that what is laid down in Chitty is good law. They also cited Lane v. Cotton, 1 Ld. Raym. 647; Whitfield v. Lord Despencer, 2 Cowp. 754.

ERLE, C.J.—I am of opinion that this rule should be made absolute. The action was brought for injury sustained by the plt. by reason of his being upset out of a cart over a heap of stones left on a highway, by workmen employed by the surveyor who was appointed by the defts. (the Vestry of Shoreditch) to look after the highways in the parish, and the question of law which we have to decide is, whether the members of the vestry are liable for the damage. The vestry acted under the provisions of an Act of Parliament. The men employed by their surveyor did the wrong which occasioned the damage. Now it is agreed on both sides that if a private individual had left these stones he would have been liable, and the question is, whether persons who give their services gratuitously are liable, they being ignorant of the work which was going on, and not giving their attention to it. I am of opinion that they are not. The principle has been recognised, and the law has for a very long time been established, that persons discharging a public duty and acting gratuitously, and having no share or participation in the wrong done, are exempted from liability. In the case of Hall v. Smith, which is the first of a long string of authorities, it was held that commissioners entrusted with the conduct of public works were not liable in damages for an injury occasioned by the negligence of artificers employed under their authority, provided they were doing that which by Act of Parliament they are empowered to do. And this has been held to be the law down to the case of Duncan v. Findlater, which was an appeal to the H. of L. against the decision of the Court of Session in Scotland; and the H. of L., reversing the decision of the Scotch Court, held that trustees appointed under a public road Act were not responsible for an injury occasioned by the negligence of the men employed in making or repairing the road. In that case the Lord Chancellor, referring to the difference between the Scotch and English law, said, "It is important to preserve the law of Scotland where it really differs from that of England; but where that is not so, and no principle of conflicting law is involved, it is a reproach to any system of law that there should be in matters of the same kind, and on subjects of the same legislation, a different rule of construction applied in one part of the kingdom and in another." Mr. Williams has drawn our attention to the fact, that in the above case no evidence whatever was offered to connect the trustees directly with the cause of the accident in question, and that being so, that the H. of L. held that they were not liable. This is the law under which the present defts. come, they being guilty of no personal default. As to the case of the Itchen Floating Bridge Company v. The Local Board of Health of Southampton, which was relied upon by the plt., the distinction between that and the present case is, that in that case it was implied by the Act under which the board acted that an action for a wrong might be maintained against them. Then the Manchester case does not fall within the rule, as there, although the defts. who were a municipal corporation, individually acted gratuitously, yet the corporation and the township derived a profit from the carrying on of the works. The case of Gibbs v. The Trustees of the Liverpool Docks is somewhat similar, as although it was not there said that the trustees had any profit, yet vessels coming into the docks had to pay tolls, and as the trustees received money for the accommodation, they had so right, with the knowledge of the docks being in dangerous condition, to allow them to continue so. As to the cases of Boulton v. Crouther and Sutton v. Clarke, they show that where persons do that which they are authorised to do by Act of Parliament, although damage accrues to private individuals in consequence of such acts, yet as long as they are not guilty of negligence they are not liable, and it would be a contradiction to empower them to do certain things and then say they should not do them; but in exercising such powers they must take care not to act wantonly or oppressively. The case of Duncan v. Findlater is an express authority that persons acting gratuitously as a public body are not, as in the present case, to be held responsible, and I think therefore that this rule should be made absolute.

HORWOOD (app.) v. POWELL (resp.)

Turnpike toll—Exemption from under sect. 1 of the 4 & 5 Vict. c. 33—Travelling more than 100 yards on the road—When toll demandable.

If a person is travelling along a turnpike-road with an animal upon which a turnpike toll is payable, he is liable to pay the toll, though he has not travelled 100 yards thereon, if in fact he is then about to travel more than that distance:

[RAIL.]

TAYLOR v. CARR AND PORTER.

[BAIL.]

The resp. came upon a turnpike-road at a distance of twenty yards from a toll-gate, and when he arrived at the gate, toll was demanded which he refused to pay, and passed through without paying it, he at the time intending to travel more than 100 yards upon the said turnpike-road, and afterwards actually travelling more than that distance. Upon an information against him for forcibly passing through the gate without paying the toll, the justices refused to convict, on the ground that he was not liable to pay, not having passed 100 yards on the road when the toll was demanded:

Held, that the justices were wrong, and that the toll was payable as demanded.

This was a case stated under the 20 & 21 Vict. c. 43, upon a refusal by justices to convict the resp. for passing through a turnpike-gate without paying the toll. The case was as follows:—"At a petty sessions, holden at Bicester, in and for the two divisions of the hundred of Ploughley, in the county of Oxford, on the 4th Jan. 1861, an information preferred by Richard Horwood, hereinafter called the app., under sect. 41 of 3 Geo. 4, c. 126, charging for that the said Richard Powell, of the parish of Brill, in the county of Buckingham, butcher, did, on the 12th Dec. last, at the parish of Piddington, in the said county of Oxford, forcibly pass through a certain toll-gate, on a certain turnpike-road there, called the Piddington toll-gate, on a certain turnpike-road there situate, called the Thame and Bicester turnpike road, with a horse and cart, in which the said Richard Powell was then riding, without paying the toll, to wit, the sum of 4 $\frac{1}{2}$ d. then and there payable for the said horse, by reason whereof the payment of the said toll was then and there avoided, contrary to the statute in such case made and provided, was heard and determined by us the said justices respectively being then present, and upon such hearing we dismissed the said information. And whereas the app. being dissatisfied with our determination upon the hearing of the said information, as being erroneous in point of law, hath, pursuant to sect. 2 of the said statute 20 & 21 Vict. c. 43, duly applied to us in writing to state and sign a case setting forth the facts and grounds of such our determination as aforesaid for the opinion of this court, and hath duly entered into a recognisance as required by the said statute in that behalf. Now, therefore, we the said justices, in compliance with the said application and the provisions of the said statute, do hereby state and sign the following case:—Upon the hearing of the information it was proved on the part of the plt. that the turnpike toll-gate in question was duly erected under the local Act, 1 Vict. c. 46, intituled "An Act for repairing and maintaining the road from Aylesbury to Thame, and from Thame to Oxford, Shillingford, Postcombe, and Bicester in the counties of Buckingham and Oxford," and that a toll of 4 $\frac{1}{2}$ d. for a cart drawn by one horse was authorised by that Act, and that a table of tolls was duly put up at the toll-house, and that on the 12th Dec. 1860 the deft. Richard Powell came with a cart drawn by one horse upon the turnpike-road, the Thame and Bicester turnpike-road, at the point A on the accompanying plan [a plan was annexed], which is twenty yards only from the turnpike-gate. That the toll of 4 $\frac{1}{2}$ d. was demanded of him by the collector at the gate, which toll he refused to pay, and forced the gate open and passed through, and afterwards passed upwards of 300 yards along the turnpike-road towards the point B on the plan. It was contended on the part of the deft. that he refused to pay toll on the ground that when it was demanded of him he had not passed 100 yards on the turnpike-road. The Act 4 & 5 Vict. c. 33, s. 1, enacts, that no toll shall be demanded for any horse, &c., which shall only cross any turnpike-road, or shall not pass above 100 yards thereon. We the said justices were of opinion that to render a person liable to pay toll at a turnpike-gate, he must have passed above 100 yards upon the said road before he came to the gate where the toll is demanded, and that, as the deft. had only when he came to the turnpike-gate where the toll was demanded, passed twenty yards on the turnpike-road, he was not liable to toll, and that the distance he passed along the road after going through the gate did not render him liable to pay toll at that gate. We gave our determination against the app. The question of law arising on the above statement for the opinion of the court is, whether the deft. was liable to pay toll demanded of him at the toll-gate in question.

McIntyre, for the app., contended that the resp. did not bring himself within the words of the exemption, "or shall not pass above one hundred yards thereon," which do not mean, shall not pass 100 yards before the toll is demanded; that the toll is payable in respect of his travelling more than 100 yards upon the road, and not because he happens to pass through a turnpike-gate.

Joyce, for the resp., argued that the toll is payable only at the gate, and that the resp. not having, when he was at the gate, travelled more than 100 yards upon the road, no toll was then demandable from him. [WIGHTMAN, J.—It is quite clear that you ought to pay the toll somewhere.] He might be liable to pay it ultimately, but the question is, was he bound to pay it, having travelled on the road only twenty yards? I submit, however, that he was, under the circumstances, not liable to pay it at all. [WIGHTMAN, J.—If he comes to the gate and says, "I am going to such a place, which is not 100 yards upon the road," the gate-keeper will take the toll at his peril.] The trustees of the road can protect themselves by erecting gates wherever they please upon the road.

WIGHTMAN, J.—It appears to me that, giving a reasonable construction to the statute, the justices were wrong, and that the resp. was liable to pay the toll. He was prima facie liable, unless he can show that he comes within the exemption. Now he says that because he has not travelled 100 yards before coming to the gate, he is not liable. It is agreed, however, that he was going more than the hundred yards. If he really was not about to pass more than 100 yards, he was not liable; but here in fact he was about to pass more than that distance. The exemption clause does not state, "or shall not pass above one hundred yards thereon before coming to the gate." If it did, it would be different. The justices were wrong, and the toll was payable.

Case to be remitted to the justices, with the opinion of the court that they ought to have convicted.

TAYLOR (app.) v. CARR AND PORTER (resps.).

Master and servant—Rules of a factory—Violation of—Loss of wages—Complaint before justices.

The app. was a weaver in the mill of the resps., and subject to the following rules, viz.:—1. "A fortnight's notice will be required from all persons working in this establishment previous to leaving their employment, and a fortnight's notice will be given by the proprietors to all persons before discharging them (except for bad conduct or wilful neglect), and any person or persons leaving without giving such notice will forfeit all their wages in hand, and also be liable to be proceeded against according to law. 2. Any person or persons absenting themselves on account of sickness or any other cause, must immediately give notice to their overlooker; in default thereof all wages then earned will be forfeited, and such person or persons will be liable to lose their work." The app., on Monday, the 6th Aug., asked leave of absence for half a day, which was granted, on condition that she got another weaver in her place, and she promised to be at her work at six o'clock the next morning; she did not return until after that time, and she had not provided a competent person to supply her place. Upon her applying for her wages (8s. 2d.) then due, they were refused, on the ground of being forfeited under the above rules; and upon the resp. being summoned before justices for the recovery of the amount, they, being of opinion that the app. had acted contrary to the above rules, dismissed her complaint:

Held, that the justices were wrong in dismissing the complaint for such cause, for that the app. had not violated the said rules.

This was a case stated under the 20 & 21 Vict. c. 43, upon a dismissal by justices of a complaint for wages. The case was as follows:—

On the 27th Nov. 1860 the defts. Carr and Porter were summoned before two justices for the borough of Blackburn, for that they, the said Carr and Porter, had refused and did then refuse to pay to Mary Taylor the sum of 8s. 2d. as the wages justly due and owing to the said Mary Taylor for work and labour done and performed by her for the said Carr and Porter, and at their request.

Upon the hearing of the said complaint Mary Taylor stated that on Monday the 6th Aug. she asked leave of absence for half a day, which was granted, on condition that she got another weaver in her place. She promised to be at her work at six o'clock next morning, but did not return until dinner time, when she was told that another weaver had taken her place. Complainant admitted that she was acquainted with the rules, and had read them. On the following Saturday she applied for her wages, which were refused. On the Wednesday night following she again applied to the overlooker for the wages that were due, and it was agreed that the wages should be paid after she had given a fortnight's notice, and served the fortnight. The week at this mill ends on Wednesday night, and complainant stated that it was arranged that she might return to her looms at the beginning of any week. She went the following day (Thursday) at half-past one, and was not allowed to work. For the defence it was stated that complainant did not get a competent person to take her place, and that leave was consequently refused, and she went without leave; that the looms had been kept standing a great part of the time when she was absent; that complainant was in liquor when she did return on the following Tuesday afternoon; and that on the following Wednesday week it was agreed that she should return the next morning (Thursday) at six o'clock, but she did not come until half-past one in the afternoon. The complainant contended that her case did not come within the meaning of rule 1 (absenting herself without notice), and that she was entitled to the wages that were owing at the time she left work. The magistrates having heard the complaint, and being of opinion that the complainant had acted contrary to the rules of the said mill in the first instance by absenting herself from half-past twelve o'clock on Monday, the 6th, until half-past one o'clock on Tuesday the 7th Aug. last, and in the second instance by not acting in accordance with her agreement, and entering on her work at six o'clock in the morning on Thursday the 16th Aug. aforesaid, decided that she was not entitled to recover the said sum of 8s. 2d., and dismissed the case accordingly.

The rules referred to in the case were as follow:—

"1. A fortnight's notice will be required from all persons working in this establishment previous to leaving their employment, and a fortnight's notice will be given by the proprietors to all persons before discharging them (except for bad conduct, or wilful neglect), and any person or persons leaving without giving such notice will forfeit all their wages in hand, and also be liable to be proceeded against according to law.

"2. Any person or persons absenting themselves on account of sickness or any other cause, must immediately give notice to their overlooker; in default thereof all wages then earned will be forfeited, and such person or persons will be liable to lose their work.

Torr for the app.

Kaye for the resp.: (Ex parte Baker, 26 L. J., M. C. 173; Ridgway v. The Hungerford Market Company, 3 Ad. Ell, 171.)

The arguments sufficiently appear in the following judgment.

Carr. ad. vok.

May 7.—WIGHTMAN, J.—The question in this case is, whether the decision of the magistrates determining that the applicant in this case, Mary Taylor, was not entitled to her wages by reason of some breach by her of the rules which are to be observed by all persons employed in the works of Carr and Co., was a right decision or not. Now the justices appear to have decided the case partly upon the rules and partly upon the breach of the agreement. The justices say, "We the undersigned justices having heard the case, and being of opinion that the complainant had acted contrary to the rules in the first instance by absenting herself from the Monday at half-past twelve till Tuesday, at half-past one; and in the second instance for not acting in accordance with the agreement in pursuing her work on Tuesday, she is not entitled to her wages," and they dismissed the case. With regard to the second ground, it was not argued or suggested that for the mere breach of duty in not returning at six in the morning of Tuesday she was not entitled to her wages; but it was put only, and argued only, upon the question of her case falling within the first or second rules to be observed; and it was contended that under the particular circumstances of this case, she was disentitled to recover her wages, on the ground that on Monday, the 6th Aug., she had asked leave of absence for half a day, which had been granted on condition that she should appoint another weaver in her place, and she promised to be at work at six the next morning. It was said the leave was withdrawn, because she had not fulfilled her promise in getting a weaver to perform her duty. But there is not one of either of these rules that applies to the case of a person absenting without leave, unless it be the first rule, which says a fortnight's notice will be required before leaving. It appears to me that that rule does not apply to an occasional short absence, but to leaving the establishment entirely. A fortnight's notice would hardly be required in the case of a person intending to go out for a few hours. It appears to me, if the case comes within either of the rules, it must come within the second rule, and that is, that any person absenting himself must give notice to the overlooker, or such person will be liable to lose that week. Now, in this case, it is said that the absenting herself without giving notice was by absenting herself from half-past twelve on Monday the 6th, until half-past one on Tuesday the 7th. Now there is no doubt there was ample notice given of her intention to go. No doubt about that; and it seems to me the question will here arise upon her non-attendance at six o'clock on the morning of the next day, when she was to have returned, and did not return. These, no doubt, are exceedingly stringent rules, because they deprive the persons who have earned their wages of the benefit of them; and preclude them from receiving them in case of a breach, which it was said this was, in not coming in at the time to receive her wages. Now, it is said.

BAIL.]

REG. v. THE INCUMBENT, &c. OF GOOLE, YORK.

[Q. B.]

independently of the rule, there was a ground upon which she might also lose her right to the wages she had already earned, and that is that for her misconduct. She had been discharged; and, no doubt, if guilty of misconduct, she might be discharged; and if discharged before the completion of her work she would not be entitled to any part of her wages, because the work was not complete. Ridgway v. The Hungerford Market Company was cited. It seems to me that case, and the principle upon which it was decided, is hardly applicable to this case, because that was a case where the wages were to be paid by time; and if the time was not fulfilled, they were not earned. But here the wages are not in respect of time, but of piece-work—work done; and “time” is only applicable to the time of payment and to the service rendered. Therefore it seems to me that that case is not applicable to this, which relates to the absenting herself from half-past twelve on Monday until half-past one on the Tuesday. Now it was a question, so far as the absenting herself on Monday was concerned, whether she had or not left. One question of fact would be whether they had refused her leave or not after they found she had provided an insufficient person to act for her? But assuming they did, it seems to me the question, under the second of these rules, is not whether she went without leave, but whether she went without notice. Any person absenting himself on account of sickness or any other cause must immediately give notice to the overlooker, and in default of notice will forfeit his right. No doubt there was ample notice given that she was going. What penalty she might incur otherwise than under these two rules, that is not a question for us now to consider. Undoubtedly, it may be, the master is fully justified in refusing to take her on afterwards; but it seems to me that from half-past one o'clock on Monday and the rest of the day she can hardly be said to have gone without notice to the overlooker. She went with full and ample notice. But then it was in the course of the argument suggested by Mr. Kaye, that independently of that she was to have returned at six in the morning, and she did not return till half-past one. It appears to me that that was a continuous absence; that she had never returned to her employ, and absented herself; for if she left at half-past one on the Monday and stayed out not until six o'clock in the morning of Tuesday, but until half-past one of that day, and if in the first instance she had given notice of the first part of the time during which she was absent, that would suffice for the purpose of entitling her to the wages, notwithstanding the rule, though no notice was given of the second absence, the continued absence from six o'clock in the morning till half-past one on that day. That being the question, it is taken as one continued absence. There was then notice given to the overlooker; then she overstayed the time she had agreed to in any view of the case; but still it appears there was no want of notice within the meaning of the rule. Therefore, on that ground, it seems to me the decision of the magistrates was wrong in this case, and they ought not to have dismissed it. It does not fall within either of these rules; and it was not argued that it came within any other, except the general rule I have adverted to, which only applies to time and not to piece-work. The magistrates, therefore, were not justified in dismissing the case.

The case to go back to the justices with the opinion of the court that they ought not to have dismissed the complaint.

REG. v. THE INCUMBENT AND CHURCHWARDENS OF THE PARISH OF GOOLE IN THE COUNTY OF YORK.

Vestry—Election of churchwardens—Refusal of chairman to take show of hands—Manner of polling—Affidavits—Mandamus.

At a vestry meeting to elect churchwardens, after the election of the rector's churchwarden, two persons were proposed and seconded for the office of parishioners' churchwarden. The chairman refused to take a show of hands, but proceeded to write down the names of the ratepayers present, and the number of votes they were entitled to, and then declared A. B. duly elected. The proceedings were protested against and a poll demanded, but the chairman refused to grant one, and declared the meeting at an end.

The Court refused to grant a mandamus commanding the election of a churchwarden, it not appearing by the affidavits that any one had by the irregular proceedings been prevented from voting, or that any practical injustice had resulted from it.

This was a rule calling on the Rev. David Bell, incumbent of Goole, in the county of York, and the churchwardens of the said parish, to show cause why a writ of mandamus should not issue, commanding them to convene a meeting of the inhabitant ratepayers duly qualified to vote at the election of churchwardens of the said parish, and proceed to the election of churchwardens of the said parish for the remainder of the present year.

It appeared from the affidavit in support of the rule that at a vestry meeting of the ratepayers of the said parish, held pursuant to notice on the 5th April 1861, for the purpose of electing churchwardens, the Rev. D. Bell, the incumbent, in the chair, after the chairman had elected his own churchwarden, two persons, named John Luddington and John Humble Rockett, were proposed and seconded by ratepayers of the said parish to fill the office of the other churchwarden for the ensuing year; whereupon the Rev. D. Bell refused to take an election by show of hands, although requested so to do by several ratepayers, but proceeded to write down the names of the ratepayers present, and the number of votes each was entitled to, and declared the said John Luddington to be duly elected churchwarden. Jesse Dalby, a ratepayer, protested against these proceedings, and, immediately after the result of the election was declared by the chairman, demanded a poll, but he refused to grant one, and declared the meeting at an end. Sufficient time was not allowed to enable all the ratepayers of the said parish (in all about 750) to vote at the said election, the whole polling having been completed in about an hour. No application was made to adjourn the meeting.

Temple, Q.C. (P. Thompson with him) showed cause against the rule.—The meeting for the election of churchwardens was duly called by a proper notice, and a poll was well and sufficiently taken; when a poll was demanded by Dalby, the election was at an end, and the result declared. [CROMPTON, J.—At a polling every voter must have an opportunity of being present. Cleasby.—That is the point]. (St. Saviour's, Southwark, Lane's Rep. 2; Prideaux on Churchwardens; Parson's Counsellor.) [CROMPTON, J.—In the election of a member of Parliament, for instance, if all agree to elect one man, it is not necessary to proceed to a poll, but if there is a poll it must be kept open the proper time. COCKBURN, C.J.—The writ of mandamus is a discretionary writ, and, unless Mr. Cleasby can show us that some persons who wished to vote have been prevented, we should not exercise our discretion by granting the writ.] A reasonable time would have elapsed when all present had voted and no one else came up, and in the present case no adjournment was demanded. [COCKBURN, C. J.—The adjournment was a matter to be decided by the chairman.] The affidavits do not say there were other voters who were desirous of coming to vote, and who would have come and voted if there had been an adjournment. It must be shown that some one was prevented from voting: (Reg. v. Rector, &c., St. Mary, Lambeth, 8 Ad. & Ell. 356.) [COCKBURN, C. J.—The difficulty is, was this a poll at all, or was it merely substituted for a show of hands? CROMPTON, J.—Was there any real poll? There might be a polling of those present, but not of the whole parish.] Those present were prima facie the parish for the purpose of voting; 58 Geo. 3, c. 69, s. 3, shows that the poll is properly taken of the persons then present.

Cleasby, Q.C. in support.—Whether a poll was taken at all; and if taken, whether it was sufficiently taken, that is the question at issue? When a poll is taken, every person must have a reasonable opportunity of exercising his right to vote. The chairman is bound to grant a poll when demanded, and the proper course then is to adjourn, and appoint a subsequent day to hold it: (Campbell v. Maund, 5 Ad. & Ell. 865.) [COCKBURN, C. J.—I find no authority for saying there should be an adjournment; on the contrary, in 12 Ad. & Ell., Lord Denman says, the poll should be held immediately.] When a poll is granted there should be reasonable opportunity given for all to attend. [COCKBURN, C. J.—The difficulty is, that your affidavits do not show that any one really was prevented from voting.] At all events they show illegality. [BLACKBURN, J.—If there is no injustice done, but the manner of voting was a mere irregularity, ought we to grant this, which is a discretionary writ?] King v. The Consistorial, &c., Court of Winchester, 7 East, 573; there a mandamus was granted, the closing of the poll having been four o'clock on the second day, and the number of electors 180. [BLACKBURN, J.—There, de facto, people were kept out.] In Wood v. Baker, the poll was kept open three days, and it was held not long enough. Here the closing of the poll at the end of an hour was clearly illegal.

COCKBURN, C.J.—I entertain no doubt that the proceedings adopted by the rector were irregular. He appears to have proceeded per saltum in taking a poll at once, without having first proceeded to a show of hands, and afterwards proceeded to take a poll in the usual manner; and if we could see that any practical mischief would arise, I should have thought that we ought to have directed a fresh election; but the granting of the writ now asked for is discretionary with the court. Now the affidavits do not profess to communicate to us that any ratepayer was prevented from giving his vote by the course taken by the rector, or that any injustice arose from it; and I can perfectly understand that the majority of the ratepayers were indifferent, for it seems that in this parish it had been determined to raise the necessary amount for repairs by a voluntary effort without resorting to a rate, and therefore we may well suppose the majority of ratepayers were indifferent; for this reason I don't think we ought to grant a mandamus for the irregularity in the voting. On the whole, we think that the purpose of the applicant will be fully answered by our saying that we think it was substantially an irregularity, and that this is not the proper formal mode of proceeding; and if we could have seen that there had been any injustice or wrong the writ would have gone.

CROMPTON, J.—I think we should have granted this writ if any one had been excluded from voting; but this writ is discretionary, and a slip in the affidavits, which omit to show that any one has been prejudiced by this proceeding, seems to have brought the case within that of Ree v. Lambeth. I have a strong opinion that the parishioners had not the opportunity of voting they ought to have had; but, as no absolute injustice is shown, we do not think we should grant the writ.

CANDLISH AND ANOTHER v. SIMPSON AND ANOTHER.
Alcouse—Excise licence—Right to grant—Justice—County—Municipal borough.

Borough justices of a municipal corporation not having a separate court of quarter sessions have no power to grant licences to sell exciseable liquors by retail under the 9 Geo. 4, c. 61, but the county justices have such power exclusively.

This was an action brought by the plts. against the defts. for the recovery of 5*l.*, for that the defts. unlawfully disturbed and hindered the plts. in the exercise of their right and franchise as two of her Majesty's justices of the peace in and for the borough of Sunderland, in the county of Durham, the pl. John Candlish being also mayor of the said borough.

The municipal borough of Sunderland is one of the places named in schedule A., annexed to the Municipal Corporations Act, 5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 76, and consists of the parish of Sunderland-near-the-Sea, part of the township of Bishopwearmouth, and the townships of Bishopwearmouth Panna, Monkwearmouth, and Monkwearmouth Shore.

At the passing of the Municipal Corporation Act, the parish of Sunderland-near-the-Sea, and the said several townships of Bishopwearmouth, Bishopwearmouth Panna, Monkwearmouth, and Monkwearmouth Shore, formed part of the north petty sessional division of Easington ward, in the county of Durham, and even at the passing of the said Act, and thence hitherto, and have been and still are rated to the several rates and assessments levied and assessed by her Majesty's justices of the peace in and for the county of Durham upon the several parishes and townships within and comprising the said county, except the rate levied for the maintenance of the police of the said county.

By an order of general quarter sessions, made the 18th Oct. 1841, under the Act 9 Geo. 4, c. 43, for the county of Durham, the said parish and townships forming the borough of Sunderland were, together with the townships of Burdon, Dawdon, Ford, Fulwell, Hylton, Ryhope, Silksworth, Seaham, Southwick and Tunstall, formed into a petty sessional division of Easington ward, and by another order of general quarter sessions, made on the 3rd Jan. 1859, for the county of Durham, the said townships, with the exception of Dawdon and Seaham, were, with other townships, formed into the Seaham petty sessional division of Easington ward. With this exception, the Sunderland petty sessional division now remains as formed by the order of the 18th Oct. 1841. No separate court of quarter sessions has ever been held in and for the borough of Sunderland, nor has there ever been any gaol or house of correction in the said borough.

From 1836 downwards to the present time the council of the borough have appointed various persons successively to act as high constables in and for the said borough. On the 15th Sept. 1836 a separate commission of the peace was, for the first time under the provisions of the Act 5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 76, granted by his late Majesty to the said borough, and ever since that time justices assigned to act as justices of the peace in and for the said borough have continually been appointed under renewed commissions, and such justices have acted as such in and for the said borough, and are hereafter called "The Borough Justices." The usual petty sessions in and for the borough was, after the grant of the said commission of the peace held by the mayor and other borough justices, and other justices being justices of the peace acting in and for the county of Durham, on each day in the week until the year 1842, when the council of the borough erected a police-court as required by the Act 5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 76, s. 100. Subsequent to this the mayor and other borough justices have held their petty sessions on each day in the police-court, and at the same sessions certain of the justices for the county of Durham, acting in and for the Sunderland division of Easington ward, several of whom are also in the borough commission, have acted with the mayor and other borough justices, there being sixteen justices in the commission for the borough, of whom nine are also acting county justices.

The usual petty session in and for the said north division and the said Sunderland division of Easington ward respectively were previous to and after the grant of the borough commission of the peace held every Saturday, in the justice-room of the Exchange-buildings, until the erection of the police-court in 1842, and have since that time been holden in such police-court.

The justices so acting are hereinafter called "The County Bench of Justices."

Informations against publicans licensed for houses situated in the borough for offences committed by them contrary to the tenor of their licences have always been adjudicated upon by the justices sitting daily at the police-court in petty sessions for the borough, such justices being as aforesaid, besides the mayor of the borough, those justices who are in the commission as well of the said borough as for the said county, and those who are in the commission for the borough only, and those who are in the commission for the county only, and the court so formed is hereinafter called "The Borough Bench of Justices."

On the 24th Aug. 1837 the Borough Bench of Justices held a general annual licensing meeting in pursuance of the Act 9 Geo. 4, c. 61, specially for the said borough (the precept of holding such meeting having been directed to the borough high constable), and granted alehouse licences for the borough, and from 1837 to 1850 inclusive, held such meetings and granted such licences to persons applying for the same.

On the 27th Aug. 1851 the County Bench of Justices acting in and for the Sunderland petty sessional division held at the police-court in Sunderland a general annual licensing meeting, in pursuance of the Act 9 Geo. 4, c. 61. The said borough justices and county justices did not hold in that year separate licensing meetings, but held one court only, at which the mayor of the borough presided, and all applications for licences to keep inns and alehouses within the borough of Sunderland were heard and adjudicated upon by the court at which the said borough justices and the said county justices acted and voted. At this meeting none of the alehouse licences granted were signed by the justices who were justices only for the borough, but by the justices for the county, and all such licences showed on the face of them that they were granted by the justices of the county of Durham acting in and for the Sunderland division of Easington ward. This mode was adopted by the then borough justices, because doubts were suggested to them as to their right to hold a separate licensing meeting for the borough. The same course was pursued in 1852, 3, 4, 5, 6, 7 and 8, with this exception, that the county justices refused to allow the mayor of the borough to preside while the bench were hearing applications for licences within the borough, and under these circumstances, and in consequence of the said doubts, the mayor and borough justices considered themselves as virtually excluded, and ceased to attend the licensing meetings convened by the county justices.

On the 18th June 1859 the county justices acting in and for the Sunderland division of Easington ward, by their precept in writing bearing date that day, and directed to the high constable of the Sunderland division of Easington ward, appointed the 27th Aug. at eleven o'clock to be the day and hour, and the police-court Bishopwearmouth to be the place, for holding the general annual licensing meeting under the Act 9 Geo. 4, c. 61, for the division, which division included the borough of Sunderland as before mentioned. No appointment for a general annual licensing meeting for the borough was made for the borough by name, but the appointment was made in general words for the division, and due notices of such meeting were given and served by the high constable of the division according to the provisions of the Act 9 Geo. 4, c. 61.

On the 29th July 1859 the said borough bench of justices, by their precept in writing dated that day, and directed to the high constable of the said borough, appointed the said 27th Aug. at eleven o'clock of the forenoon to be the day and hour, and the said police-court to be the place, upon and in which the general annual licensing meeting under the said Act, 9 Geo. 4, c. 61, in and for the borough of Sunderland, should be held, and Joseph Stainsby acting as high constable for the said borough, caused due notice of such meeting to be given and served according to the provisions of the said Act.

On the day and at the hour last aforesaid, at the said police-court, the plt. John Candlish being then as aforesaid mayor of the said borough, and the plt. Joseph Brown being a justice of the peace for the borough only, with certain other justices acting in and for the said borough, and being duly qualified for the purpose according to the said Act, 9 Geo. 4, c. 61, and then and there sitting as the justices of the borough bench, took part in holding, according to appointment, a general annual licensing meeting for the borough, and together with such other justices for the said borough granted several alehouse licences, and but for the acts and claims of the defts. would have continued to hold such meeting and to grant other alehouse licences in pursuance of their right and in execution of their duty as justices of the peace in and for the borough.

The defts. being justices in and for the said county of Durham, and being there with other justices of the county bench acting in and for the said Sunderland division, present in the said police-court, prevented the plt. and other borough justices then present from holding the said meeting, and required and compelled them to desist, and the defts. and other county justices claimed to be themselves as county justices exclusively entitled to hold the meeting. The defts. and the other county justices present then and there proceeded to hold and held a meeting as a general annual licensing meeting in and for the said Sunderland division, and the defts. and the other county justices excluded the plt. and the other borough justices from, and would not suffer the plt. and the other borough justices present to take part in, the said meeting, or vote in determination of the questions raised thereat. The plts. and the borough justices present then read in court, and entered in their minute-book, a protest against the county bench of justices granting or having a right to grant any licences for keeping inns and alehouses within the borough, but notwithstanding this protest the defts. and the other county justices heard and adjudicated upon a great number of applications by persons living in the said borough for licences to keep inns and alehouses, and grant such licences to a great number of them.

The defts. say that, acting for themselves and the other county justices, under the circumstances stated in the case, they were justified in their acts.

The question for the Court is, under the circumstances above stated, had either the county or borough justices exclusive jurisdiction for the purpose of granting alehouse licences for the borough of Sunderland? If the court should be of opinion that the county justices had such exclusive jurisdiction, then judgment of non pros. shall be entered for the defts. without costs of suit. If the court should be of opinion that the borough justices had such exclusive jurisdiction, or that they and the county justices had concurrent jurisdiction, then judgment is to be entered for the plt. for 5*l.* without costs of suit.

Manisty (D. Seymour with him) for the plt.—It is contended on behalf of the plt. that the borough justices have either a concurrent jurisdiction with the justices of the petty sessional division, or that they have exclusive jurisdiction to grant licences, under the 9 Geo. 4, c. 61, within the borough of Sunderland. The 9 Geo. 4, c. 43, regulates the creation of petty sessional divisions of a county. Then the 9 Geo. 4, c. 61, an Act of the same session of Parliament, in the first section enacts, "that in every division of a county, and in every hundred of every county not being within any such division, and in every liberty, division of every liberty, county of a city, county of a town, city and town corporate in England, there shall be annually holden a special session of the justices of the peace, to be called the general annual licensing meeting," &c. And in sect. 2, "That in every such division or place as aforesaid there shall be holden twenty-one days before each such annual meeting a petty session of the justices acting for such county or place, for the purpose of appointing the time for the annual meeting," and the justices are to direct their precept to the high constable of the division or place for which such meeting is to be holden; and the section then enacts what he is to do. This shows that the justices of a town corporate are to have power to appoint a general annual licensing meeting for the borough, a town corporate being one of the places specified in sect. 1. [CROMPTON, J.—But the petty sessional divisional justices have also similar authority, as there is no non intromittant clause in the borough commission of the peace; and then it comes to the old case of Rees v. Sainsbury, 4 T. R. 451, which decided that whichever set of justices first appoints the licensing meeting acquires the jurisdiction so as to exclude the others.] On the other side it is contended that the borough justices have no jurisdiction to grant alehouse licences unless the corporate town has a separate court of quarter sessions; but no reason is assigned for this limitation, and the statute does not require it. [WIGHTMAN, J.—It must be a corporate town which has justices of the peace acting for it. COCKBURN, C.J.—Both sets of justices seem to come within the terms of the section, and they would therefore have concurrent jurisdiction.] Sect. 7 enacts that whenever at any of the meetings for any liberty, &c., or town corporate there shall not be present at least two justices acting in and for such liberty, &c., or town corporate, it shall be lawful for the county justices acting adjoining to such liberty, &c., or town corporate, to act within such liberty or place, and with the justices thereof, for the purpose of granting or transferring licences, &c. [CROMPTON, J.—That section was absolutely necessary in places in which the commission of the peace has a non intromittant clause.] In Brown v. Nicholson, 5 O. B., N. S., 468, it was held that an alehouse licence granted by borough justices was good, and in that case Reg. v. Dale, 22 L. J. 44, M. C.; 1 Dears. 37, was cited.

Lush (A. Liddell with him) for the defts.—The true construction of 9 Geo. 4, c. 61, is submitted to be, that the borough justices, acting in and for a town corporate, have jurisdiction only when a separate court of quarter sessions exists. In Reg. v. Dale that was held to be the true construction of the Act. All the machinery required by 9 Geo. 4, c. 61, for the purpose of carrying out the Act, cannot exist except in towns having a separate court of quarter sessions. By sect. 2 the justices are to direct their precept to the high constable of the division or place. There is no such officer in a borough not having a separate court of quarter sessions. [CROMPTON, J.—By sect. 37, the interpretation clause, "high constable" includes any person acting as such.] (James v. Green, 6 T. R. 228; Weatherhead v. Drury, 11 East, 168.) Sect. 21 cannot be carried out except in a town corporate which has a separate court of quarter sessions; so also sects. 22, 26, 28 and 33 point to the same construction. In Brown v. Nicholson it was found as a fact in the case that it had always been the custom for the borough justices in Maidenhead to grant such licences for the borough. It is manifest that it was not intended by 9 Geo. 4, c. 61, to give the two sets of justices concurrent jurisdiction.

COCKBURN, C. J.—Although by the 1st section of 9 Geo. 4, c. 61, it would seem to be clear that both sets of justices are within its terms, and therefore that they might have concurrent jurisdiction, yet the subsequent sections show that the machinery for carrying out the entire Act is wholly wanting in a town corporate, unless it possesses the requisite officers, deriving their authority from the court of quarter sessions. The borough of Sunderland does not appear to be such a corporate town which has such officers as the Licensing Act requires for carrying out its provisions.

Manisty was heard in reply.

DAY v. HEMINGS.

*Printing presses—Registering with the clerk of the peace—Necessity for—*39 Geo. 3, c. 79, s. 23—7 & 8 Vict. c. 71, s. 11.

By the 39 Geo. 3, c. 79, s. 23, any person having any printing press is to cause notice thereof to be given to the clerk of the peace acting for the county, stewarty, riding, division, city, borough, town, or place where the same shall be intended to be used . . . under a penalty of 20*l.* for keeping or using such press. By the 7 & 8 Vict. c. 71, s. 11, the quarter sessions for the city of Westminster are abolished, and all the duties of the officers thereof are transferred to the county of Middlesex. To an action for work and labour (printing) brought by a printer carrying on business in Westminster, the deft. pleaded, thirdly, that the printing was done after the passing of the above Acts, and that the plt. had not delivered any notice to the clerk of the peace for Middlesex; fourthly, that the printing was done after the passing of the 39 Geo. 3, c. 79, and that the plt. had not delivered any notice to the clerk of the peace for the city of Westminster:

Held, upon demurrer, that the pleas were bad, as each plea should have negatived that notice was given neither to the clerk of the peace for the city of Westminster, nor to the clerk of the peace for Middlesex.

Semble, that the pleas would have been good if properly pleaded.

This was a demurrer to the third and fourth pleas. The declaration was for money payable by the deft. to the plt. for goods sold and delivered, and for work and labour done and materials provided, and money paid by the plt. to and for the deft., at his request; and for money payable by the deft. to the plt. for the deft.'s use and occupation by the plt.'s permission of certain rooms and apartments or chambers of the plt.'s; and for money found to be due from the deft. to the plt. on accounts stated between them.

The third plea stated "that the alleged work and labour was done as and in composition and presswork by the plt. as a printer, and as and in a certain printing press of the plt., and by and with certain types for printing of the plt., and not otherwise, to wit, within the city of Westminster, in the county of Middlesex, and the said materials alleged to be provided by the plt. consisted of divers quantities of paper printed upon by the plt. at and in the said press, and by and with the said types for printing of the plt., and not otherwise, to wit, within the city of Westminster, in the county of Middlesex, aforesaid; and the deft. further says, that the said work and labour, so consisting of composition and presswork as aforesaid, was so done, and the said materials, so consisting of paper printed on as aforesaid, were so provided after the expiration of forty days from the day of the passing of an Act of Parliament, entitled "An Act for the more effectual suppression of societies established for seditious and treasonable purposes, and for better preventing treasonable and seditious practices," and made and passed in the 39th year of the reign of our late Sovereign Lord King George the Third; and also after the passing of a certain other Act of Parliament entitled "An Act to amend an Act of the 39th year of King George the Third, for the more effectual suppression of societies established for seditious and treasonable purposes, and for preventing treasonable and seditious practices," and to put an end to certain proceedings now pending under the said Act, and made and passed in the second year of the reign of her Majesty Queen Victoria; and also after the passing of a certain other Act of Parliament entitled "An Act for the better administration of criminal justice in Middlesex," and made and passed in the eighth year of the reign of her Majesty Queen Victoria; that the plaintiff, having the said printing press and types for printing, did not at any time after the expiration of forty days from the day of the passing of the said first-mentioned Act, up to the day of commencement of this suit, cause a notice thereof, signed in the presence of and attested by one witness, to be delivered to the clerk of the peace acting for the county of Middlesex, where the same were intended to be used, or his deputy, contrary to the form of the statute firstly above mentioned, nor did the plt. at any time after the expiration of the said forty days as aforesaid obtain from the said clerk of the peace acting for the said county, or his deputy, a certificate in the form described in the schedule to the first-mentioned statute annexed, but the said plt., without having delivered such notice and obtained such certificate, and after the expiration of forty days next after the passing of the statute first above mentioned, kept the said printing press and types for printing, and used the same, to wit, in the said composition and presswork, and in printing the divers quantities of paper as aforesaid, contrary to the form of the statute in such case made and provided. The fourth plea stated the said alleged work and labour was done as and in composition and presswork by the plt. as a printer, and at and in a certain printing press of the plt., and by and with certain types for printing of the plt., and not otherwise, to wit, within the city of Westminster; and the said materials alleged to be provided by the plt. consisted of divers quantities of paper printed upon by the plt. at and in the said press, and by and with the said types for printing of the plt., and not otherwise, to wit, within the city of Westminster aforesaid; that the said work and labour so consisting of composition and presswork as aforesaid was so done, and the said materials, consisting of diver quantities of papers so printed upon as aforesaid, were so provided after the expiration of forty days from the day of the passing of an Act of Parliament, entitled "An Act for the more effectual suppression of societies established for seditious and treasonable purposes, and for better preventing treasonable and seditious practices," and made and passed in the 39th year of the reign of our late Sovereign Lord King George the Third; and also after the passing of a certain other Act of Parliament, entitled "An Act to amend an Act of the 39th year of King George the Third, for the more effectual suppression of societies established for seditious and treasonable purposes, and for preventing treasonable and seditious practices, and to put an end to certain proceedings now pending under the said Act," and made and passed in the 2nd year of the reign of her Majesty Queen Victoria; that the plt., having the said printing press and types for printing, to wit, within the said city of Westminster, did not at any time after the expiration of forty days from the day of the passing of the said first-mentioned Act of Parliament up to the day of the commencement of this suit, cause a notice thereof, signed in the presence of and attested by a witness, to be delivered to the clerk of the peace acting for the said city of Westminster, where the same were intended to be used, or his deputy, contrary the form of the statute firstly in this plea mentioned, nor did the plt. at any time after the expiration of forty days as aforesaid obtain from the said clerk of the peace acting for the same city, or his deputy, a certificate in the form prescribed in the schedule to the said first-mentioned Act annexed; but the said plt., without having delivered such notice and obtained such certificate, and after the expiration of the said forty days, kept the said printing press and types for printing of the plt., and used the same, to wit, in the said composition and presswork, and printing the said divers quantities of paper as aforesaid, contrary to the form of the statute in such case made and provided.

By the 39 Geo. 3, c. 79 (An Act for the more effectual suppression of societies established for seditious and treasonable purposes, and for the better preventing treasonable and seditious practices), it is by sect. 23 enacted, "That from and after the expiration of forty days from the day of passing this Act, any person having any printing press or types for printing shall cause a notice thereof, signed in the presence of and attested by one witness, to be delivered to the clerk of the peace acting for the county, stewarty, riding, division, city, borough, town, or place where the same shall be intended to be used . . . and every person who, not having delivered such notice, and obtained such certificate as aforesaid, shall from and after the expiration of forty days next after the passing of this Act, keep or use any printing press or types for printing . . . shall forfeit and lose the sum of 20/."

By the 7 & 8 Vict. c. 71, s. 11, the quarter sessions for the city of Westminster are abolished, and all powers in relation to them are transferred to the county of Middlesex.

Stretton (Chambers with him) now appeared in support of the demurrer, and contended that the third and fourth pleas were no bar to the action; for that, although by the 39 Geo. 3, c. 79, s. 23, a penalty was imposed upon the owner of a printing press if it is not registered, that fact would not render any work done by such press illegal: (Smith v. Mawhood, 14 M. & W. 452; Wetherall v. Jones, 3 B. & Ad. 221; Jackson v. Hudson, 11 East, 180; Bensley v. Bignold, 5 B. & Ald. 335; Taylor v. The Crowland Gas Company, 10 Ex. 293). [CROMPTON, J.—Here you did certain work, which the statute says you shall not do unless you register.] The work was legal in itself, though it may have been done by an illegal instrument. There is another objection. The third plea does not negative registering in Westminster pursuant to the 39 Geo. 3, c. 9, by the clerk of the peace of Westminster. If the plt. had registered his press with the clerk of the peace for Westminster before the 7 & 8 Vict. c. 71, it would have been sufficient. It is true that the fourth plea negatives registering with the clerk of the peace for Westminster, but it does not negative registering with the clerk of the peace for Middlesex, since the passing of the 7 & 8 Vict. c. 71; so that each plea taken by itself is bad upon this ground.

Grass, in support of the demurrer, was called upon to answer this objection. He contended that the plt. should have re-registered in Middlesex, and that the pleas sufficiently showed that there was no registration. [COCKBURN, C.J.—There is no provision that the printer shall re-register. CROMPTON, J.—Having once registered, the registration remains. You should have shown that he had not registered in either place. One plea will not help the other. You are squeezed between the two pleas.] Judgment for the plt.

SITTINGS AFTER EASTER TERM.

TOWNSEND (app.) v. READ (resp.)

Highway—Surveyor's accounts—5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 50, s. 44—Appeal from justices—20 & 21 Vict. c. 43, s. 2—Misconduct in drawing case for opinion of court.

A complaint was made before justices sitting in special sessions for highways by a person chargeable to the highway-rate, objecting to certain items in the accounts of the surveyor of highways under the 5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 50, s. 111. The justices examined the surveyor upon oath, and ultimately made no order respecting the items objected to, but signed at the foot of the accounts a verification, &c. The complainant appealed:

Held, that the case was within sect. 44 of the Highways Act, 5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 50, empowering the justices to hear the complaint and make such order thereon as to them should seem meet; and therefore an appeal lay to this court under 20 & 21 Vict. c. 43.

The court will not, on a mere suggestion by the app. at the argument that there has been misconduct or negligence in drawing a case, send it back to be re-stated or amended.

This was a case stated for the opinion of this court under 20 & 21 Vict. c. 43, by way of appeal from the decision of justices for the county of Wilts, sitting at special sessions. It appeared that the resp. was the salaried surveyor of highways in and for the parish of Swindon in the said county. On the 29th March 1860 he laid his accounts before the vestry, and afterwards on the same day before the magistrates in special sessions, and thereat, at the time of the verification of such accounts, the app. being a person chargeable to the highway-rate of the said parish, made a complaint against the resp. objecting to certain items in his accounts, under the 5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 50, s. 111. The justices heard such plaint and examined the resp. upon oath, and after adjourning the special sessions from time to time, till May 24, ultimately made no order respecting the items in question, but signed at the foot of the accounts a verification ordering that a sum of 15*l.* (another disputed item) "be struck out of such accounts, leaving a balance of 107*l.* 13*s.* 2*d.* due to such surveyor," which balance included the items now in dispute.

Macnamara for the app. — This case ought to be sent back to be re-stated or amended under sect. 7 of 20 & 21 Vict. c. 43. The case was drawn up by the clerk to the justices, who is the partner of the resp.'s solicitor. Complaint was made at the time of the manner in which the case was drawn. It is stated that these costs objected to were incurred for law proceedings without showing how. That is not sufficient; it ought to have been brought within sect. 111 of the Highway Act, 5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 50.

WILLIAMS, J.—I do not think the court can enter into the question you have suggested as to whether there has been misconduct or negligence in drawing the case; if we find the materials insufficient, we can send the case back to be amended, but not on a mere suggestion that it is improperly drawn.

Macnamara.—The other side will no doubt contend that this is a case which ought not to have been stated at all; but it is submitted that the case is, first, within the preamble to 20 & 21 Vict. c. 43; and, secondly, it is within the 2nd section of that Act: (Reg. v. The Justices of Cambridgeshire, 8 Dowl. 89.) It will be seen by the case that though the justices in reality made no order, they ultimately verified the accounts, adding "we do order that a sum of 15*l.* be struck out." There was obviously a decision by the justices in the matter, and thus the case is within the statute last referred to. But were this not so, and it were a fact that the justices had refused to adjudicate, that alone is a ground for appeal to this court. The point it is desired to raise, but which in reality the case does not raise, is that the costs have not been allowed by two justices or the vestry, as they ought to have been. (He referred to sect. 111 of the Highway Act, 5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 50, requiring that the expenses incurred by the surveyor should be agreed to.)

Phipson.—I do not at all object to the case going back to be re-stated on the merits.

KEATING, J.—We have no materials before us for deciding the point.

WILLIAMS, J.—We had better hear you on the preliminary objection.

Phipson referred to the preamble and sect. 2 of 20 & 21 Vict. c. 43. This is not a complaint or an information and complaint upon which justices have jurisdiction to act in a summary manner: (5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 50, s. 44.) It appears by the case that the resp. was examined upon oath before the justices, and that is never done in cases where they have power to adjudicate in a summary way: (Reg. v. The Justices of Leicestershire, 8 E. & B. 57; Reg. v. The Justices of Derbyshire, 1 E. B. & E. 73.) This was a discretionary tribunal to deal with a simple matter of account, with power given to it to examine the surveyor upon oath; it would have been an absurdity to give an appeal in such a matter. [KEATING, J.—If the statute 20 & 21 Vict. c. 43, does not give an appeal to the court in this case, it will fall short of the purpose for which the Legislature intended it.] The app. must show that this was a matter in which the justices had power to act summarily before he can bring it within that statute so as to have an appeal here: (Wheeler v. The Overseers of Birmingham, 30 L. J. 175, M. C.) [KEATING, J.—The words of the statute are large; they are "any matter," &c.] That means any matter where the justices have summary jurisdiction.

Macnamara in reply.—This is what is generally understood to be a case for the summary jurisdiction of magistrates. If deprived of this, the app. has no other remedy; he can only come here with a case: (Rex v. The Justices of Somersetshire, 5 B. & C. 816.)

WILLIAMS, J.—We think that the justices had jurisdiction to hear this case, and that the app. had a right to come here under sect. 2 of 20 & 21 Vict. c. 43. That Act is general in its language, enabling the courts at Westminster to act in assistance of justices of the peace by way of correcting any error they may have made, or by giving them advice as to what the law is in any information or complaint where there is "a hearing and determination by a justice or justices of the peace of any information or complaint which he or they may have power to determine in a summary way." Now, by sect. 44 of the Highway Act, 5 & 6 Will. 4 c. 50, it is enacted that any person chargeable to the highway-rate may make his complaint before justices of the peace sitting in special sessions, "and the said justices are required to hear such complaint, &c., and to make such order therein as to them may seem meet." So this case seems to fall within the very words of the Act of Parliament, for this is a complaint made by a person having a right to make complaint before justices sitting in special sessions, who have power to hear such complaint, and make such order therein as to them may seem advisable. As to the objection of insufficiency of statement of the case, let it be referred back to the justices for amendment.

WILLES, BYLES, and KEATING, JJ. concurred.

Case referred back for amendment.

COURT OF APPEAL IN CHANCERY.

Esqrs., Barristers-at-Law.

(Before the LORD CHANCELLOR (Campbell).)

Re WARD.

Coroner—Misbehaviour—Practice on removal of—23 & 24 Vict. c. 116.

When a precept is issued and a jury is summoned to attend the inquest, the coroner is bound to proceed with the inquiry, and cannot dismiss the jury without doing so.

The refusal to proceed with an inquest under such circumstances is a misbehaviour within the meaning of the stat. 23 & 24 Vict. c. 116.

On an order for the removal of a coroner from his office, the old practice still prevails of issuing the writs de coronatore exonerando and de coronatore eligendo at the same time.

This was a petition presented under the Act 23 & 24 Vict. c. 116, by certain freeholders and justices of the peace for the county of Stafford, the object of which was to obtain an order for the removal of Mr. Ward from his office as one of the coroners of the same county.

The petition stated that on the 4th Jan. last a jury was by the direction of Ward summoned to hold an inquest, at three o'clock p. m., at the Royal Oak Inn, at the town of Cannock, in Staffordshire, upon the body of a person of the name of Joseph Brindley, who had been found dead in his house situate in that town. That the jury summoned as aforesaid attended at the hour appointed, and that they waited until past five o'clock before Ward arrived at the inn. That he was drunk when he so arrived there, and refused (without giving a sufficient or proper reason for such refusal) to hold the inquest, and that in consequence thereof the said inquest which ought to have been held was never held; that the said Ward was on the 21st Jan. 1861 summoned and convicted before the justices of the peace for having been drunk at the time and place last mentioned, and adjudged to pay a fine of 5s. within one week, which fine had never been paid. That at the general quarter sessions holden at Stafford in and for the county of Stafford, on the 9th April last, an order was made by the justices of the peace then and there assembled "that the clerk of the peace do forthwith take the necessary steps to present a petition to the Lord Chancellor for the removal of Mr. Ward from his office of a coroner for the county of Stafford, on account of his having been convicted of drunkenness on the occasion of holding an inquest at Cannock, in the said county of Stafford." That by the Act of 23 & 24 Vict. c. 116, it is enacted that county coroners should be paid by salary instead of by fees, mileage and allowances; and by the 6th section of the same Act, it is enacted, that "it shall be lawful for the Lord Chancellor, if he shall think fit, to remove for inability or misbehaviour in his office any such coroner already elected or appointed, or hereafter to be elected or appointed." The petition then prayed the removal of Ward from his office as coroner, and for directions for the appointment of a new coroner in his place and stead. Affidavits were filed in support of the petition, and there was a great deal of conflicting evidence as to the sobriety of Mr. Ward at the time in question. It was suggested by Mr. Ward and his witnesses that the appearance of intoxication might have been produced by extreme cold, but that it certainly was not caused by drink.

Amphlett, Q.C. and C. M. Roupell appeared in support of the petition.

The LORD CHANCELLOR (without calling for a reply).

—This is a most serious case, and a very painful duty is cast on me. By the ancient law the L. C. had jurisdiction over coroners, and it was his duty to listen to any complaint that might be made against them in the discharge of their duty. By an Act passed in the twenty-third and twenty-fourth years of her Majesty's reign, c. 116, s. 6, there is a statutable enactment upon the subject, "It shall be lawful for the L. C., if he shall think fit, to remove for inability or misbehaviour in his office any such coroner already elected or appointed, or hereafter to be elected or appointed." I do not think that this leaves a discretion in the L. C. The proceeding having been instituted, he is bound to hear all the evidence on both sides, and unless it is clearly and satisfactorily proved that the charge has been substantiated, and that the coroner has been guilty of misbehaviour in his office, he has the pleasure of declaring "not guilty;" but if he is convinced judicially upon the evidence that there has been a charge which is made and is substantiated of misbehaviour of the coroner in his office, he is bound, according to the sacred oath he has taken, to find the charge to be substantiated and to remove the coroner from his office. This is a very ancient and important office in the realm of England. The coroner next to the sheriff is the most important civil officer in the county, and he performs the duties of the sheriff, when the sheriff is disabled from doing so, and there are peculiar duties ascribed to him, more particularly to inquire into the manner in which persons have come to their deaths, where there is any reason to suppose that that may not have been by natural means; and on that inquiry a jury being sworn, the jury have all the rights of a grand jury to find a verdict of murder, and on that finding the party accused may be tried, and may be sentenced to death. A charge has been brought against Mr. Ward, one of the coroners for the county of Stafford. Some complaint is made, which rather surprises me, of the hardship of the mode of dealing with this accusation. The petitioners have done as the Act of Parliament points out. They have made their complaint to the L. C. They, in their petition, which has been served on Mr. Ward in the clearest and most distinct manner, tell him what the charge is which he has to answer. He has had ample opportunity of bringing forward all the evidence that could be adduced in his favour, and I hope that sufficient weight will be given to all the evidence which he does adduce. Now the charge is, that one Joseph Brindley having died suddenly, and there having been a precept for an inquest, which was promptly and properly issued, and a jury being summoned to inquire into the manner in which Joseph Brindley came to his death, that Mr.

3 C

Ward was guilty of misbehaviour in his office in the manner in which he behaved when the jury had been assembled. The charge is, that he was then in a state of intoxication, and that then he refused to proceed to complete the inquest without any reason whatsoever, and from improper motives. Now, with regard to the intoxication, I must say that the weight of evidence seems to me to be considerably against him. There are the five jurymen, and the two witnesses who were to attend as witnesses at the inquest, who speak in the most decisive manner with regard to his being in a state of intoxication; and I must say that the conduct of Mr. Ward himself seems to me to give corroboration to that charge; for I cannot imagine that a man who was in possession of his intellectual faculties could have behaved so improperly as Mr. Ward did behave on that occasion. Well, then, the precept having been issued, I again say that, according to the law of England, the jury being assembled, it was the duty of the coroner to swear the jury, and to call all the witnesses that could be brought forward, and to inquire into the manner in which the deceased had come to his death. What is the reason that Mr. Ward, by his counsel, assigns for not then doing his duty? Why, that on his way from Stafford to Cannock he met some person, whose name he does not know, who told him there was no occasion for holding the inquest; and it is supposed, for that reason, he can honestly change his mind, and think that an inquest is no longer necessary. I cannot consider that, if he was really in the possession of his faculties, he could honestly have so conducted himself. But you have from the evidence, which I think is not contradicted, and which seems to me to be conclusive, that he gave another reason for it; he said, "I am now upon a salary, and I will not carry on the inquest in cases of this sort, in which the magistrates would have disallowed the fees;" rather intimating that, if he were still to receive fees, he would have gone on with the inquiry, but as he was now upon a salary which hardly enabled him decently to perform the duties of his office, that that inquiry should no longer proceed. I will say that a man who, if he was really in possession of his faculties, and they were not impaired by intoxication, could so put an end to an inquiry that had really been commenced, and ought to have been carried to its proper conclusion, has been guilty of misbehaviour in his office, and ought to be removed. I therefore am of opinion, and I give my judgment, that he has been guilty of misbehaviour in his office, and that he be removed from the office of coroner for the county of Stafford. There is not the slightest foundation for any imputation cast upon the petitioners. They are gentlemen of all parties and without any bias on their minds, and simply wishing to discharge their duty; and I must say that I am not in the slightest degree influenced by the conviction before the magistrates, but that I look at the evidence before me, and I do not look at any imputation that has at any period of time been brought against Mr. Ward.

Amphlett.—In Re Parnell there was a writ de coronatore exonerando, and a writ de coronatore eligendo, issued at the same time.

The LORD CHANCELLOR.—If that was the old form that will still be pursued.

THE ATTORNEY-GENERAL v. PASCALL.

Appropriation of funds subscribed in answer to general public appeals—Information.

Sums of money were raised by general public subscription, in answer to three printed circulars or "appeals," headed "Deplorable spiritual destitution," in the parish of Clerkenwell; and the first two of which set forth the names of trustees, of a committee, treasurers, secretaries and bankers. The first circular stated that the committee desired in the first instance to seek remedial measures for one section, viz. that of the north or Pentonville end of the parish; that the present appeal was for the north, and that the objects were, among others, to defray the expense of a new parochial Act of Parliament, to compensate the incumbent of Clerkenwell for any loss he might sustain by the severance of the Pentonville chapel of ease from the south end, to enlarge the chapel so as to supply, if possible, 1000 free sittings, to provide an endowment fund, and to erect a parsonage-house and schools. The second circular stated that the plans of the committee were so far altered that they now sought funds for at least three new churches, with an endowment fund, free sittings, schools, and parsonage-houses. The third circular stated the first object of the committee to be, "the erection of three new churches, the first to be erected in Pentonville."

Of the funds subscribed, part were employed in building schools, and establishing benefit societies, and the remainder was invested. A new church was in the course of erection in the Pentonville district, and a second was proposed to be built in the southern district of Clerkenwell:

Held, on the construction of the three circulars, that the fund (which was insufficient to complete the erection of the Pentonville church alone) ought to be applied towards the completion of the church in course of erection, and that no part of it ought to be devoted to the building of the proposed church in the southern district of Clerkenwell.

This information was filed by the Attorney-General at the relation of the Bishop of Ripon, the Bishop of Durham and the Hon. Arthur Kinnaird, against James Pascall, the Rev. Anthony Lefroy Courtenay, and the Rev. Robert Maguire.

In the year 1853 a printed appeal was extensively circulated in London and in the country, headed "Deplorable spiritual destitution. Clerkenwell Church Extension and Spiritual Relief Committee." It set forth the names of the Earl of Shaftesbury, of the relators, and of the Rev. Daniel Wilson as trustees of certain other persons as a committee, and of the deft. James Pascall as treasurer; and after referring to the extent of the population of the parish of Clerkenwell, and stating that the north and south wings of the parish, containing a population of 25,000, were as detached from each other as any two distant parishes in London—that at the north or Pentonville end there were 12,000, at the south or Holborn end there were 13,000—and referring to a local Act of Parliament to which the destitute condition of the parish was thereby attributed, and stating that the committee felt their inability to cope with difficulties so gigantic as a whole, and they therefore desired, in the first instance, to seek remedial measures for one section, viz. that of the north; that if the committee should thereafter be called, by an accession of personal or pecuniary aid, to act for the south as well as the north of the parish they would not shrink from the responsibility, but that the then present appeal was for the north, proceeded as follows: "The objects to be embraced are the following:—1. To defray the expenses of obtaining an Act of Parliament to supersede the existing one, obsolete and opposed to the requirements of the neighbourhood as it is: this is estimated at 500*l.*; 2. To compensate the incumbent for any loss he may sustain by the severance of the chapel of ease from the south end; 3. To enlarge the chapel so as to supply, if possible, 1000 free sittings for the poor; to provide an endowment fund for ordinary repairs; and to erect a parsonage-house; 4. To build Sunday, juvenile and infant schools, so much wanted by this large population." Subscriptions and donations were then solicited; and it was stated that the same would be received by the deft., the Rev. A. L. Courtenay, the officiating minister of the chapel of ease; by the deft. James Pascall, Esq., treasurer; by G. C. Steet, Esq., the hon. secretary, or by either of the bankers in the joint names of the trustees.

By an Order in Council, dated in April 1854, Pentonville was constituted an ecclesiastical district.

Pending the operations of the Church Building Commissioners to procure the severance of Pentonville from the rest of the parish, a second printed appeal was issued, headed similarly to the last, and setting forth the names of the same persons as trustees, committee, treasurer, secretaries and bankers respectively. It proceeded as follows:—"The committee beg to add that, their first appeal having fully explained why Clerkenwell stood still, by reason of the local Act, while other parishes were dividing and subdividing, deem repetition needless, especially as their concern is with the future. They stand pledged first to promote the severance of the north and south ends of the parish, and the erection of a church in Pentonville, in order to facilitate the assignment of districts throughout the parish. These plans are so far altered by the suggestion of influential friends, that they now seek funds for—1. The erection of at least three new churches; 2. An endowment fund for the same, as very many free sittings will be required; 3. Schools proportioned to the population; 4. The erection of parsonage houses;" and, after stating that all sums were lodged in the names of the trustees, and the expenditure was subject to their supervision," stated that subscriptions and donations would be received by the defts. the Rev. A. L. Courtenay, James Pascall, and G. C. Steet.

In the month of Aug. 1854 a third printed appeal was circulated, headed "Deplorable spiritual destitution of the parish of Clerkenwell," which stated that the committee now sought funds for—1. The erection of three new churches, the first to be erected in Pentonville; 2. An endowment fund for the same, as very many new sittings will be required; 3. Schools proportioned to the population; 4. The erection of parsonage-houses. It further set forth that the following had been accomplished during the preceding nine months:—1. Pentonville is now an ecclesiastical district or benefice, by the Act of her Majesty in Council, on the 7th April last. It now has its own incumbent, curate, wardens and other officers; and it is gratifying to know that the legal expenses at first contemplated have not been required, whereby a saving of from 500*l.* to 1000*l.* has been effected. 2. That noble institution, the Church Pastoral Aid Society, in consideration of the spiritual destitution and poverty of the district, has granted 100*l.* for a curate. 3. There is now the prospect of a site (at a cost of about 2000*l.* if the purchase could be completed shortly) for the church to be erected for this new district; as at present there is only a small chapel with 600 sittings (for a district of 12,000 souls), with no accommodation for the poor. 4. The subscription list already reaches to 1000*l.*" The appeal then stated that all sums received were vested in the names of the trustees therein mentioned, being the same persons as were stated to be the trustees in the first appeal, and that the expenditure was subject to their supervision.

The Rev. Daniel Wilson never accepted the trust; and the Earl of Shaftesbury retired.

In answer to the three appeals immense sums were contributed, and with the aid of a portion of the fund thus raised five new schools were established, additional services, scripture readers, bible and prayer-book depositories, a provident fund, a clothing club, a maternity society and other benefits; and in the year 1855 the residue of the funds was invested in the purchase of stock in the names of the relators and the deft. James Pascall, and such sum with accumulations amounted in June 1860 to 913*l.* 14*s.* 10*d.* Three per Cent. Annuities.

In the year 1854 the committee authorised their solicitors to treat with the Rev. Mr. Faulkner (since deceased), who was then the incumbent of the parish, as to the compensation which should be paid to him out of the fund for the loss sustained by him as incumbent from the severance of Pentonville from the parish of Clerkenwell. Upon the severance, the Rev. A. L. Courtenay was appointed the incumbent of Pentonville. He had paid 130*l.* out of his own resources to Mr. Faulkner as such compensation as aforesaid, and this sum he claimed to be reimbursed.

A new church was in the course of erection in the Pentonville district, the site of which had been conveyed to the Ecclesiastical Commissioners. Another new church was proposed to be built in Allen-street, in the southern part of the parish of Clerkenwell. The Rev. Mr. Courtenay claimed that the residue of the fund should (after repayment of the 130*l.* and interest to himself) be applied to the completion of the Pentonville church, as being the primary object for which the committee was formed and the appeals were circulated.

The deft. the Rev. Mr. Maguire claimed that one moiety of the fund should be applied towards the erection of the proposed new church in the southern district of Clerkenwell.

The money had been paid into court under an order of his Honour, and the information now prayed that a proper scheme might be settled for the application of the moneys. They were admitted to be wholly insufficient, after reimbursing Mr. Courtenay, to complete the building of the Pentonville new church.

Mr. Pascall, by his answer, said, he believed that there was really no necessity for a new church in the Pentonville district, the fact being that Pentonville chapel, of which Mr. Courtenay was incumbent, was but a very short distance from, and in the same district as, the said proposed new church. He also insisted that Mr. Courtenay had no right to be reimbursed the sum so paid by him out of the trust-fund; for Pentonville chapel was formerly a chapel of ease to the parish church; the incumbent of the parish did duty there, partly by himself and partly by deputy; and, on the arrangement for a severance of Pentonville chapel from the parish of St. James, Clerkenwell, it was arranged that Mr. Courtenay, who was the then deputy and afterwards the incumbent appointed on the severance, should take the whole of the pew rents of the chapel, and pay Mr. Faulkner 65*l.* per annum by way of compensation. He also submitted that a portion of the trust-fund ought to be applied for the benefit of the schools.

The Rev. R. Maguire, by his answer, said he believed that the statements in the first appeal, made with reference to the deplorable state of the parish of Clerkenwell, related exclusively to the southern part of the parish, and did not apply to the northern. He believed there was in fact really no necessity for the new church in the Pentonville district, as Pentonville chapel, where Mr. Courtenay officiated, was but a very short distance from and in the same district as the proposed new church. He believed that the site of this proposed new church in the southern district of Clerkenwell parish had been already purchased, and that the building would soon be commenced. He submitted that Mr. Courtenay was not entitled to have the fund applied to the purposes for which he claimed the same.

The VICE-CHANCELLOR.—The true construction of these very loosely-framed documents, which are called appeals, seems to show, I think, that the primary purpose—that is to say, the thing first contemplated as most urgently required, and to effect which the money was asked for—was the building of a church at Pentonville. The expressions are very loose, and the documents are oddly framed, but it is impossible not to see that the first thing for which the money was wanted was the benefit of Pentonville church. At any rate it seems to me impossible, upon the whole case, to say that—when the money was paid by the persons who were encouraged to subscribe it by these appeals—if the trustees, or those having the custody of it, seeking to apply it for the purposes for which it was subscribed, had given all that has now been collected for the building of the church now in the course of erection, that would have been a misapplication of the funds. The question now is, whether, when the matter comes before the court, with purposes so defined as they are by these appeals, this court, assisted by the opinion of a certain portion of the body who had a discretion, should say that the whole fund may or ought not properly to be applied to finish the church now in the course of erection, or that any part of it should not be reserved for building the church contemplated in another district of the same parish, for which it is said a site has been obtained. Upon the whole case it seems to me, there being a discretion in the court, that that which was wished by these trustees who are relators is the better mode of applying the fund, and is that which will be the most certain way to secure its application towards the primary object for which it was contributed, whilst it is clearly within the purposes for which the money was subscribed. Therefore, instead of dividing the fund for an object which after all was possibly, perhaps probably, not contemplated, and looking to the amount of the fund, I think the better course will be to do what the relators suggest, viz., to direct that the whole fund (subject to the deduction which I am about to mention) be applied towards the erection of the church which is now being built. The deft. Mr. Courtenay claims the sum of 130*l.* as due to him out of the fund, in order to reimburse him for a sum equivalent to that amount which he has paid to Mr. Faulkner, who was the incumbent of the whole parish before it was divided into districts; and I think, in spite of all that has been urged by Mr. Bacon, it is very plain that Mr. Courtenay was dealing with this committee in such a way that when he paid this money he paid it on the faith and expectation that he should be reimbursed. I certainly think, although Mr. Courtenay derived a benefit from the application of the money, that he is entitled to have it repaid to him. The costs of all parties must be taxed and paid out of the fund.

Woodroffe asked for the costs of the relators as between solicitor and client, on the ground of their being trustees, but

The VICE-CHANCELLOR refused.

The costs of the Attorney-General were provided for separately.

REG. v. PICKFORD.

Order of affiliation—Application for a summons—Death of justice granting it—Subsequent application for another summons after the year—Order.

When an application is made to a justice to issue a summons in bastardy under the 7 & 8 Vict. c. 101, s. 2, that justice only has authority to issue such summons.

An application to a justice for a summons within a year after the birth of a bastard child will not authorise another justice in issuing a summons upon such application.

Where, therefore, a woman made application to a justice within a year after the birth of a bastard child, and a summons was accordingly issued by him, but was not served in consequence of the putative father having absconded, and nothing was therefore done upon it, and the said justice died, and subsequently, but after the expiration of a twelvemonth from the birth of the child, the putative father returned, and an application was then made to another justice of the same division for a summons, which was granted, and an order of affiliation thereupon made which recited the first application, the issuing of the summons, its not having been served on account of the absconding of the man, and the death of the justice:

Held, that the order was bad, as it was not founded upon a summons issued upon a complaint made within a twelvemonth of the birth of the child, and as the original application to the justice who subsequently died could not be connected with the subsequent summons.

This was a rule to quash an order of affiliation returned into this court upon certiorari. The order was in the following form:—

“Cheshire to wit.—At a petty session of her Majesty's justices of the peace of the county of Chester, acting in and for the petty sessional division of Prestbury, in the hundred of Macclesfield, in the same county of Chester, holden at the County Police Office in Macclesfield, in the said county, in and for the said division, on Tuesday, the 21st day of August 1860, before us, Charles Richard Banashe Legh, John Dixon and John Upton Gaskell, Esquires, three of her Majesty's justices of the peace in and for the same county.

“Whereas, Jane Mason, of the township of Bollington, in the said county, single woman, did, on the 15th day of June 1858, at Macclesfield, in the said county, make information and complaint to Thomas Swanwick, Esquire, one of her Majesty's justices of the peace in and for the said county, and acting in and for the said division, that she was a single woman, and then resided within the township of Bollington, in the division and county aforesaid, and that on the 25th day of March 1858, she was delivered of a male bastard child, which was then living; and she chargeth William Pickford, of the township of Bollington, in the said county, labourer, with being the father of such child, and she then and there made application to the said justice for a summons to the said William Pickford, to appear at a petty session of the peace in and for the said division, to answer her complaint in the premises, and thereupon the said justice issued his summons accordingly to the said William Pickford to appear and answer the said complaint at the said petty session, to be holden on a day therein mentioned, to wit, on the 29th day of June 1858. And whereas the said William Pickford, at the time of such application being made, had absconded from Bollington aforesaid, and his abode was then and has ever since until the month of July last continued unknown to the said Jane Mason, and the said summons could not be served on the said William Pickford. And whereas the said Thomas Swanwick died on the 3rd day of Aug. 1859, and afterwards, to wit, on the 14th day of July last, the said Jane Mason made application to Thomas Wardle, Esq., one of her Majesty's justices of the peace in and for the said county, and acting in and for the said division, for a summons to the said William Pickford to appear at a petty session of the peace in and for the said division, to answer her complaint in the premises, and thereupon the said last-mentioned justice issued his summons accordingly to the said William Pickford to appear and answer the said complaint at the said petty session holden this day. And whereas the said William Pickford hath been duly served with the said last-mentioned summons, six days at least before this day, but he doth not appear thereto, and Jane Mason is now present for the purpose of obtaining from us the said justices in petty session assembled an order upon the said William Pickford in the premises. Now, therefore, it being proved to us, upon oath, that the said Jane Mason is a single woman, and was at the time of application for the said first and last-mentioned summons as aforesaid, and still is, residing within the said township of Bollington, in the division and county aforesaid, and that on the said 25th day of March 1858 she was delivered of the said male child, and that such child was born a bastard, and is still living. And we having also heard the evidence upon oath of the said Jane Mason the mother, and other evidence upon oath as produced by her, and the evidence of the said Jane Mason, the mother, being corroborated in some material particulars by other testimony to our satisfaction, and we also having had the other facts and circumstances herein contained proved upon oath to us, do hereby adjudge the said William Pickford to be the putative father of the said bastard child. And having regard to all the circumstances of the case, we do hereby order that the said William Pickford shall pay unto the said Jane Mason, so long as she shall live and be of sound mind, and shall not be in any gaol or prison, or under sentence of transportation, and after her death, or unless she shall be of unsound mind, or confined in any gaol or prison, or under sentence of transportation, then unto such person as two justices may appoint, to have the custody of the said child, pursuant to the statute in such case made and provided, the sum of two shillings weekly and every week from the time of making the application first aforesaid until the said child shall attain the age of thirteen years, or shall die, or the said mother shall marry; and do hereby further order the said William Pickford to pay to the said Jane Mason the sum of nine shillings and sixpence, being the costs incurred in obtaining this order, and the sum of ten shillings for the midwife.

"Given under our hands and seals at the Petty Sessions aforesaid.

"JOHN UPTON GASKELL. (L.S.)"

T. W. Saunders showed cause.—This order is good. The first application was made within the twelve months after birth to a justice, and was in time. It is true the summons was not served, but the reason was that the deft. absconded, which was no fault of the prosecutrix. It may be said that the summons might have been nevertheless served at the last place of abode, but the deft. had no such place of abode; at all events it lies on him to show that he had, and his affidavit does not state one. The first summons thus proved abortive from no fault of the prosecutrix, and the justice who issued it died before the second application was made. It was competent to make the second application after the twelve months, when it was found that the deft. was again within the jurisdiction, for the statute had been fully satisfied by the first application being made within the twelve months. [CROMPTON, J.—The only question will be, if the second summons can be considered a continuation of the first. Must the judgment not be on the first application and summons?] If the application is in time it is immaterial that the summons issues after the twelve months: (Potts v. Cumbridge, 27 L. J. 63, M. C.; Ex parte Harrison, 19 L. T. Rep. 114.) [CROMPTON, J.—The difficulty is to see how the second summons could be issued by a different justice from the one who entertained the first application. BLACKBURN, J.—The statute seems to contemplate that the same justice should issue the summons.] The mere issuing of the summons must be a mere matter of form, and as the application was made to the justice of the same division it cannot be material who issued it. [BLACKBURN, J.—But does the statute say that? It is not a common law jurisdiction this, but the creature of statute. The statute does not seem to give jurisdiction to any justice but the one who entertained the first application.] The words of the statute on that point may be treated as directory. [HILL, J.—The statute limits the power, and no other justice can issue the summons.] At all events, the order made which recites all the circumstances of the first application may be taken to cure any informality caused by the death of the justice. The second application was a continuation of the first. If the justices could enter continuances on a roll, there could have been little doubt of that, and it would defeat the object of the statute to hold this order bad.

Kenealy, contra, was not called on.

By the COURT.—Looking at the terms of the statute, and considering that we cannot look upon the second as any continuation of the first application, this order must be quashed, but without costs.

Order quashed without costs.

REG. v. THE INHABITANTS OF AUGHTON.

Poor-law—Order of removal—Children of a parent who is irremovable—Fraud upon the parent—Children within the age of nurture—9 & 10 Vict. c. 66, s. 3.

A widow whose parish of settlement was Aughton, but who was irremovable from Leeds by a five years' residence, had three children, and being unable to maintain them, the Leeds board of guardians made an order for the admission of such three children into the workhouse. A few weeks afterwards the overseers of Leeds obtained an order for the removal of these children to Aughton. The object of the board of guardians in sending them to the workhouse was their removal to their place of settlement. They were sent there with the consent of their mother, but she was not informed that the result of separating her children from her would be their removal to Aughton. Each of the children at the time of the order of removal was under seven years of age:

Held, that under the circumstances the separation of the children from the mother was a fraud upon her, and that the order of removal was bad:

Held, also, that as the children were within the age of nurture, the mother could not consent to their separation from her.

This was a case stated by the recorder of Leeds, upon an appeal against an order of removal of Sarah Lambert, aged six years, and of Ann Lambert and Emily Lambert (twins), aged four years, from the township of Leeds to the township of Aughton. The order was confirmed with costs, subject to a case which was stated as follows :—

The paupers are the legitimate children of Mary Lambert, the widow of Edward Lambert, by the said Edward Lambert, who died in June 1855, at Leeds, being then settled in the township of Aughton, in which township the said Mary Lambert, the mother of the three paupers and the said pauper children were also all settled derivatively from the said Edward Lambert. Mary Lambert, the mother of the paupers, went to reside at the township of Leeds with her said husband about seventeen years ago; and at the time of his death, in June 1855, she was irremovable from the said township under the provisions of the 9 & 10 Vict. c. 66, by reason of having resided with her said husband more than five years in the said township. Immediately after the death of her said husband, the said Mary Lambert applied to the overseers of the said township of Leeds for relief, and from that time, for nearly four years, orders were given by the board of guardians for out-of-door relief, such orders being for limited times respectively, and renewed from time to time until April 1859, and such relief was received by Mary Lambert for her children under the said orders. The children all resided with their mother the said Mary Lambert, in the said township of Leeds, who, with the out-door relief given to her, supported herself and her said children by her labour, and who attended properly as a mother to her said children, sending the eldest to the national school at Leeds when she could. In April 1859 the last order for out-door relief to the said Mary Lambert and her children expired. Being unable to maintain her said children the mother of the pauper again applied for relief to the board of guardians a few days after, and received an order for the admission of her children into the workhouse. Her three children were admitted into the workhouse of the said township of Leeds with the consent of their mother, but she was not informed that the result of separating her children from her would be their removal to Aughton, the township of their settlement, nor was her consent to such removal asked. The ultimate object on the part of the board of guardians of their being taken into the workhouse, was their removal to their place of settlement. The paupers were in the workhouse six or seven weeks before the order for their removal to Aughton, the township of their settlement was made by two magistrates for the borough of Leeds, on the 14th May 1859, which is the order now in question, and the recorder found that the order of removal was taken out by the overseers of Leeds, without fraud, unless the above facts necessarily of themselves constitute fraud. The mother of the paupers, being irremovable, still resides in the township of Leeds, and supports herself by her industry. The three children ordered to be removed to Aughton, the place of their settlement, are all under the age of seven years. It was contended, on the part of the said appa., first, that as the mother of the paupers might not lawfully be removed from the respa.' township by reason of her status of irremovability, the warrant for the removal of her said three children could not lawfully be granted, and was contrary to the 3rd section of the 9 & 10 Vict. c. 66, and that the order was therefore bad; secondly, it was contended that under the 11 & 12 Vict. c. 111, reciting and amending the 9 & 10 Vict. c. 66, s. 1, the mother of the said paupers being irremovable by reason of the provisions of the said last-mentioned statute, the said paupers could not lawfully be removed from the said township of Leeds, from which their mother was irremovable, and that the order was therefore bad; and thirdly, it was contended that the said paupers being all three within the age of nurture, were irremovable without the mother at common law, and that as the mother could not by law be removed, the order for the removal of her infant children without her was therefore bad. If the court should be of opinion that, under these circumstances, the three pauper children were removable to the township of their settlement without their mother, then the order aforesaid shall stand confirmed. If the court should be of opinion that, under these circumstances, the three pauper children were irremovable to the township of their settlement without their mother, then the order of removal, and the order of sessions confirming the same to be quashed."

By sect. 3 of the 9 & 10 Vict. c. 66, it is enacted, that "no child under the age of sixteen years, whether legitimate or illegitimate, residing in any parish with his or her father or mother, stepfather or stepmother, or reputed father, shall be removed, nor shall any warrant be granted for the removal of such child from such parish, in any case where such father, mother, stepfather, stepmother, or reputed father, may not lawfully be removed from such parish;" and by sect. 1 of the 11 & 12 Vict. c. 111, it is enacted, "that whenever any person should have a wife or children having no other settlement than his or her own, such wife and children should be removable from any parish or place from which he or she would be removable notwithstanding any provisions of the said recited Act, and should not be removable from any parish or place from which he or she would not be removable by reason of any provision in the said recited Act."

Moule appeared in support of the order of sessions, and argued that, as the children were not, at the time of the order of removal, residing with their mother, but were actually in the workhouse, the 3rd section of the 9 & 10 Vict. does not apply, and that they were rightly removed to their place of settlement: (Reg. v. Combs, 25 L. J. 59, M.C.; 5 Ell. & Bl. 892. [BLACKBURN, J.—The judges in that case put it upon the footing that the child had been abandoned. CROMPTON, J.—What is the use of the 3rd section of the 9 & 10 Vict. c. 66, if this course is correct? It would, in fact, be to repeal that section.] They cannot effect a separation if the mother and children are together. Here the removal to the workhouse was with the consent of the mother. [COCKBURN, C.J.—It was a fraud upon her, and, I think a very scandalous one. She was not aware of the object of removing her children to the workhouse. The overseers took them there not to relieve them, but to send them away. She was kept in ignorance of their intention.] But there was a separation in fact. [COCKBURN, C.J.—But is this such a separation as we ought to countenance? The mother finds she cannot maintain her children, and the overseers say they will take them into the workhouse. She thinks that there she will be enabled to see them, and consents, and they take them away accordingly. If they had said to her, "We will take them in order to send them to their place of settlement," and she had then assented, that may have been within the case of Reg. v. Combs.] Neither assent or dissent is found in the case. [COCKBURN, C. J.—But she does not assent. If they took away the children without telling her they intended to send them away, it was a fraud upon her.] They were bound to take them to the workhouse. [BLACKBURN, J.—But as these children were within the age of nurture, Reg. v. Birmingham, 5 Q.B. 210, shows that she could not consent to their separation. It is the right of the children.]

Overend, Q.C. and T. C. Foster were not called upon.

By the COURT.—The orders must be quashed.

Orders quashed.

Q. B.] Ex parte MANSERGH—REG. v. JOHN PARKER AND GEORGE PARKER. [C. CAS. R.]

Tuesday, June 11.

Ex parte MANSERGH.

Court-martial—Removal of proceedings by certiorari. A certiorari to remove the proceedings of a court-martial upon a person in the military service of the Crown, sentencing him to be dismissed from her Majesty's service, will not be granted even on the ground of want of jurisdiction, as it concerns his military status only, which entirely depends upon the will of her Majesty.

Lush (with whom was Mundell) moved for a rule to show cause why a certiorari should not issue to the Judge Advocate-General to bring up into this court the proceedings on the trial of Major Mansergh, by court-martial, at Calcutta, on the 2nd Aug. 1858. It appeared that Major Mansergh had been convicted upon a charge of writing a letter to his commanding officer in India, in offensive and insulting language, and had been sentenced by the court-martial to be dismissed from her Majesty's service for that offence. The object of the present application was to bring up the proceedings, with a view to their being quashed, upon the ground that the court-martial had no jurisdiction to try him, or to pass such a sentence. In 1858, Major Mansergh was a captain in the 6th Foot regiment of the line, serving in India, and on the 25th April 1858 an order came for his regiment to go into the interior of India to aid in crushing the rebellion. Major Mansergh went to Calcutta to make arrangements to go with his regiment, and on the 26th April reported himself to his commanding officer, Colonel Barnes, who was not with the regiment, but at Fort William, as being ready to proceed. Several messages passed, and Major Mansergh expressed himself anxious to go, but at length Colonel Barnes notified to him that he had been promoted to be major of the 15th Regiment of Foot, and that he must hand over his company to another officer. Major Mansergh had, in fact, been promoted on the 19th Feb. 1858, but no orders had been given to Colonel Barnes to notify the fact to him, and the effect of the notification was that his services in India were dispensed with, and he was under the necessity of coming home to England, where the 15th Foot regiment then was. Irritated by the conduct of his commanding officer Colonel Barnes, Major Mansergh wrote a letter to him on the 27th April, in which he used the offensive and insulting language complained of. On the 28th April he was arrested upon the charge, and in the month of August he was tried and convicted, and sentenced to be dismissed from the Queen's service. The learned counsel contended that the court-martial in India had no jurisdiction to try Major Mansergh, inasmuch as upon the 25th April he had ceased to be a captain of the 6th Regiment of Foot, and was no longer under the jurisdiction of the Commander-in-Chief in India, who had therefore no authority to direct his trial by a court-martial. The War-office admitted that on the 26th April his connection with the Indian army ceased, for, on his arrival in England last year, he wrote to have his expenses home allowed, and received an answer to the effect that, on the 26th April 1858, he had ceased to belong to the Indian establishment. The learned counsel then referred to the Mutiny Act and Articles of War, and contended that the Commander-in-Chief had no power to order a court-martial, except in the case of soldiers actually under his command at the time, and that the court-martial must consist of the superior officers of the accused. In the present case Major Mansergh was not under the command of Lord Clyde at the time, nor were the officers who formed the court-martial his superior officers. The warrant issued by her Majesty, under which Lord Clyde acted, and which gave him power to direct court-martials for the trial of officers and soldiers under his command, was also referred to. [BLACKBURN, J.—While he remained in India, Major Mansergh must be still considered as under the command of the commanding officer.] It is competent to the applicant to show by affidavits the defect of jurisdiction, as had been done in the case of Reg. v. Bolton, 1 Q. B. 66, and many other cases. The proceedings are now returned to England, and are in the possession of the Judge Advocate-General, and the applicant has a right to have the proceedings quashed, if they have been taken without jurisdiction. [COCKBURN, C.J.—The court has no power to do away with the sentence; they cannot command her Majesty to restore him to her service.] The court has power to quash these proceedings, and, when that is done, it must be presumed that her Majesty will do what is right. It is the function of this court to construe all Acts of Parliament which limit the jurisdiction of inferior tribunals, and it ought not to allow a judgment to stand which was pronounced without jurisdiction. In Grant v. Gould, 2 H. Bl. 69, the court granted a prohibition to prohibit a court-martial from being held on a person who was not a soldier; so also in R. v. Morley, 2 Burr. 1040. [COCKBURN, C. J.—In this case Major Mansergh was still a soldier, and subject to military law. In the case of John Anderson, 30 L. J. 129, Q. B., this court, in favour of liberty, had granted a writ of habeas corpus to Canada to bring up the body of a negro upon the authority cited, "that by the common law it lies to any part of the King's dominions; for the King ought to have an account why any of his subjects are imprisoned:" (Bac. Abr. "Habeas Corpus" (B.) 2.) [BLACKBURN, J. said the applicant might have applied to the court at Calcutta for a prohibition.] The 17th section of the Mutiny Act directs the proceedings to be sent over to the Judge Advocate-General in London, and the court ought to direct a certiorari to issue to bring them up in order to their being quashed. [COCKBURN, C.J.—There is no precedent for the application, and a further difficulty arises from the fact that the applicant's civil status is not affected.] Re Poe, 5 B. & Ad. 681 was referred to.

COCKBURN, C.J.—During the discussion the court stated their objections to the application, in order to elicit all which could be said in its favour, or which could throw any light upon a matter of very considerable importance. The result is, that the court entertains no doubt that they ought not to interfere in favour of a person who is in the military service of the Crown. If the civil rights of a person were affected by the judgment of a military tribunal which had exceeded its jurisdiction, this court ought to protect those civil rights in a case where life, or liberty, or property might be concerned. But in the present case the military status of the applicant only was concerned, and that depended entirely upon the will and pleasure of the Crown. It is open to him to apply to her Majesty, who, with the advice of the Judge Advocate-General, might do him justice. His Lordship also thought that as this was a discretionary writ, the court ought not to grant it in this case. The application is, therefore, not well founded, and must be refused.

WIGHTMAN, CROMPTON and BLACKBURN, JJ. severally gave judgment to the same effect.

one with stealing the prosecutor's hops, and the other with receiving them, knowing them to be stolen. A third person in company with the prisoners, who had also been jointly charged with the stealing, said to one of the prisoners, "Well, John, you had better tell Mr. W. (the prosecutor) the truth." Neither the prosecutor nor the policeman dissented or remarked upon this advice, whereupon the prisoner John made a statement in the nature of a confession:

Held, that this statement was admissible in evidence, the circumstances not being such as to exclude it or protect as a privileged communication.

John Parker and George Parker were tried before me at the last general quarter sessions for the county of Denbigh, on an indictment charging, in the first count, the prisoner John Parker with stealing a quantity of hops, the property of Peter Walker, his master, and in the second count, George Parker with receiving the same hops, knowing them to have been stolen.

It was proved at the trial that the prisoner John and a brother named William Parker were in the service of the prosecutor, who was a brewer in Wrexham, and the prisoner George kept a public-house in Wrexham. On the 6th March a policeman named Lamb went to George Parker's house, where John and William then were, and by permission of George searched the house. Lamb found some hops in two bags in a room up stairs. He came down stairs, and sent for Mr. Walker, the prosecutor, who went with Lamb into a parlour in George's house, in which were assembled John, William and George Parker. Lamb there charged William and John with stealing the hops, and George with receiving them, knowing them to be stolen. Upon hearing this William said, "Well, John, you had better tell Mr. Walker the truth." Neither the prosecutor nor the policeman dissented from or remarked upon William's advice, whereupon John said, "I will tell the truth: I did take some hops and I must risk it." Lamb then took the three brothers to the Bridewell, and on their way there John of his own accord said: "I'll tell you how I got them hops in the small bag. I was putting some in the cask, and there was more than I wanted, and I took them. I did not think it was any harm."

The three brothers were shortly afterwards taken before the magistrates, when William was discharged, but John and George were committed for trial.

At the trial it was objected by the counsel for the prisoners, upon the authority of Reg. v. Sarah Taylor, 8 Car. & P. 733 (a); Rex v. Spencer, 7 Car. & P. 776 (b); and Rex v. Pountney, 7 Car. & P. 302 (c),

(a) In Reg. v. Sarah Taylor's case the facts were these:—Upon an indictment for setting fire to the house of R. Lyford, it appeared that on the morning of the fire the prisoner, who was the servant of the prosecutor, was sent for into the parlour, in which Mrs. Lyford and Mr. Winders were, and that Mr. Winders, who was not a constable, or in any office or authority, said to the prisoner, "You had better tell how you did it," and that thereupon she made an answer. Patteson, J. said, "It was the opinion of the judges that evidence of any confession is receivable unless there has been some inducement held out by some person in authority, and in this case I should have received the evidence of the statement made to Mr. Winders if the inducement had been held out by him alone. But here the inducement does not rest with him alone, because Mrs. Lyford, who was the wife of the prosecutor, and also the mistress of the prisoner, was present with Mr. Winders, and must, as she expressed no dissent, be taken to have sanctioned the inducement. I think, therefore, that the inducement must be taken as if it had been held out by Mrs. Lyford, who was a person in authority over the prisoner, and that therefore the evidence is inadmissible."

(b) In Rex v. Spencer, 7 C. & P. 776, it was proved that after the prisoner David Spencer was in custody he was told by a person who was neither prosecutor nor constable, nor had any authority of any kind, that it would be better for him to confess, and that upon that he made a statement. Parke, B.—"Mr. Carrington, if you wish me to receive evidence of this confession I will do so; but I ought to tell and other cases which he then cited, that the confessions of John, being one continuing confession, ought not to be received in evidence, as being made after an inducement to confess. That, although the inducement was not made by a person in authority, yet being made in the presence and hearing of two persons in authority, namely the prosecutor (prisoner's master) and the policeman who had just charged the prisoner, they had by their silence acquiesced in and adopted the inducement, and, that as there was no other evidence of the stealing, John could not be convicted of stealing, and George must consequently be acquitted of receiving.

I directed the jury that the inducement or advice being that of a person made at the time when he himself was charged with a similar offence as the person induced to confess, must be looked upon merely as the inducement of an accomplice; and that there having been no threat or promise of favour with respect to the offence charged against the prisoner held out by any person concerned in apprehending, examining, or prosecuting him, or by the person to whom the subsequent confession was made, there was nothing to exclude or invalidate it.

The jury found John guilty of stealing and George of receiving, but I deferred sentencing them until the opinion of the Court of Criminal Appeal should have been taken upon the point raised by the prisoner's counsel.

If the confession was under the circumstances receivable the conviction to stand, otherwise the prisoners to be acquitted.

The prisoners are out on bail.

THOMAS HUGHES, Chairman.

REG. v. WILLIAM SLEEP.

Government stores—Mark of broad arrow—Possession without knowledge of the mark—9 & 10 Will. 3, c. 41, s. 2.

On an indictment charging the deft. under the 9 & 10 Will. 3, c. 41, s. 2, with being in possession of naval stores marked with the broad arrow, it is necessary for the prosecution to show affirmatively a possession by the deft. with knowledge that they were marked with the broad arrow.

Case reserved for the opinion of this court:—

At the general quarter sessions of the peace for the borough of Plymouth, holden on the 4th April 1861, before Charles Saunders, Esq., the Recorder, William Sleep was tried and convicted on an indictment charging him upon the 2nd section of the statute you that there is a difference of opinion among the judges whether a confession made to a person who has no authority after an inducement held out by that person is receivable. Some of the judges think it is receivable, and others think that it is not so. If I receive it I shall reserve the point for the consideration of the judges, and if they should think that I should not have received it the prisoner will be pardoned. If you have no other evidence I certainly will receive it, but if you have you will consider whether you had better press it.

(c) In Rex v. Pountney the constable who took the prisoner Pountney into custody was called to prove a confession made by the prisoner to the landlord of the inn to which he was taken immediately after his apprehension. It appeared that the constable was present, and had the prisoner in his custody when the confession was procured by inducement held out by the innkeeper, and that the constable who was present did not caution the prisoner in any way. Alderson, B.—"This is a point well worthy of consideration. I have a very strong opinion against its admissibility, but as there are opinions which I am bound to respect opposed to my own, I think I had better receive the evidence, and it should become necessary I will reserve the point for the consideration of the judges."

REG. v. WILLIAM SLEMP.

[C. CAS. R.]

9 & 10 Will. 3, c. 41, with having been found in possession of naval stores marked with the broad arrow.

The indictment was in the usual form.

Mr. Holdsworth and Mr. Cox were counsel for the Crown. Mr. Carter and Mr. Lopes were for the prisoner.

The prisoner was an ironmonger and brazier at Plymouth. On the 9th March he delivered upon the quay to the captain of a coasting vessel, the Active, a cask to be carried from Plymouth to Helston, in Cornwall. The cask was marked "R. P." in chalk; but on being asked for better directions, the prisoner gave to the captain a piece of paper on which was written "Richard Pascoe, Helston, Cornwall." Before the vessel sailed, two of the metropolitan police employed at the dockyard, Devonport, seized the cask, which, on being opened, was found to contain 324lbs. weight of copper bolts in 150 pieces.

The cask was packed with straw and shavings, and each piece or bolt was packed with straw and shavings separately, so that the pieces could not rub together or make any noise. The whole of the metal had the appearance of Government stores, and of such stores as are not allowed to be sold in the dockyard. The greatest portion of it had been passed through the fire, and round bolts had been very nearly beaten square. On some of the pieces the mark of the broad arrow was visible in the state in which they were found; from others it was necessary to clear off the rust before it could be seen. A little over 50lbs. weight of the copper was marked with the broad arrow.

After the seizure the prisoner was charged by the police with delivering a cask containing Government stores to the captain of the Active. The prisoner said: "Well, I did deliver a cask of metal, but I do not think it was marked." The prisoner was also told that the cask of metal was wrapped in shavings and straw, and he said, "Yes it is. I packed it myself. I do that to keep it from knocking the head of the cask out, as I have had complaints before, as some of the casks on their arrival had their heads out." After this the cask of metal was shown by the police to the prisoner, who was asked whether that was the cask he delivered to the captain. "Yes," he said, "I have no doubt of it." The prisoner was then shown the mark of the broad arrow on some of the pieces, and asked how he became possessed of the copper, and he said, "No, he did not know of whom he bought it." There was no evidence given to justify or account for the prisoner's possession of the copper.

Upon these facts Mr. Carter strenuously urged upon the jury that in order to convict the prisoner it must be shown for the prosecution not only that the prisoner had the marked copper in his possession, but that he also knew that the copper was marked with the broad arrow, citing a report of Reg. Cohen, 8 Cox. C. C. 41 and contending that this had not been done.

As prosecutions on the 2nd section of the statute 9 & 10 Will. 3, are very frequent and important at Plymouth, and as cases of culpable ignorance and culpable negligence are as much within the mischief guarded against by the Legislature as where a particular knowledge of the Queen's mark upon the stores can be proved in the possessors; and as it has been held that possession of marked stores, to be excused, should be without any fault or misbehaviour in the possessor,

The Recorder asked the jury:

First, whether the prisoner was found in possession of copper marked with the broad arrow? To which the foreman answered "Yes."

Secondly, whether the prisoner knew that the copper, or any part of it, was so marked? To which the jury said, "We have not sufficient evidence before us to show that he knew it."

Thirdly, whether the prisoner had reasonable means of knowing that it was so marked? To which they answered, "He had."

Upon this finding of the jury, a verdict of guilty was recorded; and the question is respectfully submitted to the Court for the Consideration of Crown Cases Reserved, whether the verdict is right.

[MAG. CAS.]

Judgment was respited, and the prisoner discharged upon bail to appear at the next quarter sessions for the borough.

CHARLES SAUNDERS,

Recorder of Plymouth.

The following statutes were referred to during the argument:—

The 9 & 10 Will. 3, c. 41, s. 2, enacts that such person or persons in whose custody, possession, or keeping such goods or stores marked as aforesaid shall be found, not being employed as aforesaid, and such person or persons who shall conceal such goods or stores marked as aforesaid, being indicted and convicted of such concealment, or of the having such goods found in his custody, possession, or keeping, shall forfeit such goods and the sum of 200*l.*, together with the costs of prosecution, one moiety to his Majesty and the other moiety to the informer, to be recovered as aforesaid, and shall also suffer imprisonment until payment and performance of the same forfeiture, unless such person shall upon his trial produce a certificate under the hand of three or more of his Majesty's principal officers or commissioners of the navy, ordnance, or victuallers, expressing the numbers, qualities, or weights of such goods as he or she shall then be indicted for, and the occasion and reason of such goods coming to his or her hands or possession.

The 39 & 40 Geo. 3, c. 89, s. 1, enacts, that every person or persons (such person or persons not being a contractor or contractors, or employed as in the said recited Act of the ninth and tenth years of the reign of King William the Third is mentioned) who shall willingly or knowingly sell or deliver, or cause or procure to be sold or delivered to any person or persons whomsoever, or who shall willingly or knowingly receive or have in his, her, or their custody, possession, or keeping any stores of war or naval, ordnance, or victualling stores, or any goods whatsoever marked as in the said recited Acts are expressed, or any canvas marked either with a blue streak in the middle or with a blue streak in a serpentine form, or any bewper, otherwise called buntin, wrought with one or more streaks of raised tape (the said stores of war, naval, ordnance or victualling stores, or goods above mentioned, or any of them being in a raw or unconverted state, or being new or not more than one-third worn), and such person or persons who shall conceal such stores or goods, or any of them, marked as aforesaid, shall be deemed receivers of stolen goods, knowing them to have been stolen, and shall on being convicted thereof in due form of law, be transported beyond the seas for the term of fourteen years, in like manner as other receivers of stolen goods are directed to be transported by the laws and statutes of this realm, unless such person or persons shall upon his, her, or their trial produce a certificate under the hands of three or more of his Majesty's principal officers or commissioners of the navy, ordnance, or victualling, expressing the numbers, quantities, or weights of such stores or goods as he, she, or they shall then be indicted for, and the occasion and reason of such stores or goods coming to his, her, or their hands or possession.

Sect. 2 enacts that such person or persons (not being a contractor or contractors, or employed as aforesaid) in whose custody, possession, or keeping any of the said stores called canvas, marked with a blue streak in a serpentine form, or bewper, otherwise called buntin, wrought as above mentioned, shall be found (such canvas or bewper, otherwise called buntin, not being charged to be new or not more than one-third worn), and all and every person or persons who shall be convicted of any offence contrary to so much of the said recited Act of the 9th and 10th years of the reign of King William the Third, as relates to the making, or the having in possession, or concealing any of his Majesty's warlike or naval or ordnance stores marked as therein specified, shall besides forfeiting such stores and the sum of 200*l.*, together with costs of suit as therein mentioned, be corporally punished by pillory, whipping and imprisonment, or by any and either of the said ways and means, in such manner and for such space of time as to the judge or justices before whom such offender or offenders shall be convicted shall seem meet, anything in the said last-mentioned Act, or in the before-recited Acts of the 9th year of King George the First, and the 17th year of King George the Second, to the contrary thereof in anywise notwithstanding.

Carter for the prisoner.—The case depends on the 9 & 10 Will. 3, c. 41, s. 2, and the question is whether knowledge of the mark of the broad arrow being on the stores is an essential ingredient to the commission of the offence created by that enactment. It is submitted that it is, and that the finding of the jury on the second question entitles the prisoner to an acquittal, and that the finding on the third question is immaterial. [MARTIN, B.—Is the finding on the first question right? The cask was found in the possession of the captain of the ship.] That point was raised before the jury, and ought to have been reserved also.

By the COURT.—We can only take the case as stated to us by the judge.

POLLOCK, C.B.—I own I doubt whether the practice of courts, of putting questions of fact to the jury in criminal cases, and then pronouncing a verdict of guilty or not guilty, instead of the jury, is right. It is a sort of special verdict.

CROMPTON, J.—The judge asks the court whether the verdict is right; that seems to involve everything.

COCKBURN, C.J.—The question really is, whether stores having been found in the prisoner's possession without his knowledge of their having the mark of the broad arrow upon them, any offence has been committed.

CROMPTON, J.—Whether guilty knowledge should be proved affirmatively on the part of the prosecution.

Carter.—On that question there are decisions in favour of the prisoner: (Reg. v. Wilmott, 3 Cox Crim. Cas. 281; and Reg. v. Cohen, 8 Cox Crim. Cas. 41.)

Collier (Holdsworth and E. W. Cox with him).—In a case at the Maidstone spring assizes 1861, Wightman, J. ruled that it was not necessary to show affirmatively that the prisoner had knowledge of the mark of the broad arrow being on the stores. [POLLOCK, C.B.—Suppose a man to bring a cask or a portmanteau, and to ask permission to leave it in a house, would the occupier be within the statute because they might happen to contain Government stores marked with the broad arrow? COCKBURN, C.J.—Or if a man were to bring a quantity of copper bolts for sale, and among them three or four marked with the broad arrow, would he be within the section?] Prima facie if a man has possession of any stores marked with the broad arrow, he is within the statute, and a case is made out which calls on the prisoner for an answer. [COCKBURN, C.J.—Actus non facit reum, nisi mens sit rea, is the foundation of all criminal justice. CROMPTON, J.—Suppose a man were to impose upon another by putting at the top a quantity of stores not marked, and in the middle some marked with the broad arrow, would the man imposed upon come within the Act? If not, that supposition seems to arise upon this finding.] In such a case they could not be said to be in his possession, as he was not aware of it. There will be the greatest possible difficulty in protecting the public stores if it is held that knowledge of the mark of the broad arrow must be proved. (2 East's P. C. c. 16, s. 153 ;

2 East's P. C. 153, 765; Reg. v. Banks, 1 Esp. 143; Moreton v. Porter, 29 L. J. 213, M. C.) The intent of the statute was to dispense with the ordinary proof of guilty knowledge in these cases, and to throw on a man having possession of stores marked with the broad arrow the onus of showing that he came by them lawfully.

COCKBURN, C.J.—I am of opinion, on the case as submitted to us, that we must say that the prisoner was wrongly convicted. I certainly feel bound to say that there was evidence upon which the jury might well and reasonably have been called upon to conclude that the prisoner knew that the copper bolts were marked with the broad arrow while in his possession. But the jury have not so found. And we must consider the case now as if it had been proved that the deft. was ignorant of that fact. It has been contended that the mere possession of stores marked with the broad arrow is sufficient to constitute the offence within the statute of 9 & 10 Will. 3, c. 41. I cannot adopt that view. The ordinary principle that there must be a guilty mind to constitute a guilty act applies to this case, and must be imported into that statute, as it was held in Reg. v. Cohen, where this conclusion of the law was stated by Hill, J. with his usual clearness and power. It is true that the statute says nothing about knowledge, but that must be imported into the statute. Many cases may be put in which persons might have possession of stores, and in which it is clear to demonstration that they might be ignorant of the fact of their having the mark of the broad arrow upon them, and yet the argument of the prosecution would lead to their being found guilty. I quite agree that the jury might well have come to another result in this case; but they did not, and they chose to act upon the prisoner's statement, and to find a sort of special verdict, to which we must apply the law, and say that the jury, having negatived the fact of knowledge, the case comes within the decision of Reg. v. Cohen. We must therefore come to the conclusion, that on the finding of the jury the prisoner ought not to have been convicted.

POLLOCK, C.B.—I agree with my Lord Chief Justice that on this finding of this jury there ought to be no judgment against the prisoner. There is abundant evidence on which the jury might have found him guilty generally, and I own that I think the jury ought to have done so. But the jury say in answer to the question, whether the prisoner knew that the copper or any part of it was marked with the broad arrow, "We have not sufficient evidence before us to show that he knew it." I entirely agree that knowledge is to a certain extent essential to the crime. I must again call attention to the practice of courts leaving certain questions of fact to a jury in a criminal case, and then entering the verdict according to the finding of the facts. The word "guilty" must, in my judgment, be pronounced by the jury, and upon no set of facts sent up to us, except in the shape of a special verdict, ought this court to act. In this case the finding of the jury makes it quite consistent with the prisoner's having an innocent possession of these stores.

MARTIN, B.—The question submitted to this court is, whether the verdict was right. I think it was wrong in two particulars. First, I think the goods were not found in the prisoner's possession at all. In my judgment the 9 & 10 Will. 3, c. 41, s. 2, means that the goods must be found in the possession of the individual on his trial. If he has parted with the possession of them, and they are found, as in this case, in the custody of the captain of a vessel, I do not think he could be found guilty upon this enactment. I should have directed the jury to acquit him. On the other ground of knowledge of the mark I have no doubt. There are three decisions upon the point: the first in Foster's Crown Law, 449; then Reg. v. Wilmott, 3 Cox Crim.

C. CAS. R.]

REG. v. DAVID DAVIES.

[C. CAS. R.]

Cas. 281; and Reg. v. Cohen, all in favour of the view we adopt. I entirely concur in the judgment of Hill, J. in Reg. v. Cohen.

CROMPTON, J.—I am of the same opinion. I also think the point taken by my brother Martin that the goods must be found in the possession of the individual on his trial, a very serious one. Here there was plenty of evidence that the copper had once been in the possession of the prisoner, but still to constitute the offence they must be found while in his possession. It is not necessary to give any opinion whether the possession of a bailee, like a ship's captain, is the possession of the prisoner. That case is not before us; the other point of knowledge is the one that was really reserved for our opinion. It is sufficient for me to say that I share in the doubt of my brother Martin on the first point. On the other point I agree with the rest of the court. The authorities are strong in support of our view, and I think it is right in principle. The findings are consistent with the prisoner's innocence. The only difficulty in the case arises on the second finding. The statute seems to suppose that a man should have the means of judging from the mark of the broad arrow being upon the stores, that he ought to make proper inquiries, and not take it without so doing. In this case there is nothing inconsistent with the prisoner's having been imposed upon by another party. This case falls within the principle of the case decided in the Court of Q. B., Hearn v. Garton, 28 L. J. 216, M. C., where guilty knowledge was held to be necessary to constitute the offence of sending dangerous goods for carriage by railway.

WILLES, J.—I am of the same opinion. The jury have not found, either that the prisoner knew that these goods were Government stores, or that he wilfully shut his eyes to the fact. I own I regret the opinion that has been expressed on another part of the case, viz., whether these stores were found in the possession of the prisoner. The court is not called upon to express any opinion on that point, and I am unable to concur, as at present advised, in that opinion. Possession means, not merely manual possession, but a property in the thing, though in the custody of another person. That definition applies to the construction of this statute, and I do not think that a thing has ceased to be in the possession of A. because he has taken his hands off it, and those of B. may happen to be upon it. However, I desire not to be understood as giving that as my final opinion upon the point. My judgment proceeds on the other point, and I agree with the rest of the court.

COCKBURN, C. J.—I certainly understood that the question whether the possession was sufficiently proved to be in the prisoner in this case was not part of the matter submitted or to be adjudicated upon by us. Lest I should be considered as sharing in the opinion of my brother Martin, I must say that I hold a diametrically opposite opinion upon it. Conviction quashed.

Saturday, April 27.

(Before POLLOCK, C. B., WILLIAMS, WILLES, BLACKBURN, JJ., and WILDE, B.)

REG. v. DAVID DAVIES.

Assault—County Court bailiff in execution of duty—Warrant—Evidence of authority.

Upon an indictment for an assault upon a County Court bailiff in the execution of his duty, the production of a warrant of the County Court judge for the apprehension of the prisoner, is a sufficient justification of the act of the bailiff in apprehending the prisoner, without proof of the previous proceedings authorising the warrant, even though the judgment be obtained in one county and the warrant sent for execution into a different county.

Williams, J. dubitante.

Case reserved by Byles, J.

At the last assizes for the county of Carmarthen David Davies was indicted for an assault on James Evans, acting in the execution of his office as sub-bailiff of the County Court of Lampeter.

The violence used by the deft. did not appear to exceed what was necessary to prevent his apprehension under the warrant annexed.

It was objected by the prisoner's counsel, citing 9 & 10 Vict. c. 95, ss. 99, 104 and 114, and 19 & 20 Vict. c. 108, ss. 48 and 104, that no neglect or refusal to pay appears on the face of the warrant; and that the previous proceedings authorising the warrant were not proved.

I reserved these objections, and any other objections apparent on the face of the warrant, for the consideration of the Court of Criminal Appeal.

The prisoner was convicted of a common assault subject to the foregoing objections, and was discharged on bail. J. B. BYLES.

The documents proved at the trial were in the following form:—

And whereas this court, at the hearing of the said summons, ordered that the deft. should be committed to prison for twenty-five days for not having satisfied the said judgment and costs, having had sufficient means and ability so to do. These are therefore to require you the said high bailiff, bailiffs and others to take the deft., and to deliver him to the governor of the county gaol at Carmarthen, and you the said governor to receive the deft., and him safely keep in the said prison for twenty-five days from the arrest under this warrant, or until he shall be sooner discharged by due course of law.

Giffard for the prisoner.—The first objection is now abandoned, as the warrant produced by the officer follows the form given in the schedule to the County Court Act, 19 & 20 Vict. c. 108. It is contended, however, that the previous proceedings authorising the issuing of the warrant should have been proved. This was what is termed a foreign judgment, that is, a judgment obtained in the Cardiganshire County Court sent for execution to Carmarthenshire, and it was incumbent to show the power to make such an order. Assuming that a good warrant to arrest would be a sufficient justification in an action of trespass against the officer acting under it (Andrews v. Marvis, 1 Q. B. 1), yet he is liable for executing a warrant which is objectionable and void (Carratt v. Morley, 1 Q. B. 18); and it is further necessary to show that the warrant is authorised by law: (Ib.) More especially is it necessary to show the authority to issue the warrant where the personal liberty of the subject is involved. In Rex v. Tooley, 2 Lord Raym. 1296, where a person assisting a peace officer to apprehend a woman was slain by one of the prisoners, it was held by a majority of the judges that it was manslaughter only if the woman was unlawfully imprisoned. This case is said, per Alderson, B., in Warner's case, 1 Moo. 385, to have been overruled. In Warner's case interference by a gamekeeper with persons found armed in the pursuit of game on the lands of an adjoining proprietor, without any attempt forcibly to apprehend, was held not a sufficient provocation to reduce a malicious wounding and killing to manslaughter. Foster, J., in his treatise on Crown Law, lays it down that Tooley's case has carried the law in favour of private persons officiously interposing in cases of illegal arrest further than sound reason and policy will warrant. But Carratt v. Morley is conclusive to this extent, that an arrest must be taken to be unlawful if the authority for issuing the warrant is not shown, notwithstanding that an officer acting under it may be protected in a civil action on the ground that if he neglects to execute the writ he is liable to an action. Assuming the arrest to be unlawful, is there any authority for saying that a man may not resist the unlawful apprehension of his person?

[BLACKBURN, J.—In Mackally's case, 9 Co. 65, it was held to be murder to kill an officer acting under process, though erroneous.] That doctrine is inconsistent with the authorities. [WILLIAMS, J.—Morrell v. Martin, 4 Sc. N. R. 430, seems at variance with Carratt v. Morley. There, in an action of replevin, a plea of justification under the Highway Act, setting out a warrant of justices, was held bad for not showing that the justices had jurisdiction over the matter. The case was elaborately argued, and Tindal, C. J. says, at p. 316: "Upon these grounds it appears to us that, where there is a limited authority, and a limited authority only is given, if the party to whom such authority is given extends the exercise of his jurisdiction to objects not within it, his warrant will be no protection to the officer who acts under it; and that by necessary consequence, where the officer justifies under a warrant so granted by a court of limited jurisdiction, he must show that the warrant was granted in a case which fell within such limited jurisdiction." In this case there was nothing to show jurisdiction to issue the warrant at all. In Hawk. P.C. bk. 1, c. 31, s. 61, it is said: "It seems to be agreed that whoever kills a sheriff or any of his officers in the lawful execution of a civil process, as on arresting a person on a capias, &c. is guilty of murder. Neither is it any excuse to such a person that the process was erroneous, for it is not void by being so, &c. Yet the killing of an officer in some cases will be manslaughter only, as when the warrant gives no authority to arrest the party, or where a good warrant is executed in an unlawful manner, &c. No doubt, where the process is erroneous only, it must be set aside before an action can be brought; but there is no case which shows that an arrest under circumstances like the present is lawful. [BLACKBURN, J.—In Rogers's case, Foster's Crown Law, 311, c. 8, s. 8, where, having said that in cases of arrests upon process by writ or warrant, if the officer give notice of his authority, and resistance is made and he is killed, it will be murder, if the notice was true and the process legal. Foster, J. goes on to say that he would not be understood to mean more than, provided the process be not defective in the frame of it and issue in the ordinary course of justice from a court or magistrate having jurisdiction in the case. There may have been irregularity previous to the issuing; but if the officer is killed it will be murder, for he must pay obedience to it. It is sufficient upon an indictment for this murder to produce the writ and warrant without showing the judgment or decree.]

No counsel appeared for the prosecution.

Cnr. adv. vult.

June 1.—POLLOCK, C.B.—We are of opinion that the conviction ought to be affirmed. The process of the County Court was as much a justification to the officer by virtue of the County Court Act as a writ of execution out of a Superior Court to the sheriff; and it is clear that the production of such a writ would be sufficient in a proceeding of this description for assaulting the sheriff or his bailiff, without proof of the judgment: (Foster's Crown Law, 311.) My Brother Williams entertains some doubt, upon the ground that the statute seems to be in terms confined to civil cases; but, upon consideration, we think that the true construction of it is that above stated.

Conviction affirmed.

REG. v. JOSHUA HASSALL.

Fraudulent bailee—Treasurer of a money-club—Larceny—20 & 21 Vict. c. 54, s. 4.

A treasurer of a money-club received small weekly payments from each member, and had authority, with the secretary's consent, to lend the club money to members. There was a periodical division of the funds and profits among the members:

Held, that the treasurer could not be indicted as a fraudulent bailee under the 4th section of 20 & 21 Vict. c. 54, for larceny of moneys paid in by a member.

Case reserved for the opinion of this court.

The prisoner was tried before me at the intermediate sessions for the West Riding of Yorkshire, held at Sheffield on the 1st March 1861, upon an indictment under sect. 4 of the 20 & 21 Vict. c. 54 (the Bailee Act), which charged him with stealing the sum of 2*l.* 14*s.* 1*d.*, the property of John Farrell.

A second count charged the offence as a simple larceny.

It was proved that the prisoner and a man named Richard Shaw agreed early in Jan. 1860, to start a money-club. They succeeded in getting together a number of members, of whom Farrell, the prosecutor, was one, and the club, which was not an enrolled friendly society, continued through the year 1860 to hold weekly meetings at a public-house in Sheffield, called the Travellers' Rest.

Shaw was secretary, the prisoner was treasurer, and they, together with one Bellhouse, formed the committee of management.

The rules of the club were as follow:—"Each member had to deposit weekly a sum of not less than threepence halfpenny, nor more than threepence halfpenny. Members omitting any weekly payments to be subject to a small fine. The odd halfpenny to be expended—1st, on a feast at the end of the year; and, 2ndly, in payment of the services of Shaw, the prisoner, and Bellhouse."

The prisoner alone had the custody of all moneys paid in by members, and the prisoner had authority to lend out of the club money in his hands, provided he first obtained the secretary's written consent to the loan, sums not exceeding 1*l.*, at the rate of 5 per cent. interest, and several sums were thus lent out to members within the year, and repaid with interest. The rule of the club was, that such loans could only be made to members.

On the evening of the 24th April 1860 the club money, which amounted to 39*l.* 13*s.* 1*d.*, was to have been distributed amongst the members in this way. Each member was to receive back the exact amount he had paid in, less the odd halfpenny and the amount of his fines, if any. He was also to receive, in addition, to the sum he had deposited, an equal share of the total amount arising from fines and from interest on loans.

The sum of 2*l.* 14*s.* 1*d.* laid in the indictment was the exact amount paid by John Farrell, the prosecutor, into the prisoner's hands, no part of it being made up of interest or fines. On the morning of the 24th Dec., the day when the distribution of the club money was to have taken place, the prisoner told Shaw that his house had been broken and robbed of the money belonging to the club, and of some of his own. The prisoner attended the club the same evening, and said that, if time was given him, he could pay 20*s.* in the pound.

The result of an examination of the prisoner's house was, that he was given into custody on a charge of stealing the club money.

On the above facts it was contended by the prisoner's counsel, first, that the prisoner was not a bailee of the sum of 2*l.* 14*s.* 1*d.*, within the meaning of the 20 & 21 Vict. c. 54, as this money had been paid into his hands by the prosecutor in small sums, in silver and copper coins, which particular coins he was not bound to return; secondly, that the prisoner was, together with the other members of the committee, trustee of the funds of the club, and could not be indicted under sect. 4; thirdly, that the fact showed a partnership existing between the prosecutor and the prisoner, who could not therefore be convicted.

I overruled the objections, and left the case to the jury, who found the prisoner guilty, whereupon he was sentenced to twelve months' imprisonment with hard labour, until the opinion of the Court for the Consideration of Crown Cases Reserved could be taken, whether on the above facts the prisoner was rightly convicted. WILSON OVEREND, Chairman.

Campbell Foster for the prisoner.—It is submitted that the prisoner was not a bailee of the money mentioned in the indictment within the meaning of the 20 & 21 Vict. c. 54, s. 4, which enacts that, "if any person, being a bailee of any property, shall fraudulently take or convert the same to his own use or the use of any person other than the owner thereof, although he shall not break bulk or otherwise determine the bailment, he shall be guilty of larceny." The word "bailee" in that section must be construed according to its known legal sense; and so construing it, the prisoner was not a depositary of the money, which seems to come nearest to the facts of this case of any of the kinds of bailment pointed out in Coggs v. Bernard, 1 Sm. L. C. 82. The prisoner was not bound to return the particular coins deposited by the members of the club, but his duties were rather like those of a banker than of any other person. A banker is not a bailee of the moneys deposited by customers, but is a debtor to his customers in respect of their deposits: (Pott v. Clegg, 16 M. & W. 321.) [CROMPTON, J.—If anything, the prisoner was a trustee of these moneys under sect. 1 of the statute. Besides these very moneys may have been lent out to members.] The interpretation clause, sect. 17, shows that the word "trustee" means a trustee on some express trust created by deed, will, or written instrument. This is not like Rees v. Howell, 7 C. & P. 325, where the owner of a boat was employed to carry wooden staves from a vessel to the shore in his boat, and it was held to be a bailment. [WILLES, J.—Unless a man is entrusted with a specific thing to be returned, how can he steal it? In this case the prisoner has not stolen the money, he has stolen the debt. WILDE, B.—If the argument is correct that the prisoner was a bailee, he would be equally criminal whether he was ready to pay with other money or not.] In Reg. v. Hoare, 1 Fos. & Fin. 647, it was held, that a person employed to collect debts for another did not thereby become a bailee of the money, not being bound to hand over the particular sum which he had received. Reg. v. Garrett, 2 Fos. & Fin. 14, is also an authority to the same effect.

L. Hamay for the prosecution.—It is admitted that the prisoner was not a trustee within the meaning of the statute, and that, unless he can be regarded as a bailee under the 4th section, the conviction cannot be sustained. In embezzlement, a man may be convicted of stealing something not specific. [WILLES, J.—I have heard Lord Wensleydale say more than once, that a servant was bound to hand over to his master the particular money he received on his account.] That cannot be true in all instances, as where a man is travelling for different houses. There was a bailment of this money to the prisoner within the 5th head, locatio operis faciendi. There was something to be done with respect to it, viz., the prisoner was to lend it out, &c., and he was to receive a salary for his duties. It is not necessary, in all cases, that the specific thing should be returned. In some cases the thing may be altered by additions, or the reverse, or its nature may be changed, as in the case of cloth converted into a coat. Practically one sovereign is the same thing as another. The word "property" in the statute is to include any real or personal property into which the property which may have been the original subject of a trust may have been converted or exchanged, and the proceeds thereof, and anything acquired by such proceeds.

COCKBURN, C. J.—We are all agreed that it is abundantly clear that this conviction cannot be sustained. The indictment is framed upon the 4th section of the 20 & 21 Vict. c. 54, which applies to bailees; and it is only necessary to say that the word bailment must be interpreted according to its ordinary legal acceptance. Understood in that sense, a bailment relates to something in the hands of the bailee which is to be returned in specie, and does not apply to the case of money in the hands of a party who is not under an obligation to return it in precisely the identical coins which he originally received. The present case, therefore, is not within the statute.

The rest of the Court concurring,

Conviction quashed.

EDMUND SMITH AND THE DISTRICT OF TODMORDEN, re LOCAL GOVERNMENT ACT 1858.

Local Government Act 1858—Place within known boundary—Petition—Order—Extending limits—Order on appeal—Time for moving for certiorari.

One-tenth of the inhabitants of a place having no known or defined boundary, presented a petition to the Secretary of State under the provision of the Local Government Act 1858, defining the boundary which they desired to form into a district. The Secretary of State made an order omitting certain property, and including certain other property not mentioned in the petition, and afterwards, on the 16th Feb., the Act was adopted. Appeals were made under the 18th section of the Act, and on the 29th April the Secretary made his order, declaring that the Act should come into operation in the district defined by him at the expiration of one month from that date. The 20th section of the Act provides, that whenever any resolution has been passed in any place, the Act shall, at the expiration of two months from the date of the passing of such resolution, or in the event of an appeal, at such time as may be mentioned in the order made on such appeal, have the force of law within such place. On the 3rd June the applicant, owner of property not included in the petition, but included in the extended boundaries, obtained a rule for a certiorari to bring up the order of the Secretary of State, that the same might be quashed, on the ground that there was no jurisdiction to make such order:

Held, per Wightman and Blackburn, JJ., that the month having expired since the date of the Secretary of State's order of the 29th April, the application was too late.

Cockburn, C. J. dubitante.

This was a rule calling upon the Secretary of State for the Home Department to show cause why a writ of certiorari should not issue to bring up an order of the said secretary, bearing date the 15th Jan. 1861, purporting to settle the boundaries of the district of Todmorden, in the counties of Lancaster and York, for the purposes of the Local Government Act 1858, with a view that such order should be quashed, on the ground that the said Secretary of State had no power to extend the boundaries beyond the limits mentioned and defined in the petition and plan, signed by one-tenth of the ratepayers resident within such boundaries, as required by the 16th section of the Local Government Act 1858 (21 & 22 Vict. c. 98).

It appeared that Todmorden is a village extending into parts of four townships, and has no known or defined boundary. Certain inhabitants wishing to put the village under the operation of the Local Government Act 1858, got up a petition, defining accurately by words and by a plan the extent and limits of the boundaries which they prayed to be formed into a district. The petition was signed by one-tenth of the ratepayers within that district, as required by the 16th section of the Act.

The Secretary of State, after having sent down Mr. Ranger, the inspector appointed for that purpose, made an order omitting certain properties prayed by the petition, but included and brought in to the district certain other properties, viz., a corn-mill at Inchfield worth 150*l.* per annum, belonging to Mr. Smith, who had obtained this rule; a cotton-mill at Square; another cotton-mill at Barewise, and a whole village of thirty-nine cottages at Square—altogether rated at more than 600*l.* per annum, none of which properties were included in the petition, nor asked to form any part of the district, and from the district of which properties neither one-tenth nor any part of the ratepayers were petitioners, and it did not appear that when these properties had been brought into the boundary the persons who signed the petition would reach one-tenth in number of the rate-payers within the boundary, including the properties in question. On the 16th Feb., at a meeting convened for that purpose, the Act was adopted. An appeal was then made by Mr. Smith to the Home Secretary, under the 18th section; but the Secretary finding he could not legally set aside his own order, however irregular, the appeal on that ground was withdrawn, and ultimately the appeals were dismissed on the 29th April last, when the Secretary of State ordered that the Act should come into operation in the said district one month after that date. Under these circumstances, Mr. Smith had obtained the present rule.

Manisty, Q.C. (Welsby with him) now showed cause.—When the steps are adopted laid down by the Act, as necessary to put the Secretary of State in motion, it is for him to define the boundaries, and then it is for the inhabitants to adopt them. The affidavits in answer show that the petition was signed by one-fifth of the ratepayers residing within the boundaries of the Todmorden district as settled by the Home Secretary. The 17th section of the Act gives a power of appeal by petition against the resolution to adopt the Act, but no such appeal has here been had. [COCKBURN, C.J.]—I cannot help thinking that you do not satisfy the requirements of the Act, which says the assent of one-tenth within the boundary shall be necessary, by taking the assent of some persons beyond that boundary; the Secretary may limit, that is to say, give something less, but can he give more without interfering with that provision? WIGHTMAN, J.—Besides, as in the present case, a man beyond the boundary finds himself within it without having been consulted.] The 81st section of the Act makes the order of the Secretary of State binding. The order of the Secretary of State on the appeal, dated 29th April 1861, says that the Local Government Act 1858 shall, within one month from the date thereof, have the force of law within such district. And the 20th section says, that in the event of an appeal the Act shall, at such time as may be mentioned in the order made on such appeal, have the force of a law within such place. The applicant must stand or fall by his appeal.

Wheeler, Serjt. (Aspinall with him) was called on in support.—The order is wholly and radically bad; it is made without jurisdiction. [COCKBURN, C.J.]—Your application for the rule had reference to the 18th and 19th sections; but then we come to the 20th, how do you get over that? The order has been made, and the time mentioned in it has expired.] The conditions precedent have not been properly complied with, therefore the later proceedings are ineffectual and void. Jurisdiction cannot be acquired or exceeded; it must be shown on the face of the proceedings, and if the facts be wrongly set forth they may be rectified by affidavit. The Secretary of State had power to fix a boundary co-extensive with, or of less extent than that named in the petition, but he had no power to go beyond. The 16th section must be read with reference to the other parts of the Act, and the preliminary order being defective, the subsequent order is of no avail.

WIGHTMAN, J.—I am of opinion that this rule ought to be discharged. It may be that the Secretary of State has been somewhat irregular in settling the boundary of this district, although the Act gives him power either to dismiss the petition or make an order as to the boundaries of the place, and it is a question whether he might not, under that authority, do what he has here done. But the vote adopting the Act was either good or bad. Then the 20th section says, whenever any resolution adopting this Act has been passed in any place, this Act shall, at the expiration of two months from the date of the passing of such resolution, or at such time as may be mentioned in the order made on appeal, have the force of law within such place; therefore, when the vote adopting the Act is unappealed against, it becomes law after two months. But here the motion was not made for more than a month after the dismissal of the appeal; the order of the Secretary was made on the 29th April, in which he declared that the Act should come into operation in the district at the expiration of one month from that date, and the motion for this rule was made on the 3rd June. Looking at that section, it seems to me that the time has passed, and that now it is too late to question this order.

BLACKBURN, J.—I am of the same opinion. The 16th section says that any place not having a known or defined boundary, may petition one of her Majesty's Secretaries of State to settle its boundary; that the petition shall state the proposed boundaries of the place, and shall be signed by one-tenth of the ratepayers resident within such boundaries. Now that seems to imply that the petitioners are to point out the boundaries, but then it is for the Secretary of State to settle them. Then in the fifth paragraph of the section, the Secretary of State may "make orders as to the boundaries;" that would seem that he might alter them. Here the objection is, that he has increased the limit of the boundary; on that I give no judgment either way. I am not convinced that he has or has not such power; but the present application is out of time. Whilst the order stood which mentioned this place with a defined boundary, the ratepayers might proceed to adopt the Act, and it seems that on the 16th Feb. a meeting was duly convened for that purpose, at which a resolution was carried to that effect; then an appeal was entered, and on the 29th April the Secretary of State made his final order, directing the Act to operate at the expiration of one month from that date. The 20th section says that after two months from the date of the resolution, or in the event of an appeal then at such time as may be mentioned in the order made on that appeal, the Act shall have the force of law in such place. Now the motion for this rule was made on the 3rd June, and therefore I think that, as the appeal was dismissed on the 29th April, and an order then made directing the Act to come into operation at the expiration of one month from that date, the time had passed, and the Act had the force of law in the district. It is therefore now too late to come for a certiorari, and on that ground alone I decide.

COCKBURN, C.J.—I entertain very serious doubts whether it is competent for a Secretary of State to extend the area of a proposed district beyond the boundaries mentioned in the petition; but although it is unnecessary to decide that, I am desirous that that question should be kept quite open for our consideration if the question should arise again, and the matter is brought before us in time. On the other question I can only say that my mind is not satisfied that the provisions referred to meet the present case. I think there is considerable doubt whether they apply, and whether the whole proceedings do not fail in consequence of the illegality in fixing the boundaries. I however merely desire to express my doubts, and will not delay the decision of the case; neither do I desire that any doubt I may entertain should prevent this rule being discharged.

Croker, attorney for Mr. Smith.

Rule discharged.

PURNELL v. THE WOLVERHAMPTON WATERWORKS COMPANY.

Wolverhampton Waterworks—Express enactment in private Act not repealed by public Act.

In 1845 an Act of Parliament (8 & 9 Vict. c. 135) was passed for supplying the town of Wolverhampton with water, no mention being made in the Act as to the water being laid on at high pressure. In 1855 a new Act (18 & 19 Vict. c. 151) was passed for the same purpose, which by its first section enacted that the Waterworks Clauses Act 1847, should be incorporated in it, sect. 42 of which Act enacted that all the pipes to which fire-plugs should be fixed should be kept at high pressure, the company being liable to a penalty of 10*l.* for non-performance. By sect. 50, however, of the new Act, it was provided that the water to be supplied from any pipe of the company need not be laid on at high pressure.

In 1856 the two companies became amalgamated, by an Act entitled the Wolverhampton Waterworks Transfer Act, in which the Waterworks Clauses Act was incorporated.

A fire having taken place, and there not being a sufficient supply of water, the complainant, on behalf of the corporation, obtained a summons against the company, and, upon the hearing, the magistrate decided that the company were not bound to keep the water on at high pressure, as the General Act was expressly varied and repealed by sect. 40 of the Wolverhampton New Waterworks Act, and the Court Held, upon an appeal from that decision, that the magistrate was right.

Case stated by the stipendiary magistrate of the borough of Wolverhampton.

The complainant alleged that after the making and passing of the Waterworks Clauses Consolidation Act 1847, and the Wolverhampton New Waterworks Act 1855, the defts., and at the time of committing the offence thereafter mentioned, had certain main and other pipes belonging to them in the town and parish of Wolverhampton, in the said county of Stafford, within the limits of the last-mentioned Act, for the supply of water according to the provisions of the said Acts, and had certain fire-plugs fixed thereto for the supply of water for extinguishing fire, according to the provisions of the said Acts; yet that the defts., on the 10th Oct. 1860, did not keep charged with water the said pipes so belonging unto them, and to which fire-plugs were so fixed, in the town and parish aforesaid, within the limits aforesaid, but then and there wholly neglected so to do, though not prevented from so doing by frost, unusual drought, or unavoidable cause or accident, or during necessary repairs.

A penalty of 10*l.* attaches to the offence.

The complainant relied upon the provisions of the following statutes, 8 & 9 Vict. c. 135 (the Wolverhampton Waterworks Act) ss. 53, 54, 55, 68 and 69. Also the Waterworks Clauses Consolidation Act 1847 (10 Vict. c. 17), particularly ss. 1, 35, 42, 43, and 85. Also the Wolverhampton New Waterworks Act 1855 (18 & 19 Vict. c. 151), the first section of which enacts that "The Company's Clauses Consolidation Act 1845, the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act 1845, and the Waterworks Clauses Act 1847 shall, except as herein otherwise provided, be incorporated with and form part of this Act." Also the Wolverhampton Waterworks Transfer Act 1856 (19 & 20 Vict. c. 57), particularly ss. 3, 6, 16 and 17.

TAYLOR v. HUMPHREYS.

[C. B.]

The complainant contended that as to one of the defts.'s pipes, to which there was a fire-plug fixed, namely, the one in Temple-street, if it was supplied with water, yet that the water was not laid on under a sufficient degree of pressure to satisfy the requirements of sections 35 & 42 of 10 Vict. c. 17; and he also endeavoured to prove that as to another pipe to which a fire-plug was fixed, namely, the one in Church-street, there was no water in it on the night in question, until the service-cock in Ablow-street was turned, and the pipes thus filled and put under high pressure. The complainant also contended that by the Wolverhampton Waterworks Transfer Act 1856, whereby the works of the Wolverhampton Waterworks Company in the last mentioned Act, called "the old company," were transferred to the Wolverhampton New Waterworks Company, and which last-mentioned Act, also by sect. 3, incorporated the Waterworks Clauses Act 1847 therewith, without restriction as applicable to both undertakings, which, according to their preamble, were to be worked as one undertaking. The new company had become liable to all the duties and obligations to which the old company were subject, consequently, that sect. 40 of the New Waterworks Companies' Act was in effect repealed.

The defts. contended that they were not subject to the provisions of sect. 42 of the 10 Vict. c. 17, because in that respect such last mentioned Act was expressly varied and accepted by sect. 40 of the Wolverhampton New Waterworks Act 1855 (13 & 14 Vict. c. 74); and therefore that they were not required to keep the water under the pressure mentioned in sect. 35 of the 10 Vict. c. 17. They also contended that the Wolverhampton Waterworks Act 1845 did not apply; and that, if it did, it did not impose any penalty for the offence charged, and the same having passed before the Waterworks Clauses Act 1847, there was nothing in the latter Act which could form part of, or be incorporated with, the former Act; that the expression "special Act" in the Waterworks Clauses Act 1847, was by sect. 2 of that Act construed to mean any Act which should thereafter be passed authorising the construction of the waterworks, and inasmuch as the Wolverhampton Transfer Act 1856 is not a special Act for the construction of waterworks, there was nothing in that Act to render the defts. liable to a penalty. They also argued that, if they kept their mains and pipes constantly charged with water, they must of necessity keep the water on at high pressure, which, as they contended, was not required of them. It is admitted that the works of the old company have become entirely vested in the new company.

The magistrate found, amongst other things, that the 40th section of the Wolverhampton New Waterworks Act 1855 was not repealed by the Wolverhampton Waterworks Transfer Act 1856, and that the defts. were therefore not compellable to keep their mains and pipes charged with water under the pressure mentioned in sect. 35 of the 10 Vict. c. 17, and that the defts. were not bound to keep water laid on in their pipes and mains under a degree of pressure as enacted by the general Act of 1847, as that Act was expressly varied and repealed by the 40th section of the Wolverhampton New Waterworks Act 1855.

Tomlinson appeared for the app., and cited The Lancashire and Yorkshire Railway Company v. Egan, 15 Beav. 322.

J. J. Powell for the resps.

ERLE, C.J.—The question raised before the justices of the peace was whether the company were bound to keep the water in their pipes at high pressure. The magistrate has found that they were not bound to do so, and I am of opinion that he was right; the case states that the town was supplied by two companies, the old and the new. I have looked at both the Acts, and I am clearly of opinion that the old company was not under any obligation to keep the water in their pipes at high pressure; and the new company are, by sect. 40 of this Act expressly exempted; therefore, down to the passing of the Transfer Act, when the old and the new company became amalgamated, neither company were under any obligation to keep the water on at high pressure as contended for by the complainant. Now, as to the Act of 19 & 20 Vict. c. 57, which is the Transfer Act, sect. 3 of that Act says that the Waterworks Clauses Act 1847 is to be incorporated in it; and sect. 43 of that Act enacts that the pipes are to be charged under high pressure; but that Act provides that any special Act may vary it, but it is incorporated without variation or exception. I think there is a great deal in Mr. Powell's argument, that these public Acts do not repeal sections of other private Acts except by express enactment, and that where there is an express proviso in a private Act, it is not to be repealed by a public Act; if the Legislature had intended to repeal these private Acts they might have done so, but I think they have not, nor intended to repeal it. The effect of the Transfer Act is to annihilate the old company, and to merge it in the new, and the new company are by their own Act exempted from keeping the water on at high pressure, and therefore my judgment must be for the resps.

WILLIAMS, J.—I am of the same opinion, and quite concur with what has fallen from my Lord, and think that sect. 40 of the new company's Act has not been repealed. Mr. Tomlinson has argued that an obligation has been cast on the old company by their amendment Act, but I think in this he has failed; his argument turns upon whether the words "recited Act" mean the Waterworks Clauses Act. I am of opinion that they have not that meaning, and that the only "recited Act" is The Wolverhampton original Waterworks Act. Sect. 15 of the Transfer Act no doubt casts the same obligation on the new company as the old had, and therefore they are bound to do the same as the old, and the app. has failed to show that any such obligation as to the old ever existed.

TAYLOR (app.) v. HUMPHREYS (resp.).

Innkeeper—Supplying refreshments during hours of Divine service on Sunday—18 & 19 Vict. c. 118, s. 2—"Traveller."

Three persons who had walked from Birmingham, a distance of four miles, called at an inn between the hours of three and five o'clock on Sunday afternoon, and demanded refreshment, stating, in reply to the landlord, that they were travellers. They were admitted, and, after smoking and drinking there, two of them returned on foot, and the third by an omnibus to Birmingham.

On information laid the magistrates, considering that the men had walked the said distance for amusement or exercise only, and were therefore not travellers within the 18 & 19 Vict. c. 118, s. 2, convicted the landlord:

Held, that the conviction was wrong, the men being travellers within the exception in sect. 2, following Atkinson v. Sellers, 28 L. J. 72, C. P.; 32 L. T. Rep. 178.

This was a special case, stated for the opinion of this court, under 20 & 21 Vict. c. 43.

Case.—At a petty sessions held at King's-heath, in the county of Worcester, on the 5th April 1861, Richard Taylor, licensed victualler, carrying on business at a place called Alcester Lane's-end, appeared before the undersigned James Lloyd, Richard William Johnson and Thomas Lane, Esqrs., three of her Majesty's justices of the peace for the said county, in answer to an information under the 18 & 19 Vict. c. 118, s. 2, charging him with having, on Sunday, the 24th March then last, at the parish of King's Norton, in the said county, and otherwise than to a traveller or lodger therein, kept open his house and premises for the sale of wines, spirits, beer and other fermented and distilled liquors, between three and five o'clock in the afternoon, contrary to the statute in that case made and provided. It was proved that at a quarter-past four o'clock in the afternoon of the day mentioned in the information, five men were in the house of the deft. drinking ale and smoking; that one of the men was the driver and another the conductor of a public omnibus which runs several times daily from Birmingham to the deft.'s house and back, plying for passengers on its way, and which had been driven there that afternoon as usual; that the three other persons had walked from Birmingham that afternoon and called at the deft.'s house, a distance of four miles, and afterwards returned thence to Birmingham, two by the omnibus and the third on foot; that the deft. asked these three persons if they were travellers, and admitted them on receiving answers in the affirmative. The deft. contended that the five men, having come a distance of four miles from their homes, were travellers within the meaning of the statute, whether for business or for pleasure. We, however, considered that the three men not connected with the omnibus, having merely walked the above-mentioned distance from their homes for amusement or exercise, were not travellers within the meaning of the statute, and that it was not the intention of the Legislature to throw open public houses on Sundays to persons living within a few miles, and who might choose to walk or ride there for pastime, and fined the deft. in the mitigated penalty of 1s. and costs.

The deft. being dissatisfied with the decision, requested us to sign and state a special case for the consideration of one of her Majesty's courts of law at Westminster, which we hereby do accordingly.

Hayes, Serjt. for the app.—The question here arises under 18 & 19 Vict. c. 118, s. 2, and the consideration of the enactment in this section has been recently entertained by the court in the case of Atkinson v. Sellers, 5 C. B. N.S., 442; 28 L. J. 72, C. P.; 5 Jur. N.S. 21; 32 L. T. Rep. 178. The present case is precisely like that, unless the court will hold there is a distinction between pedestrians and persons riding in an omnibus. Here the innkeeper is found to have asked the persons whether they were travellers, and was answered that they were. Now, if the innkeeper makes such inquiry bonâ fide of strangers, and believes the answer, he is clearly not liable. What can he do more? The true test is, whether the person asking for refreshment is a resident or a stranger to the place. A person who goes away some distance from his home is a traveller, it matters not whether he has walked or ridden. Indeed, a man who walks needs refreshment more than one who rides. The justices held that the driver and conductor of the omnibus were to be regarded as travellers within the exception in the statute.

Keane contra.—The effect of the case of Atkinson v. Sellers has not been considered as closely by Hayes, Serjt. as he usually scrutinises cases. The court there said that the justices were not bound to convict. The case finds that the men went into the house, not for refreshment, but to smoke and drink. Now, drinking might be refreshing and necessary, but smoking is not. The object of the statute was to prevent public-houses becoming "boosing kens" on Sunday.—[ERLE, C.J.—It is the animus with which the publican opens his door which makes him liable to be fined.] There are two offences pointed at by the second section—keeping open the house to sell, and then selling. [ERLE, C.J.—It is the same idea expressed in two forms of words.] It is not enough that the men told the landlord they were travellers: the landlord of a public-house is not to set the statute at defiance by simply putting the question, "Aye or no, are you a traveller?" It is a fact found by the justices that these men went to the inn for pastime and were there drinking and smoking. They cannot, therefore, be regarded as travellers within the meaning of this Act.

ERLE, C.J.—This was an appeal against the conviction of a licensed victualler by justices, for keeping open his house for the sale of beer, and for selling beer to persons, not travellers, between the hours of three and five o'clock on Sunday afternoon. We are extremely desirous to give effect to the intention of the Legislature to prevent public-houses from being kept open during the hours of divine service on Sundays, by which allurements persons are enticed away from church who otherwise might be there, and we are also anxious, so far as we can, to give full effect to the intention of the magistrates to prevent the population of towns resorting to places a small distance off where, during the prohibited hours, they may smoke and drink. But we think that the facts, as found in the case, and on which the justices convicted, do not authorize a conviction. The persons whom he admitted to his house, and to whom he gave refreshment, had walked from Birmingham a distance of four miles, and demanded refreshment, stating in answer to the innkeeper's inquiry that they were travellers, upon this he admitted them; they afterwards returned to Birmingham, two on foot and one by an omnibus. Now, if either for business or pleasure these men went such a distance into the country, they would I think be within the exception in the statute. I do not think that the Legislature intended to prohibit the giving refreshment to such persons in such a case as the present. In giving this judgment we are guided by the decision of this court in Atkinson v. Sellers. It is impossible to mistake the tenor of that judgment; it seems to me to lay down that when a person comes from a town distant some five miles off, and refreshment is given to him as a traveller, he is within the exception in the statute, and falls under the description of a traveller within the meaning of the Act of Parliament.

COURT OF APPEAL IN CHANCERY.

Reported by C. H. KEENE and THOMAS BROOKSBANK, Esqrs., Barristers-at-Law.

(Before the LORD CHANCELLOR (Campbell).)

THE ECCLESIASTICAL COMMISSIONERS FOR ENGLAND AND COURTENAY v. THE VESTRY OF THE PARISH OF ST. JAMES AND ST. JOHN, CLERKENWELL.
Ecclesiastical Commissioners—Erection of church—Metropolis Local Management Act—"Line of buildings in a street."

The Ecclesiastical Commissioners having acquired a site for the erection of a church within one of the metropolitan districts, the church was built, and had been raised six feet, when the vestry of the district interfered, alleging that the building was being erected several feet beyond "the regular line of buildings" in the street. An application was made for the consent of the Metropolitan Board of Works, which was refused. The erection being attempted to be continued, the vestry pulled down part of the building, and the Commissioners thereupon filed a bill for an injunction. Stuart, V.C., held that upon the construction of the Metropolis Local Management Act, 18 & 19 Vict. c. 120, s. 143, and the Amendment Act, 19 & 20 Vict. s. 3, the powers of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners relating to the affairs of the Church were reserved to them, and exempted them from the operation of the Local Management Act, and granted a perpetual injunction. On appeal the decision was reversed.

This was an appeal from a decision of Stuart, V. C., granting an injunction in a suit instituted by the Ecclesiastical Commissioners for England and the Rev. Anthony Lefroy Courtenay, against the vestry of the parish of St. James and St. John, Clerkenwell, for the purpose of restraining their servants, agents and workmen from pulling down, destroying, or damaging the church in Penton-street, or the chancel thereof, or any part now erected or hereafter to be erected, and from obstructing, impeding, or interfering with the erection thereof; and the bill also prayed that the defts. might be decreed to make compensation for the damage caused to the said church or the chancel thereof by reason of the defts. having pulled down and demolished the same, and for all other the injury done to or about the same respectively by the defts., their servants, agents, or workmen. The facts were these:—In the year 1853 several leading inhabitants of the parish of Pentonville held public meetings, appointed a committee, and organised measures for severing the district, which was now the district of Pentonville, from the parish of Clerkenwell; and in the month of April 1854 Pentonville was constituted an ecclesiastical district by an order in council. Steps were then taken towards building a new church. A site was purchased in Penton-street from Major Penton by the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, in whom it was now vested; and in the month of July or Aug. 1860 a plan and description of the site and of the church to be built thereon was submitted to, and was eventually approved by the commissioners, and the site and the freehold thereof were conveyed to and vested in the Ecclesiastical Commissioners in accordance with the provisions of the Acts of Parliament. The plt. Anthony Lefroy Courtenay, who was formerly the minister of St. James's Chapel, Pentonville, situate close to Pentonville-hill, was appointed the incumbent of the new district, and in him the freehold of the church and of the site thereof would, upon its consecration, be vested. He entered into contracts and commenced the erection of the church, and a considerable number of workmen were engaged on it for some months, and the church had been reared to a height of about five feet above the level of the ground. By the

18 & 19 Vict. c. 120 (the Metropolis Local Management Act), the defts. were constituted a body corporate, and certain powers and authorities were thereby given to them for (amongst other things) maintaining the regularity of the line of buildings in the streets within their district, and it was enacted by sect. 143 that "no building shall, without the consent in writing of the Metropolitan Board of Works, be erected beyond the regular line of buildings in the street in which the same is situate, in case the distance of such line of buildings from the highway do not exceed thirty feet, or within thirty feet of the highway, where the distance of the line of buildings therefrom amounts to or exceeds thirty feet, notwithstanding there being gardens or vacant spaces between the line of buildings and the highway; and in case any buildings be erected contrary to this enactment, it shall be lawful for the vestry or district board in whose parish or district such building is situate to cause the same to be demolished or set back, as the case may require, and to recover the expenses incurred by them from the owner of the premises in manner provided by this Act."

The defts., within whose district the church was situate, interfered with the building thereof, alleging that the church was being erected about ten feet beyond the regular line of buildings in Penton-street, and that the building as proposed by the plan was an infringement of the Act of Parliament, and interdicted by the 143rd section, and they threatened and intended forcibly to level to the ground a large portion of the chancel of the church, and had, in fact, sent a number of workmen upon the site, who had to some extent pulled down and demolished the chancel. The plts. charged that the church was not, nor was the chancel, or any part thereof, erected beyond the regular line of buildings in the street, within the meaning of the Act; and submitted that, even if that were so, a church or ecclesiastical edifice was not within its purview.

Dr. Courtenay memorialised the Metropolitan Board of Works, and thereupon a special meeting of the vestry was called by Mr. Pascall, who was a prominent member. At that meeting a deputation of the vestry to the board of works upon the subject of resisting the erection of the church, composed, as Dr. Courtenay alleged, almost entirely of directors, was appointed, and a memorial to the board was prepared. In the course of the same day the inhabitants of Penton-street were canvassed for signatures and eighteen were procured. The result was, that the Metropolitan Board of Works refused to give their consent to the erection of the church, on the ground that the same was opposed by the local authorities.

The bill alleged that the district surveyor had reported to the Metropolitan Board of Works that the chancel of the church was not erected beyond the regular line of buildings in the street; that the building had been approved by the proper ecclesiastical authorities; and that all requirements in regard thereto imposed by the Acts of Parliament under which the Ecclesiastical Commissioners were constituted had been complied with.

On the 4th Jan. 1861 the defts. caused a part of the tower and chancel, which they alleged to be in front of the line of buildings in the street, to be pulled down; whereupon the bill was filed.

On the 14th Feb. the plts. moved for an injunction against the defts. in the terms of the prayer of the bill above set forth, and after some discussion it was by consent of all parties turned into a motion for a decree.

From the affidavit in support of the motion, it appeared that a memorial in favour of the erection of the church had been signed by fifty inhabitants of Penton-street, eight of whom had, as alleged, signed the memorial to the Board of Works under misrepresentation or misapprehension. Two of the fifty signatures were given by the occupiers of two houses adjoining the church.

By the 58 Geo. 3, c. 45, it was enacted that it should be lawful for the commissioners for building new churches to accept and take any building or buildings fit to be used for, or to be converted into, additional churches or chapels, and also any lands, tenements and hereditaments proper for sites of additional churches or chapels, not exceeding in quantity in any one place what might be sufficient for building a new church or chapel, providing a churchyard, and making a proper and sufficient access and approach thereto, from any persons willing to give the same; and every such site, when conveyed to the commissioners and the church erected thereupon, and notice thereof given to the bishop of the diocese, should become for ever thereafter devoted to ecclesiastical purposes only, in order that the same might be consecrated by the bishop to public worship according to the rites of the United Church of England and Ireland as by law established; and also that it should be lawful for the commissioners to build, or cause to be built, churches or chapels, under the provisions of the Act, upon such plans as they should deem most expedient for the affording fit and proper accommodation for the largest number of persons at the least expense.

By subsequent Acts of Parliament power was given to the commissioners to advance and lend such sum of money as to them might appear to be required and expedient for or in aid of building additional churches and chapels, and also to make grants for the like purposes.

By the 19 & 20 Vict. c. 53, all the powers and authorities then vested in the commissioners for building new churches were transferred to, and the same are now vested in, the plts., the Ecclesiastical Commissioners for England, who were, by an Act passed in the 6 & 7 Will. 4, duly constituted a body corporate with perpetual succession.

The V. C. having granted a perpetual injunction in the terms of the prayer of the bill, with the additional words, "and from in any manner interfering to prevent the erection of the chancel or any part of the church" (vide ante, p. 83), the deft. now brought the present appeal.

The LORD CHANCELLOR.—It is with great reluctance and with great pain that I feel myself compelled to say I think that the decree appealed against must be reversed. It seems to me, as far as my observation goes, that no harm would have followed to the public or to any individual if this chancel had been allowed to be erected and remain; but I think that it is erected contrary to law, and the law must prevail. If it had been, as was suggested, that the commissioners had a power before the passing of the Metropolis Local Management Act to erect a building with such a protection, I should have thought that they still retained it, but I find that it is now clearly shown that they had no such power. Under the 14th section of the Act of Geo. 3, it was forbidden, and under the 1st Act of Parliament that passed the same day as the Metropolis Management Act, it is forbidden. It is expressly forbidden, and therefore it is unlawful.

Now, can it be said that the sections relied upon by Mr. Malins gave a power to dispense with the law? It is impossible; it could only preserve the power which the commissioners before had. But they had no such power, and it would be monstrous to say that these sections that are referred to were meant to confer a power upon them of dispensing with the general law when they thought it convenient. That being so, it was unlawful, and by the express enactment of the 143rd section, if the building be erected beyond the general line of the buildings of the street in which the same is situate, then without the consent in writing of the Metropolitan Board of Works, it may be dealt with as the subsequent part of that section provides. Therefore I cannot say that this court has any power to grant an injunction against that being done which the law permits. I regret it exceedingly, but in the discharge of my duty I am bound to say that I think the V. C. took an erroneous view on this subject and that his decree must be reversed. The bill I think must be reversed, but under the circumstances without costs; and I would still throw out a hope that there may be some amicable arrangement, and that the meritorious and laudable hopes of those who wish this church to be completed may not be disappointed.

CARDINALL v. MOLYNEUX.

Injunction to restrain the incumbent of a church from altering the interior arrangements of a church—Scheme for restoration of church approved by chief clerk—Order directing the incumbent to restore the same—Jurisdiction.

The Court of Ch. has no jurisdiction to order the incumbent of a church, who had made certain alterations in the building by removing the pews, &c., and substituting chairs, to take the necessary proceedings to obtain a faculty from the bishop of the diocese for the restoration of the church.

An injunction was granted to restrain the alteration of the walls or brickwork of the church without the authority of the archdeacon or bishop, on the plt.'s undertaking to apply to the proper ecclesiastical court for authority to restore the church to its original state.

This was an appeal from two orders made by Stuart, V.C. The bill was filed by George Cardinall, one of the churchwardens of the parish of St. Gregory, Sudbury, on behalf of himself and all other the parishioners of the parish, against the Rev. John William Henry Molyneux, the incumbent of the parish, and William Rowland Rolfe and George Grimwood.

About nine months before the filing of the bill, Mr. Molyneux caused the church to be closed for the purpose of effecting certain repairs to the roof. This proceeding, it was alleged, was taken without the consent of the plt. or of the parishioners, and without the immediate authority of the bishop. The bishop's surveyor afterwards reported the repairs, and it was then considered that Mr. Molyneux was no longer acting without the bishop's authority. On the 30th March 1859 Mr. Molyneux caused the pews of the church, and also a large gallery at the west end, to be cut down, severed and removed. For this purpose he employed the deft. George Grimwood, who was a builder; and on the same day the deft. Rolfe, who was an auctioneer, published a placard in Sudbury, advertising for sale on the following day a quantity of building materials, consisting of doors, door-frames, sashes, casements, two staircases, pannelling, &c. arising from the repairs of the church of St. Gregory. The plt. thereupon, on the morning of the 31st March, served Mr. Grimwood with a notice,

[CHAN.]

addressed to all three defts., not to remove, sell, or dispose of the pews and sittings, or the materials thereof, and that it was his intention to apply for an injunction. The bill was filed on the same day. It prayed that the defts. Molyneux and Grimwood, and their respective agents, &c., might be restrained by injunction from further destroying, cutting down, severing, or removing the pews and sittings, or in the said church, or any of them, or the gallery of the said church, or any of the other internal fixtures and fittings of the said church, or any of the materials or pannelled work forming the said pews, sittings, gallery fixtures and fittings respectively, or of which the same respectively are or were composed; and that the said defts. might be restrained from selling or disposing of, or putting up or exposing or offering for sale, or holding any sale by auction, of the building materials and pannelled work mentioned in the said published notice or advertisement or particulars of sale before mentioned, or any of them, or the said pews, gallery fixtures and fittings respectively or any of them, or any of the materials or pannelled work of which the same respectively were composed. An injunction restraining the sale was granted by Stuart, V.C. on the same day, the 31st March. In the afternoon of that day a telegraphic dispatch, containing notice of the order, was served upon Mr. Rolfe whilst in the act of selling one of the lots on the Market-hill, at Sudbury. The plt.'s evidence went to show that the deft. Rolfe disregarded the notice, and went on with the sale for about half an hour afterwards; also that the deft. Grimwood was standing by; that he knew of the contents of the dispatch, but nevertheless assisted to continue the sale. Notice of motion on the 4th April ensuing, to commit the defts. Grimwood and Rolfe for contempt, was served on them the same evening. On or about the 4th April 1859 the plt. filed a supplemental bill on behalf of himself and all the parishioners of St. George's, Sudbury, against the Rev. Mr. Molyneux and George Grimwood. It stated that, notwithstanding the order of the 31st March, Mr. Molyneux had removed the pews and sittings, was then taking and pulling up the floor of the church, and placing brickwork there, with the intention of raising portions of the floor and substituting chairs and benches for pews; and was, in fact, so altering the floor of the church, and materials of which it was formed, as to render the same unsuitable for pews. Mr. Molyneux was also about to remove the west window of the church, and to place a new window in lieu thereof. He was also causing a hole to be cut in the brickwork of the outer wall on the south side of the church, for the purpose of effecting some alteration, the nature of which was unknown to the plt. The deft. Grimwood was the person employed in carrying out these alterations, which were being made without the consent of the plt. as one of the churchwardens, without the consent of the bishop or of the parishioners, and without any licence or faculty in that behalf. The supplemental bill prayed that the defts., their agents, &c., might be restrained from taking up or altering, or causing to be taken up or altered, the floor of the said church, or altering, or causing to be altered, any of the walls or brickwork of or in the said church, or executing or causing to be executed any works or alterations affecting the floor, walls, or brickwork of the said church, or affecting the internal arrangement or structure of the said church, or any of the pannelled work, fixtures, or fittings pertaining thereto (and further, by amendment on the 26th May 1860), "until a faculty for the purpose had been duly obtained." The supplemental bill also prayed that the defts., or one of them, might be decreed to account for and pay to the parishioners of the said parish, or the churchwardens of the said parish, for and on account of the parishioners, the value (to be ascertained in such manner as the court should think fit) of the said pews, sittings, gallery fixtures and fittings, so destroyed or removed as aforesaid, and of all and every other the materials and effects belonging or pertaining to the said church, which had been destroyed, removed, or taken away, by or under the directions of the defts. or either of them, and should replace or restore, or pay the costs and charges of replacing and restoring the said pews, sittings, gallery fixtures, fittings, materials and effects.

On the 20th April an interim order for an injunction against the two defts. Mr. Molyneux and Grimwood, in the terms of the first paragraph of the prayer of the supplemental bill, i. e. restraining them from altering the floor of the church, &c., was granted until the following day, and on the 21st April the injunction was enlarged till the 5th May, and the motion on behalf of the plt. to attach the defts. Grimwood and Rolfe for contempt of the injunction of the 31st March was also ordered to stand over till the same date. From the evidence it appeared that on the same day, 21st April, Mr. Molyneux, and Mr. Hassell, his churchwarden, issued handbills to the effect that, notwithstanding the incomplete state of the repairs of the church, in order to carry out the original intention, and to prevent disappointment to the parishioners, it was determined to use the church in the afternoon in its present rough and disordered state. On the same day a large number of chairs, about 200, were placed in the church, and divine service was held in the church in the afternoon of Easter Sunday, the 24th April following. The two motions again stood over from the 5th to the 12th May. On the latter day the V.C., after hearing the evidence, granted an injunction restraining the defts. Messrs. Molyneux and Grimwood, their agents, &c., "from taking up or altering, or causing to be taken up or altered, the floor of the parish church of St. Gregory, in Sudbury, in the county of Suffolk, in the plt.'s supplemental bill mentioned, or altering or causing to be altered any of the walls or brickwork of and in the said church, or executing or causing to be executed any works or alterations affecting the floor, walls, or brickwork of the said church, or affecting the internal arrangements or structure of the said church, or any of the pannelled work, fixtures, or fittings pertaining thereto, until the hearing of the cause." And it was further ordered "that the plt. and defts. and any of the churchwardens of the parish of St. Gregory, Sudbury, in the county of Suffolk, should be at liberty to lay before the judge to whose court the said cause was attached proposals for fitting up the interior of the parish church of St. Gregory aforesaid, and providing proper accommodation therein for the minister and parishioners of the said parish for the performance of divine service, but such proposals were to be subject to the approbation of the bishop and archdeacon of the diocese of Ely." And with regard to the motion for the committal of the defts. Greenwood and Rolfe, it was ordered that each of them should pay to the plt. "the sum of 15*l.* towards his costs of such motion," and on their expressing their contrition, that no further order should be made on the motion. In compliance with this order the plt. and the defts. each sent in proposals. The main point of difference was as to the pews. The plt. proposed that the pews which had been removed should be replaced; the defts. proposed to find benches for seating the congregation, as far as the present seating by chairs and benches was insufficient. As to the gallery also at the west end of the church the plt. proposed that it should be replaced on a plan to be approved by the bishop, and the organ restored therein; the defts. proposed to erect the organ at the east end of the north aisle, and to open and glaze the west window, which was partially bricked up. These proposals were laid before the bishop, who made several observations thereon. As to the pews he had the strongest objection to chairs. He was not averse to a gallery with an organ therein, but not having a plan of the church before him he could form no opinion whether it should be on the old site. He repeatedly and strongly urged that nothing should be carried into effect without a faculty. Further replies were sent by the plt. and observations returned by the bishop, and the whole of the documents were laid before the chief clerk. The matter stood over for a time to enable Mr. Molyneux to apply for a faculty. In May 1860 the deft. Mr. Molyneux, and James Hassell, his churchwarden, presented a petition to the chancellor of the diocese of Ely, praying for a faculty to perform the works set forth in the petition, and a citation was issued under the seal of the chancellor of the diocese. It recited the petition, alleging that the following further works were required to complete the restoration of the church: the floor of the church to be completed, the pulpit to be re-erected in its former position, and the sounding-board to be removed; a new reading-desk to be erected; the font to be placed at the north-west end of the nave; the organ to be placed at the east end of the north aisle. In addition to the present accommodation, to complete the seating of the church with benches similar to the best of those now in the church; the bricks which at present block up part of the west window to be removed, and glass substituted, and the windows of the church generally repaired and, where necessary, reglazed, and the walls repaired. The petitioner alleged further, that a meeting of the incumbent, churchwardens, parishioners and inhabitants of the parish was held in vestry on the 10th May 1860, at which the said proposed works were approved, and that the cost, estimated at 270*l.*, was intended to be raised, and was for the most part already raised, by voluntary subscription, without a church-rate. The citation then recited the prayer for a faculty, and cited the parishioners to appear and show cause against the faculty before the surrogate at St. Mary's Church, Cambridge, on the 26th May. The present accommodation, referred to in the petition, was the providing of loose chairs instead of benches or pews.

The court was adjourned till the 9th June. On the 7th June Mr. Gooday, the plt.'s solicitor, as he deposed, called with the plt. George Cardinall upon Mr. Molyneux, for the purpose of endeavouring to come to some terms or arrangement respecting the fitting up of the church, but Mr. Molyneux declined any such arrangement. On Saturday the 9th June Mr. Gooday attended the hearing of the application for the faculty, on behalf of the plt. and other inhabitants. He stated in his affidavit that he opposed the granting of such faculty, except in strict accordance with the decision and approval of the bishop. Mr. Molyneux also attended and refused to modify or alter his application. Thereupon, after hearing both sides, the court refused to decree the faculty, on the ground, as Mr. Gooday alleged, that the deft. did not propose to carry the refitting of the said church in accordance with the bishop's suggestions and approvals. The chief clerk made his certificate, dated 3rd Dec. 1860, whereby he certified that, in pursuance of the order of the 12th May 1859, the plt. and the deft. Mr. Molyneux had each laid before the judges proposals for fitting up the interior of the church and providing better accommodation, &c.; and that it would be fit and proper that such interior should be fitted up, and such accommodation provided according to the plan thereto annexed, which plan had been approved of by the bishop and archdeacon of the diocese of Ely, as was admitted by the plt. and the defts. The plan was as follows:—

"1. The church to be properly floored and fitted up with single pews, according to the plan of the pews in modern churches, or with open benches. The question of the general style and character of the pews or benches to be settled in the proceedings requisite for obtaining a faculty.

"2. The font to be placed at the west end of the church.

"3. The pulpit to be lowered, and a new reading-desk erected, as shown on plan, and the sounding-board to be removed. The pulpit and reading-desk to be in character with the general fittings of the church.

"4. The organ to be placed as shown on the plan (i.e. between the north aisle and the chancel).

"5. The west window of the church to be opened and properly glazed."

The V. C. approved the certificate on the 10th Dec.

The cause then came on upon the motion for a decree, before Stuart, V. C. (vide ante, p. 136), when his Honour, by his order made in both suits, dated the 13th March, ordered a perpetual injunction, and ordered that the defts. should concur in and take such proceedings as should be necessary for obtaining a faculty from the bishop of the diocese for repairing and restoring the said church according to the scheme set out in the chief clerk's certificate therein referred to; and further ordered that the scheme set out in the chief clerk's certificate, dated 3rd Dec. 1860, for repairing and restoring the said church, should be carried into effect; and that the defts. should pay to the plt. his costs of suit, excepting the costs of the affidavits used on the application for committal of the said defts. The defts. then brought the present appeal, seeking to reverse the two orders, dated respectively the 12th May 1859 and 13th March 1861.

Bacon, Q.C. and E. K. Karslake appeared for the plt., and as to the constitution of the suit referred to Spencer v. The London and Birmingham Railway Company, 8 Sim. 199; 15 & 16 Vict. c. 86, s. 42, rule 5; Blenkinsop v. Blenkinsop, 1 De G. M. & G. 495.

Malins, Q.C. and Surrage, for the defts., the appa., contended that the court had no power to grant the injunction; it was granted to restrain acts that had already been done. There was no allegation in the bill that the plt. had any property or interest in the church beyond what the other parishioners had, and therefore the suit should have been commenced by information at the suit of the Attorney-General. The Ecclesiastical Court was the proper tribunal to have dealt with the matter. They referred to the case of Dewdney v. Good and Ford, 7 Jur. N. S. 637.

The LORD CHANCELLOR, after expressing his regret that the parish church should have been closed by these proceedings for so long a period, said that the court had no power to compel a restoration of the church, nor indeed to grant the injunction; but his Lordship thought that the defts. had shown acquiescence in respect of the injunction, and therefore that part of the order of the V.C. would not be disturbed. The order of the 12th May 1859 was clearly wrong in directing that proposals should be laid before the judge in chambers for the fitting up of the interior of the church, and must be reversed, as well as those portions of the order of the 13th March 1861 which directed that the defts. should concur in and take such proceedings as should be necessary for obtaining a faculty; and that the scheme set out in the chief clerk's certificate, dated the 3rd Dec. 1860, should be carried into effect. The plt. must undertake to apply to the proper ecclesiastical court for authority to complete the restoration of the interior of the church, on his doing which the order for the injunction might continue. The words "without the authority of the bishop or archdeacon" should be added at the end of the latter part of the order for the injunction. The bill must be dismissed against the defts. Grimwood and Rolfe, but without costs. The deft. Molyneux to pay the costs of the suit, but not such costs as were consequent upon those parts of the orders of the V.C. authorising proposals to be laid before him in chambers. There would abundantly clear that this conviction cannot be sustained. The indictment is framed upon the 4th section of the 20 & 21 Vict. c. 54, which applies to bailees; and it is only necessary to say that the word bailment must be interpreted according to its ordinary legal acceptance. Understood in that sense, a bailment relates to something in the hands of the bailee which is to be returned in specie, and does not apply to the case of money in the hands of a party who is not under an obligation to return it in precisely the identical coins which he originally received. The present case, therefore, is not within the statute.

Local Government Act 1858—Place within known boundary—Petition—Order—Extending limits—Order on appeal—Time for moving for certiorari.

One-tenth of the inhabitants of a place having no known or defined boundary, presented a petition to the Secretary of State under the provision of the Local Government Act 1858, defining the boundary which they desired to form into a district. The Secretary of State made an order omitting certain property, and including certain other property not mentioned in the petition, and afterwards, on the 16th Feb., the Act was adopted. Appeals were made under the 18th section of the Act, and on the 29th April the Secretary made his order, declaring that the Act should come into operation in the district defined by him at the expiration of one month from that date. The 20th section of the Act provides, that whenever any resolution has been passed in any place, the Act shall, at the expiration of two months from the date of the passing of such resolution, or in the event of an appeal, at such time as may be mentioned in the order made on such appeal, have the force of law within such place. On the 3rd June the applicant, owner of property not included in the petition, but included in the extended boundaries, obtained a rule for a certiorari to bring up the order of the Secretary of State, that the same might be quashed, on the ground that there was no jurisdiction to make such order:

Held, per Wightman and Blackburn, JJ., that the month having expired since the date of the Secretary of State's order of the 29th April, the application was too late.

Cockburn, C. J. dubitante.

This was a rule calling upon the Secretary of State for the Home Department to show cause why a writ of certiorari should not issue to bring up an order of the said secretary, bearing date the 15th Jan. 1861, purporting to settle the boundaries of the district of Todmorden, in the counties of Lancaster and York, for the purposes of the Local Government Act 1858, with a view that such order should be quashed, on the ground that the said Secretary of State had no power to extend the boundaries beyond the limits mentioned and defined in the petition and plan, signed by one-tenth of the ratepayers resident within such boundaries, as required by the 16th section of the Local Government Act 1858 (21 & 22 Vict. c. 98).

It appeared that Todmorden is a village extending into parts of four townships, and has no known or defined boundary. Certain inhabitants wishing to put the village under the operation of the Local Government Act 1858, got up a petition, defining accurately by words and by a plan the extent and limits of the boundaries which they prayed to be formed into a district. The petition was signed by one-tenth of the ratepayers within that district, as required by the 16th section of the Act.

The Secretary of State, after having sent down Mr. Ranger, the inspector appointed for that purpose, made an order omitting certain properties prayed by the petition, but included and brought in to the district certain other properties, viz., a corn-mill at Inchfield worth 150*l.* per annum, belonging to Mr. Smith, who had obtained this rule; a cotton-mill at Square; another cotton-mill at Barewise, and a whole village of thirty-nine cottages at Square—altogether rated at more than 600*l.* per annum, none of which properties were included in the petition, nor asked to form any part of the district, and from the district of which properties neither one-tenth nor any part of the ratepayers were petitioners, and it did not appear that when these properties had been brought into the boundary the persons who signed the petition would reach one-tenth in number of the rate-payers within the boundary, including the properties in question. On the 16th Feb., at a meeting convened for that purpose, the Act was adopted. An appeal was then made by Mr. Smith to the Home Secretary, under the 18th section; but the Secretary finding he could not legally set aside his own order, however irregular, the appeal on that ground was withdrawn, and ultimately the appeals were dismissed on the 29th April last, when the Secretary of State ordered that the Act should come into operation in the said district one month after that date. Under these circumstances, Mr. Smith had obtained the present rule.

Manisty, Q.C. (Welsby with him) now showed cause.—When the steps are adopted laid down by the Act, as necessary to put the Secretary of State in motion, it is for him to define the boundaries, and then it is for the inhabitants to adopt them. The affidavits in answer show that the petition was signed by one-fifth of the ratepayers residing within the boundaries of the Todmorden district as settled by the Home Secretary. The 17th section of the Act gives a power of appeal by petition against the resolution to adopt the Act, but no such appeal has here been had. [COCKBURN, C.J.—I cannot help thinking that you do not satisfy the requirements of the Act, which says the assent of one-tenth within the boundary shall be necessary, by taking the assent of some persons beyond that boundary; the Secretary may limit, that is to say, give something less, but can he give more without interfering with that provision? WIGHTMAN, J.—Besides, as in the present case, a man beyond the boundary finds himself within it without having been consulted.] The 81st section of the Act makes the order of the Secretary of State binding. The order of the Secretary of State on the appeal, dated 29th April 1861, says that the Local Government Act 1858 shall, within one month from the date thereof, have the force of law within such district. And the 20th section says, that in the event of an appeal the Act shall, at such time as may be mentioned in the order made on such appeal, have the force of a law within such place. The applicant must stand or fall by his appeal.

Wheeler, Serjt. (Aspinall with him) was called on in support.—The order is wholly and radically bad; it is made without jurisdiction. [COCKBURN, C.J.—Your application for the rule had reference to the 18th and 19th sections; but then we come to the 20th, how do you get over that? The order has been made, and the time mentioned in it has expired.] The conditions precedent have not been properly complied with, therefore the later proceedings are ineffectual and void. Jurisdiction cannot be acquired or exceeded; it must be shown on the face of the proceedings, and if the facts be wrongly set forth they may be rectified by affidavit. The Secretary of State had power to fix a boundary co-extensive with, or of less extent than that named in the petition, but he had no power to go beyond. The 16th section must be read with reference to the other parts of the Act, and the preliminary order being defective, the subsequent order is of no avail.

WIGHTMAN, J.—I am of opinion that this rule ought to be discharged. It may be that the Secretary of State has been somewhat irregular in settling the boundary of this district, although the Act gives him power either to dismiss the petition or make an order as to the boundaries of the place, and it is a question whether he might not, under that authority, do what he has here done. But the vote adopting the Act was either good or bad. Then the 20th section says, whenever any resolution adopting this Act has been passed in any place, this Act shall, at the expiration of two months from the date of the passing of such resolution, or at such time as may be mentioned in the order made on appeal, have the force of law within such place; therefore, when the vote adopting the Act is unappealed against, it becomes law after two months. But here the motion was not made for more than a month after the dismissal of the appeal; the order of the Secretary was made on the 29th April, in which he declared that the Act should come into operation in the district at the expiration of one month from that date, and the motion for this rule was made on the 3rd June. Looking at that section, it seems to me that the time has passed, and that now it is too late to question this order.

BLACKBURN, J.—I am of the same opinion. The 16th section says that any place not having a known or defined boundary, may petition one of her Majesty's Secretaries of State to settle its boundary; that the petition shall state the proposed boundaries of the place, and shall be signed by one-tenth of the ratepayers resident within such boundaries. Now that seems to imply that the petitioners are to point out the boundaries, but then it is for the Secretary of State to settle them. Then in the fifth paragraph of the section, the Secretary of State may "make orders as to the boundaries;" that would seem that he might alter them. Here the objection is, that he has increased the limit of the boundary; on that I give no judgment either way. I am not convinced that he has or has not such power; but the present application is out of time. Whilst the order stood which mentioned this place with a defined boundary, the ratepayers might proceed to adopt the Act, and it seems that on the 16th Feb. a meeting was duly convened for that purpose, at which a resolution was carried to that effect; then an appeal was entered, and on the 29th April the Secretary of State made his final order, directing the Act to operate at the expiration of one month from that date. The 20th section says that after two months from the date of the resolution, or in the event of an appeal then at such time as may be mentioned in the order made on that appeal, the Act shall have the force of law in such place. Now the motion for this rule was made on the 3rd June, and therefore I think that, as the appeal was dismissed on the 29th April, and an order then made directing the Act to come into operation at the expiration of one month from that date, the time had passed, and the Act had the force of law in the district. It is therefore now too late to come for a certiorari, and on that ground alone I decide.

COCKBURN, C.J.—I entertain very serious doubts whether it is competent for a Secretary of State to extend the area of a proposed district beyond the boundaries mentioned in the petition; but although it is unnecessary to decide that, I am desirous that that question should be kept quite open for our consideration if the question should arise again, and the matter is brought before us in time. On the other question I can only say that my mind is not satisfied that the provisions referred to meet the present case. I think there is considerable doubt whether they apply, and whether the whole proceedings do not fail in consequence of the illegality in fixing the boundaries. I however merely desire to express my doubts, and will not delay the decision of the case; neither do I desire that any doubt I may entertain should prevent this rule being discharged.

PURNELL v. THE WOLVERHAMPTON WATERWORKS COMPANY.

Wolverhampton Waterworks—Express enactment in private Act not repealed by public Act.

In 1845 an Act of Parliament (8 & 9 Vict. c. 135) was passed for supplying the town of Wolverhampton with water, no mention being made in the Act as to the water being laid on at high pressure. In 1855 a new Act (18 & 19 Vict. c. 151) was passed for the same purpose, which by its first section enacted that the Waterworks Clauses Act 1847, should be incorporated in it, sect. 42 of which Act enacted that all the pipes to which fire-plugs should be fixed should be kept at high pressure, the company being liable to a penalty of 10*l.* for non-performance. By sect. 50, however, of the new Act, it was provided that the water to be supplied from any pipe of the company need not be laid on at high pressure.

In 1856 the two companies became amalgamated, by an Act entitled the Wolverhampton Waterworks Transfer Act, in which the Waterworks Clauses Act was incorporated.

A fire having taken place, and there not being a sufficient supply of water, the complainant, on behalf of the corporation, obtained a summons against the company, and, upon the hearing, the magistrate decided that the company were not bound to keep the water on at high pressure, as the General Act was expressly varied and repealed by sect. 40 of the Wolverhampton New Waterworks Act, and the Court Held, upon an appeal from that decision, that the magistrate was right.

Case stated by the stipendiary magistrate of the borough of Wolverhampton.

The complainant alleged that after the making and passing of the Waterworks Clauses Consolidation Act 1847, and the Wolverhampton New Waterworks Act 1855, the defts., and at the time of committing the offence thereafter mentioned, had certain main and other pipes belonging to them in the town and parish of Wolverhampton, in the said county of Stafford, within the limits of the last-mentioned Act, for the supply of water according to the provisions of the said Acts, and had certain fire-plugs fixed thereto for the supply of water for extinguishing fire, according to the provisions of the said Acts; yet that the defts., on the 10th Oct. 1860, did not keep charged with water the said pipes so belonging unto them, and to which fire-plugs were so fixed, in the town and parish aforesaid, within the limits aforesaid, but then and there wholly neglected so to do, though not prevented from so doing by frost, unusual drought, or unavoidable cause or accident, or during necessary repairs.

A penalty of 10*l.* attaches to the offence.

The complainant relied upon the provisions of the

siderable amount below 10 per cent. per annum existed in the dividends already paid, and which, if that second Act had not passed, and the company had become sufficiently prosperous, the shareholders would have been entitled to receive. The question is, whether the second Act of Parliament has deprived the original shareholders of that right? The second Act was passed for the purpose of altering, amending and enlarging the former Act. It repeals no one of its clauses; it is simply additional to it; and it raises the nominal capital of the company to 250,000*l.*, by making it to consist of 5000 shares of 50*l.* each. It, in fact, changes the 25*l.* shares created by the former Act into 50*l.* shares under that Act; and it creates 2000 additional shares of 50*l.* each. It limits the dividends on each share to 5*l.* per cent.; thereby enabling the original shareholders of 25*l.* shares each to receive their original maximum of dividend in the shape of 5 per cent. on the 50*l.* shares. The parts of the new Act which alone seem to me to have any bearing on this subject are in the following places: in the preamble, and the 3rd, the 4th and the 5th sections. [His Honour read the preamble and those sections as above stated, and continued.] Upon the 4th section I am of opinion that no distinction is made between one class of shares and the other, or between one dividend and the other. The words of the Act are "any previous dividend." I do not consider myself at liberty to cut down that, the most general expression, "to any previous dividend declared under the authority of this Act, or subsequently to the passing of this Act." I am at a loss to understand why the recitals which I have read were introduced, unless it was intended to deal with those dividends which are therein expressed to be the right of the then existing shareholders. I think that clause deals with this part of the subject, by putting all the dividends on the same footing. But I also think that if there was any doubt on that point it would be removed by the 5th section. For what are the rights there spoken of which are preserved to the shareholders under the first Act? They are the rights acquired under that Act. The preamble recites that under that Act the shareholders were entitled to a dividend of 10 per cent. on the nominal amount of their shares. That, therefore, was one of the rights acquired under that Act; and that therefore was one of the rights vested in the old shareholders on taking new shares under the later Act. Indeed, except the clause refers to such dividends, it is difficult to see what are the rights to be vested in them, or why such right to be paid the deficiency of former dividends should be excluded. Well, then, are these provisions inconsistent with the provisions of the later Act? Certainly not. It seems to me that they are not only consistent with them, but that any other construction would be inconsistent with the provisions of both Acts, which must, for this purpose, be read together. That this is so is, to my mind, made clear by the contention on behalf of the consumers, and the clauses on which they rely for their rights. The contention of the consumers is, that the deficiency of dividends under the former Act is gone; that only deficiencies on dividends declared since the passing of the second Act can now be made good out of the profits of the company; and that the excess of profits after that should be applied in reducing the price of water to the consumers. But under the second Act, taken alone, there is no power of reducing the price of water to the consumers; it is solely under the first Act, which is incorporated with the second, and enlarged and amended by it, that that power can be exercised. But the only clause in the former Act under which that reduction of price to the consumers can be effected is the 32nd section. [His Honour again referred to that section, as above stated, and continued:] So that the reduction of price to the consumer is not to take place until the accumulated fund, if created, shall have amounted to 7500*l.*, and after dividends to the amount of 10 per cent. shall have been paid on the original shares; that is, the court of quarter sessions, which alone has authority to do it, has no power or jurisdiction to reduce the price of water until 10 per cent. dividends have been paid on the original shares. The nominal value of the shares is doubled by the second Act, and the dividend of 5 per cent. is substituted for 10 per cent. on the former half amount. But that is virtually the same thing, and then power is given by the 4th section of the second Act to pay the deficiency of any previous dividend. I consider it, therefore, clear, that not only are the directors authorised to pay the deficiency of previous dividends from the beginning in 1845, but also that the court of quarter sessions has no power to reduce the price to the consumers, until every previous deficiency in the dividends is paid. I will therefore make a declaration to that effect; but I will vary the expression of it, if it shall appear to counsel to be inadequate in that form to explain the construction I have put on the clauses of these two Acts of Parliament. The decree will therefore be this:—Declare that the surplus of the past income of the said Nottingham Waterworks Company, not yet expended, and the future income of the said company, as the same shall be received, after payment of the working expenses of the undertaking, and the interest on the amount of the money borrowed by the company under the authority of the aforesaid Acts of Parliament, and after providing such an amount for the contingent fund as the directors under the authority of the same Acts may consider necessary to set apart for that purpose, is applicable to the payment of arrears of dividends to the shareholders in the said company, in the following manner—that is to say: in or towards payment of what is necessary to make up the deficiency of any previous dividend declared subsequently to the passing of the Nottingham Waterworks Act 1845; and if such surplus shall be insufficient to pay such deficiency in full, then that the same is to be applied pro rata in payment of so much of such deficiency as the said surplus will extend to satisfy, to each of the shareholders of the company, and so on in each and every year, so long as any such surplus shall exist, until the whole of the deficiency of any previous dividend shall have been made good, and paid to the shareholders of the company." That decree will probably be all that is required for the purpose of this suit, and it will be unnecessary to take any of the accounts as prayed by this bill. The costs of the plt. and of the defts. the directors, must be paid out of the funds of the company.

THE ATTORNEY-GENERAL v. FLOYER, SKYMER AND DIGBY, re BANKES.

Succession Duty Act 1853—(16 & 17 Vict. c. 51)—

Who the "predecessor"—Rate of duty payable.

Henry Bankes being seized in fee, devised certain lands to his son Henry for life, remainder to his first and other sons in tail male. Henry the son being tenant for life, and William John, his eldest living son, tenant in tail male in remainder, and of full age, suffered a recovery in 1810 to such uses as they should jointly appoint; in default of appointment to the use of Henry for life, then to such uses as William John should appoint if he survived his father, by deed or will, and in default of such appointment to the same uses as in the original will. Afterwards, in 1821, there was a deed of appointment by Henry and his son William John to such uses as they should jointly appoint, then to Henry for life, then to William John for life, remainder to his first and other sons in tail male, then to the use of George, the next son of the second Henry, for life, remainder to his first and other sons in tail male. The joint power of appointment in the deed of 1821 was never executed. The second Henry died in 1834. William John died in 1855 without issue, and thereupon George succeeded to the estate as tenant for life:

Held, that the estate and interest of George was derived from Henry and William John as the predecessors, and that the rate of succession duty payable by the representatives of George should be 3 per cent. on one moiety in respect of the interest derived from the brother William John, and 1 per cent. on the other moiety in respect of the interest derived from Henry, the father of George.

This was an information filed by the Attorney-General, and the object of it was to obtain from defts., who are the executors of the will of the Right Honourable George Bankes, late of Kingston-hall, in the county of Dorset, deceased—Floyer and Seymer being trustees of a settlement of 1855, made by his eldest son Edmund George Bankes—payment of the duty owing to her Majesty in respect of the succession of the said George Bankes, deceased, in certain real property to which he became beneficially entitled in possession on the death of his brother William John Bankes, and also of the duty in respect of the succession in the same property of his eldest son the said Edmund Geo. Bankes, who became beneficially entitled thereto in possession upon his said father's death; and also of the duty owing in respect of the successions of several younger children of the said George Bankes, deceased, in the same property under the appointments made by his will and codicils respectively in pursuance of certain powers enabling him in that behalf. The question for the decision of the court was as to the rate of duty payable in respect of such successions respectively.

Henry Bankes, formerly of Kingston-hall, Esq. (since deceased), was owner of certain real property in the counties of Dorset and Cumberland. On the 18th Aug. 1774 he duly made his last will, and thereby devised his said real property unto his brothers-in-law, John Wynne and William Wynne (both deceased), to hold the same (subject as to part thereof to a yearly rentcharge of 600*l.*, payable to his wife Margaret, now deceased, for her life) unto them, their heirs and assigns, to the uses therein and hereinafter in part stated in effect as follows:—To the use of the testator's son Henry Bankes for life, without impeachment of waste, with a limitation to the use of the said John Wynne and William Wynne and their heirs, during the life of the said Henry Bankes (the son), in trust, to preserve contingent remainders, with remainder to the use of the first son of the body of the said Henry Bankes (the son) lawfully begotten, and of the heirs male of the body of such first son lawfully to be begotten, severally, successively and in remainder one after the other, as they respectively should be in seniority of age and priority of birth, and of the several heirs male of the body and bodies of such respective sons lawfully issuing, with divers remainders over.

The said testator Henry Bankes died in Sept. 1776, and the said will, with a codicil thereto, dated 20th of the same month of August, confirming the said will, was shortly after testator's death proved in the Prerogative Court of the Archbishop of Canterbury by the said Margaret Bankes, his widow, who was appointed the executrix during the minority of the said Henry Bankes, the son.

Henry Bankes the younger, who was the first and eldest son of the said Henry Bankes (the son), died in 1806, unmarried and without issue, and William John Bankes, who was the second son of the said Henry Bankes (the son), thereupon became and was at the time of the date and execution of the indenture of bargain and sale next hereinafter stated, the first tenant in tail in remainder expectant on his father's death of the real property devised by the said will, and he attained his age of twenty-one years in the year 1809.

By an indenture of bargain and sale, dated 28th June 1810, made between the said Henry Bankes of the first part, the said William John Bankes of the second part, Jonathan Holmes (since deceased) of the third part, and Jos. Lowden of the fourth part, duly executed, and afterwards enrolled in the Court of C. P., after reciting as or to the effect stated, and that the said Henry Bankes (the son) and William John Bankes were desirous and had determined to suffer a common recovery of the manors, castles, advowsons, messuages, lands, tenements and hereditaments devised by the will of the said Henry Bankes, and of settling the same to the uses, &c., in the said indenture declared, it is witnessed that for docking, barring and destroying the estate tail of the said William Bankes of and in the same manors, &c., by the said indenture bargained and sold, or otherwise assured, and all reversions and remainders expectant or depending on the same estate tail, and all dormant entails (if any) in the said Henry Bankes (the son), and all conditions and collateral limitations annexed to the said estates tail respectively, and for settling and assuring the same manors, &c., to the use by the said indenture limited and declared, and for the nominal considerations therein mentioned, the said Henry Bankes (the son) did bargain and sell, and the said William John Bankes did grant, bargain, sell, ratify and confirm unto the said J. Holmes and his assigns, the manors, &c., therein particularly described, being the real property devised by the said testator's will, as before stated, to hold the same (subject to the said yearly rentcharge of 600*l.*) unto the said J. Holmes and his assigns during the joint natural lives of the said J. Holmes, H. Bankes (the son) and W. J. Bankes, to the intent that Holmes might become tenant of the freehold of the manors, &c., by the said indenture bargained and sold, to the end that one or more common recovery or recoveries might be suffered in manner therein mentioned, with a declaration that the same and other the assurances therein mentioned should enture to the uses by the same expressed, as to certain part thereof, to the use of the said Henry Bankes (the son), his heirs and assigns, for ever; and as to the other part thereof (being that portion of the said real property to which the question in this suit relates), to the use of such person or persons, for such estate or estates, and for such interest or interests, by way of annuity, rentcharge, or otherwise, and in such parts, shares, and proportions, and upon such trusts and for such ends, intents and purposes, and charged and chargeable in such manner, and either absolutely or conditionally, and subject to such powers of revocation and of new appointment, and other powers, provisions, conditions, restrictions, limitations, declarations and agreements, as the said Henry Bankes (the son) and William John Bankes jointly, by any deed or deeds, instrument or instruments in writing, to be sealed and delivered by them in the presence of two or more credible witnesses, and attested by the same witnesses, should direct, limit, or appoint; and in default of such direction, limitation, or appointment, and in the meantime subject thereto, to the use of the said H. Bankes (the son) during his life, without impeachment of waste, and with the same or the like powers of leasing, and other powers and privileges as were given to them by the will of the said Henry Bankes, the testator, in confirmation of the same estate for life, and the powers and privileges annexed thereto, with remainder to the use of such person or persons for such estate and interest, &c. as the said Wm. Jno. Bankes at any time, and from time to time from and after the decease of the said Henry Bankes (the son), and in the event of his the said Wm. John Bankes surviving the same Henry Bankes, by any deed or deeds, instrument or instruments in writing, to be sealed and delivered by him in the presence of two or more credible witnesses, or by his last will and testament in writing, &c., should direct, limit, or appoint, and in default thereof then to the same or the like uses, &c. as the same manors and other hereditaments respectively were limited by the will of the said Henry Bankes the testator, after and expectant on the several estates limited for the life of the said Henry Bankes (the son), or as near thereto as might be, &c.

A common recovery was afterwards duly suffered in or as of Trinity Term 1810, in pursuance of the agreement contained in the said indenture of bargain and sale.

By an indenture of settlement, dated 2nd June 1821, [a lease for a year precedent thereto], made between the said H. Bankes (the son) of the first part, the said W. Jno. Bankes of the second part, Henry Seymer, W. Bond, the Rev. G. Pickard and the Rev. Henry Masterman of the fourth part, duly executed and attested, after reciting as before stated, and that the said H. Bankes (the son) was seised to him and his heirs in fee-simple of divers hereditaments in Dorsetshire in addition to those limited to the use of the said Henry Bankes (the son), in fee, and also possessed of certain leasehold hereditaments in the said county; and also that the freehold and leasehold hereditaments of the said H. Bankes (the son) were convenient to be held together with the manors and other hereditaments so subjected to the joint power of appointment of the said H. Bankes (the son) and William John Bankes, and thereafter settled by them; and also reciting that the said H. Bankes (the son) and William John Bankes, and by way of family arrangement, and on mature consideration, agreed to join in settling and assuring the several manors, &c., as thereafter declared, and for that purpose the said H. Bankes (the son) and William John Bankes had determined to execute their joint power of appointment and to make and execute the several conveyances, releases and assignment after contained; the said Henry Bankes (the son) and William John Bankes jointly in that behalf, did by that their deed, sealed and delivered by them jointly, in the presence of two credible witnesses, &c., jointly direct, limit and appoint that all those the manors, &c., first thereafter released should thenceforth remain and be, and that the said recovery and all other assurances should thenceforth be and remain (subject to the said annuity) to the uses after limited. And it is thereby also witnessed that, in pursuance and further performance of the said agreement, and for the considerations therein mentioned, Henry Bankes (the son) and Wm. John Bankes did grant, bargain, sell and release unto the said Seymer and Bond, their heirs and assigns for ever, firstly, the several manors (being all the same premises as are described in and conveyed by the before-stated indenture of bargain and sale, and the recovery suffered in pursuance thereof); and, secondly, the manor, &c. therein described (being hereditaments whereof the said Henry Bankes was seised for an estate of inheritance in fee-simple, or for some other estate of inheritance), to hold to Seymer and Bond, their heirs and assigns, upon the trusts therein declared; as to such part as was by the said indenture of bargain and sale limited to the use of the said Henry Bankes (the son) in fee-simple, to the use of the said Henry Bankes (the son) his heirs and assigns for ever; and as to the other parts thereof, "the said settled estates," including that portion of the real property devised by the said testator's will (to which the question in this suit relates), to such uses, &c. &c., as the said Henry Bankes (the son) and Wm. J. Bankes should jointly appoint; and, subject thereto, to the use that Frances, the wife of Henry Bankes, the son (who died in her husband's lifetime), should, if she survived her said husband, receive for her life 700*l.* a-year, with a term of 500 years to Pickard and Masterman, for securing due payment thereof, and providing for the maintenance of any tenant in tail during minority, to Henry for life; then to William John for life, with remainder to his first and other sons in tail male; then to the use of George Bankes (the person in question), the next son of the second Henry, for life, remainder to his first and other sons in tail male. The joint power of appointment in the deed of 1821 was never executed. The second Henry died in 1834, and William John in 1855 without issue, whereupon George succeeded to the estate as tenant for life. Under the Succession Duty Act 1853 there became payable in respect of the succession of George Bankes in the said settled estates, according to the value to be ascertained as in the Act mentioned, eight half-yearly instalments, the first whereof ought to have been paid at the expiration of twelve months next after George Bankes became entitled to the beneficial enjoyment.

George Bankes was tenant for life in possession of the settled estates in the settlement of 1821, at the time the disentailing deed next mentioned was made, and Edmund George Bankes was his first son, and as such was tenant in tail male in remainder, expectant on his father's death, and by a disentailing deed of the 2nd July 1855, made between the said George Bankes of the first part, the said Edmund George Bankes of the second part, and J. S. Gregory of the third part, and duly enrolled pursuant to the Statute for the Abolition of Fines and Recoveries, Edmund George Bankes, with the consent of the said George Bankes, his father, as protector of the settlement of 1821, disentailed the settled estates comprised therein, and the said George Bankes conveyed the same to such uses, &c., as the said George Bankes and Edmund George Bankes should by deed jointly appoint; and in default thereof the same were to be to the uses of the said settlement.

By an indenture of settlement dated 3rd July 1855, between said Geo. Bankes of the first part, said Edmd. Geo. Bankes of the second part, said Floyer and Seymer of the third part, the said Floyer of the fourth part, and the said J. S. Gregory of the fifth part; after reciting the settlement of June 1821, that Frances Bankes died in 1823, that said Henry Bankes did not marry afterwards; that Henry and William John Bankes did not exercise their power of joint appointment, and that said Henry Bankes did not, except to secure a jointure for the wife of George Bankes and the mother of said William George Bankes; that said Henry Bankes died on 17th Dec. 1834, and William John Bankes on 15th April 1855, unmarried and without issue; that Edmund George Bankes was born on 24th April 1836, and was the first son of said George Bankes—the last-mentioned disentailing deed of the day previous; that Edmund George Bankes intermarried on 24th Jan. 1848 with Rosa Louisa Bastard, spinster, and had two sons by her, to wit, Henry John P. Bankes, born on 12th Feb. 1850, and Walter Ralph Bankes, born in Ang. 1853: it is witnessed that said George and Edmund George Bankes, by virtue of the power given to them jointly by the indenture of 2nd July 1855, and of every other power, &c., did appoint that all and singular the said settled estates should remain to the uses therein stated; and it was further witnessed that said George and Edmd. Geo. Bankes, by way of further assurance and in aid of the appointment thereby made, did grant unto the said Floyer and Seymer, their heirs and assigns, all the said settled estates (except the leasehold parts), to hold to them, their heirs and assigns for ever.

nevertheless to the uses and upon the trusts therein mentioned, and as George and Edmund George Bankes should jointly appoint, and, in default, to Floyer and Seymer, their executors, administrators and assigns, for 500 years; remainder to Gregory, his executors, administrators and assigns, for the term of one day, to prevent merger, and subject thereto to the use of George Bankes for life; remainder to Floyer and Seymer for 1000 years, upon certain trusts; remainder to Gregory for one day, and subject thereto to the use of Floyer and Seymer for the life of Edmund George Bankes, and after his decease to the use of Henry John P. Bankes, the first son of Edmund George Bankes, for life, and after his death to the use of the first and every other son of the said Henry John P. Bankes severally and successively, according to priority of birth, and the heirs male of the bodies of the same sons respectively, every elder of the same sons, and the heirs male of his body to take before every younger, &c.; and on failure of such issue, to the use of the said Walter Ralph Bankes, the second son of said Edmund George Bankes, for life, and afterwards over to his sons in a similar manner; and on failure of such issue, to the use of Henry Hyde Nugent Bankes, the second son of said George Bankes, for life, and afterwards over to his sons in a similar manner; and on failure of such issue, to the use of William George Hawtreys Bankes, the third son of George Bankes, for life, and afterwards over to his sons in a similar manner; and on failure of such issue, to the use of Wynne Albert Bankes, the fourth son of said George Bankes, for life, and afterwards over to his sons in a similar manner; and on failure of such issue, to the use of the fifth and every other younger son of said George Bankes, severally and successively, according to priority of birth, and the heirs male of the bodies of the same sons; and on failure of such issue, to the use of Edward Bankes for life; afterwards to the use of John Scott Bankes, the eldest son of said Edward Bankes, for life, and afterwards over to his sons in a similar manner; and on failure of such issue, to the use of the Rev. Eldon Surtees Bankes, the second son of said Edward Bankes, for life, and afterwards over to his sons in a similar manner; and on failure of such issue, to the use of the said George Bankes, his heirs and assigns for ever.

The said George Bankes by his will, dated 28th July 1855, recited that by the said settlement of 2nd June 1821 a power was limited to him to charge all or any part of the hereditaments, &c., thereby settled, except certain parts expressly excepted, with portions for his daughters and younger sons. And by the settlement of 3rd July 1855, being a resettlement of the estates settled by the settlement of 1821, a power was limited to him to charge all or any part of the hereditaments, &c. thereby settled, except certain parts thereof expressly excepted from the operation of the same power, but which were not altogether the same parts thereof as were excepted from the operation of the said power created by the settlement of 1821. "Now, therefore, by virtue and in exercise of every power and authority whatsoever me in this behalf in any way enabling, I do hereby charge all those the manors, &c., settled by the settlement of 1821, resettled by the settlement of 1855, except such parts thereof as by the settlement of 1821 were excepted from the operation of the said power thereby created, and except also such parts as by the settlement of 1855 were excepted from the operation of the said power thereby created, with the followingsums as portions for my three younger sons and my four daughters respectively—that is to say, 10,000*l.* for my second son H. H. N. Bankes, 5000*l.* for my third son William George H., 5000*l.* for my fourth son Wynne Albert, 5000*l.* for my daughter Georgiana Charlotte Frances, wife of said John Floyer, and in satisfaction of a covenant contained in her marriage settlement, and the sum of 5000*l.* each to Adelaide, Augusta Anne and Octavia Elizabeth."

By a codicil to his said will, dated 25th Feb. 1856, after taking notice of the death of his said daughter Octavia Elizabeth, he made a further apportionment of 3000*l.* to his daughter Mrs. Floyer, 3000*l.* to his daughter Adelaide, and 3000*l.* to his daughter Augusta Anne, and charged the same hereditaments with the payment thereof.

By a second codicil to his said will, dated the 16th June 1856, after reciting the appointment made by his will and codicil in favour of his said daughter Adelaide, he revoked the same, and declared that certain provisions which he had then lately made, in contemplation of her marriage with the deft. Digby, should be deemed in lieu of a bequest of 3000*l.* to her contained in his will, and made payable out of his general personal estate, and also of 5000*l.* and 3000*l.* by his will and codicil charged upon the said settled estates.

George Bankes died on the 6th July 1856, and his said will and codicils were duly proved by defts. (and William G. H. Bankes, since deceased), his executors, on the 15th Aug. then next.

Upon the death of George Bankes, his eldest son, the said Edmund George Bankes, or defts. Floyer and Seymer, on his behalf, became entitled in possession to the succession conferred on the said E. G. Bankes by the settlement of 1855, and duty became payable in respect thereof; and the said five younger children of the said George Bankes then also became respectively entitled in possession to the portions so apportioned to them; and defts. Floyer and Seymer, as the trustees, are personally accountable in respect of the duty on all the successions; and application has been made to defts. for payment after the rate of 3 per cent. on the value of that portion of the succession conferred on George Bankes by the settlement of 1821, derived under the will of Henry Bankes, the subsequent bargain and sale of Jan. 1810, and the recovery suffered in pursuance thereof; and the Attorney-General insists that this is the proper rate of duty, inasmuch as this portion of the succession of George Bankes was derived by him from his brother the said William John as predecessor.

The same as to Edmund George Bankes, inasmuch as the settlement of 1855, under which the said E. G. Bankes takes his succession, was a disposition made by himself at the date whereof he was entitled to the property comprised therein expectantly on the death of his father, the said G. Bankes, and he is therefore chargeable with duty at the same rate as he would have been chargeable with if no such disposition had been made; and the proper rate of duty with which the said Edmund George would have been chargeable if the settlement of 1855 had not been made is 3 per cent., inasmuch as in that case he would have derived his succession from his father's brother, the said William John Bankes, as predecessor.

The same in respect of the several portions appointed by the said will and codicils of George Bankes to his five younger children, inasmuch as such younger children derive their interests under one or other, or both, of the instruments by which the several powers of appointment which George Bankes assumed to exercise in their favour as before stated were respectively created; that is to say, the settlement of 1821, which was a disposition made by their father's brother William John, and the settlement of 1855, which was a disposition made by their own brother Edmund George, so that their interests were derived either from their uncle or from their brother as predecessor, within the meaning of the 4th section of the Succession Duty Act 1853.

Cur. adv. vult.

July 6, 1861.—BRAMWELL, B. delivered judgment.—The first question in this case is, what is the rate of succession duty on so much of the succession of George Bankes in property comprised in an indenture of June 2, 1821, as was derived under the will of Henry Bankes, and an indenture of June 28, 1810, and a recovery suffered thereon? To determine that we must determine who is or are the predecessor or predecessors under the 2nd section of the Succession Duty Act (the 16 & 17 Vict. c. 51)—that is to say, who is or are the person or persons from whom the interest of George Bankes is derived. Now his interest was derived thus: Henry Bankes, being seised in fee, devised the lands in question to his son Henry for life, remainder to his first and other sons in tail male, and died; Henry, the son, being tenant for life, and William John, his eldest living son, tenant in tail male in remainder, and of full age, suffered the recovery in question to such uses as they should jointly appoint; in default of appointment to the use of Henry for life, in confirmation of the same estate for life as was given by the will of the tenant before mentioned; then to such uses as William John should appoint, if he survived his father, by deed or will, and, in default of such appointment, to the same uses as in the original will before mentioned. There was afterwards, in 1821, a deed of appointment by Henry and his son William John, to such uses as they should jointly appoint, then to Henry for life, then to William John for life, remainder to his first and other sons in tail male; then to the use of George, the person in question, the next son of the second Henry, for life, remainder to his first and other sons in tail male. The joint power of appointment in this deed of 1821 was never executed. The second Henry died in 1834; William John died in 1855, without issue, and thereupon George succeeded to the estate as tenant for life. Now, if George's predecessor is exclusively his grandfather or his father, the rate of duty is 1 per cent.; but if his brother William John is his predecessor, in whole or in part, then in respect of the interest derived from him 3 per cent. ought to be paid. The first question then is, is any of the interest of George Bankes derived from his brother William John, within the meaning of the second section of the Duty Act? It seems impossible to say there is none. The result of the two dispositions of 1810 and 1821 is that Henry being tenant for life, William John tenant in tail male in remainder, with remainder over to George in tail male, Henry and William John suffering a recovery acquire a joint power of disposing of the fee, bar all subsequent remainders, and ultimately execute that power of disposing of the fee by giving an estate for life to Henry, remainder for life to William John, remainder to his first and other sons in tail male, remainder to George for life. If we look at the disposition of 1810, it amounts to this, that Henry gets back what is called the same estate for life, and William John converts his estate tail into a fee-simple, out of which is, by his act, in part at least, derived the subsequent estates, created by the disposition of 1821. If we look at that transaction, it is the joint act of William John and his father which conferred the estate on George; it is from the estate tail of William John, and, at least in part, by the act of William John, that George's life-estate is derived. If William John had survived his father, suffered a recovery to such uses as he should appoint, and then had appointed to the uses of the deed of 1821, subsequent to the life-estate of the father, it could not be doubted that he would be the predecessor from whom George's interest was derived; so if the recovery had been suffered without the intermediate power of appointment directly to such uses. Then does the circumstance of the father being a party to the dispositions prevent any of the interest being derived from William John? Let it be tried thus: suppose the recovery had been to the use of the father Henry for life, remainder to William John in fee, or to such uses as he should appoint, and then he had appointed to the uses of the deed of 1821 subsequent to the life-estate of the father, would not the interest be derived from him? Clearly. So also if the intermediate power of appointment had been left out. This shows that neither the fact of the father Henry being a party to the disposition, nor the fact of the life-estate of George not being directly created by the deed to lead the uses of the recovery, nor consequently those two facts combined, prevent the interest being, in part at least, derived from William John. The next question is, is the interest wholly derived from William John the brother, or in part from Henry, the father of George? We think the latter is the case. Henry and William John have a joint power of appointment, and the act of each is necessary to give the estate for life to George. George might, indeed, have had such an estate, or rather an estate tail, had the joint power of appointment not been executed; but still the estate which he gets under that power, Henry and William John might have given the same estate to an entire stranger. This is not inconsistent with the decision of the Attorney-General v. Sibthorp, 3 H. & N. 424. It is true that it was there held that the deft. derived no interest, or no appreciable interest, from his father; that his father took back his life-estate, and the deft.'s interest there was derived from his own estate tail; he got no more, nay less, than he would have had had the power of appointment not been executed. So we should say here, had the question been what duty William John should pay, as he would get back only what was his own before. But here George gets, not by his own act—not anything of his own estate, but by the joint act of his father and brother operating on a fee, created indeed out of the brother's estate, but which he alone could not operate on. See the judgment of the L. C. in Lord Braybrooke's case, folio 6. We were much pressed by the decision of the Attorney-General v. Lord Braybrooke, but in truth that case is not inconsistent with our present decision, as was shown by the Attorney-General. It is a convenient expression to speak of the continuation of a family settlement; but the expression is obviously too vague for the enunciation of a proposition of law. Its use is justified by the case of Lord Saltoun v. The Lord Advocate, which is an authority for our present decision. That case decided that the statute is to have a proper construction. Can it be doubted, popularly speaking, that it was from Henry and William John jointly that George's interest was derived? Nor is there any hardship in this. If there is any reason why a succession derived from a brother should pay more than one derived from a father, that reason exists as much in such a case as the present as in any other. In the result then, whether we consider half to come from Henry and half from William John, or that the interest derived from each cannot be distinguished, and that sect. 13 applies, the rate of duty is 3 per cent. on one moiety, and 1 per cent. on the other. The same considerations determine the next question, the rate of duty in respect of the succession of Edmund George Bankes. With respect to the last question it seems clear that 1 per cent. is the rate of duty. The settlor, the person from whom the interest of the children is derived, is their father. The decree should be accordingly. This judgment was prepared before the decision of Lord Braybrooke's case in the

TAYLOR v. VERGETTE.

Bribery—Action for penalties under 17 & 18 Vict. c. 102—Staying proceedings for wilful delay.

The plt. in an action for penalties for bribery on the 17 & 18 Vict. c. 102, is bound by the 14th section to proceed without wilful delay. The bribery was alleged to be in May 1859, no action was commenced until 15th March 1860; writ served 27th April 1860 (plt. and deft. lived in the same town); appearance entered 4th May; declaration delivered 17th April 1860; plea 25th April 1861; issue joined 7th May 1861; application for rule to stay proceedings 1st June 1861:

Held, as there was no sufficient reason assigned for the plt.'s delay, the delay was wilful, and proceedings ordered to be stayed.

This was an action brought to recover penalties for bribery under the 17 & 18 Vict. c. 102 ("An Act to consolidate and amend the laws relating to bribery, treating and undue influence at elections of members of Parliament"), upon a letter of which the following is a copy:—

"Peterborough, April 27th, 1859.

"Mr. Turner, Mr. Peach's Yard.

"If you will be so good as let Mr. Richard Kelly know that this election will take place on Saturday, and that, as he has promised to vote for Mr. Whalley, I hereby promise on behalf of the committee of Mr. W. to pay his expenses if he will fulfil such arrangement.

"Yours obediently, W. VERGETTE."

The plt. is an attorney and solicitor, carrying on business in partnership with L. J. Deacon, at the city of Peterborough, and the deft. is a grocer, residing and carrying on his business in the same city, which he has done for twenty years last past.

The declaration stated that the deft., after the passing of an Act of Parliament, passed in a session of Parliament held in the 17 & 18 years of the reign of Queen Victoria, intitled "An Act to consolidate and amend the laws relating to bribery, treating, and undue influence at election of members of Parliament," and before this suit, promised money to or for one Richard Kelly, who was a voter within the true meaning and intent of the said statute for and at an election for members of Parliament for the borough of Peterborough, in the county of Northampton, in order to induce the said Richard Kelly to vote at the said election contrary to the form of the statute, whereby the said deft. became liable to forfeit for his said offence the sum of 100*l*. 2. And also for that the deft., after the passing of the said Act, and before this suit, gave money to or for the said R. Kelly, so being such voter as in the said first count mentioned, in order to induce the said R. Kelly to vote at the said election, contrary to the form of the statute, whereby the said deft. became liable to forfeit for such his offence the sum of 100*l*. 3. And also for that the deft., after the passing of the said statute, and before this suit, gave money to or for the said R. Kelly, so being such voter as aforesaid, on account of his having voted at the said election in the first count mentioned, contrary to the statute, whereby the deft. became liable to forfeit for such his offence the sum of 100*l*.; and the plt. claims 300*l*.

Plea, not guilty by statute 21 Jac. 1, c. 4, s. 4.

The writ was issued on the 15th March 1860, served 27th April 1860; appearance entered 4th May 1860; declaration on 17th April 1861; plea 25th April 1861; issue joined 7th May 1861.

The deft., upon an affidavit of the above facts, and also alleging that there had been no good cause for the delay in proceeding with the action, that he believed the delay had been wilful and had taken place from a desire on the part of the plt. and of those by whom he was instigated to annoy and prejudice deft., and to keep the charge of bribery hanging over his head, and undisposed of as long as possible; that he had a good defence to the action on the merits, and was advised by counsel to move for a rule to show cause why deft. should not be at liberty to add to the plea already pleaded the following pleas, viz.: 1. That the writ was not served within one year after offence committed. 2. To further maintenance of action, same plea. 3. To whole, action not proceeded with without wilful delay. 4. To further maintenance, same plea: or why all proceedings in this case should not be stayed on the grounds alleged in the said pleas.

Field having on the 1st June 1861 obtained such rule,

Macaulay, Q. C. (Tompson Chitty with him) showed cause.—Plt.'s affidavit states that the time he has taken in prosecuting the action has been such as the rules and practice of this court allow, and which time he has used in such a manner as appeared to him most convenient under the circumstances of the case; that he had not nor ever had any desire to annoy or prejudice deft., nor was he instigated by any one to do so, but was actuated by a desire to visit the penalties attached to bribery upon the deft., with a view by this action (appearing to him more reliable than criminal proceedings) to prevent a repetition of bribery at future elections at Peterborough; that the witnesses in this and another similar action were persons who he believed were actively engaged in the mob at the railway-station, and on account of the feeling then and since existing he had been unable until lately to obtain the information and evidence upon which he had been advised to make specific charges, and to set out specific offences in the declarations in the said action; that the same writs were required in both actions, and he was anxious to try both at the same time, and that he could not bring them to trial at an earlier period with a fair prospect of success than at the ensuing summer assizes. The above dates of the various proceedings were called to the attention of the court, and the 17 & 18 Vict. c. 102, s. 14, which enacts, that "no person shall be liable to any penalty or forfeiture hereby enacted or imposed, unless some prosecution, action, or suit, for the offence committed shall be commenced against such person within the space of one year next after such offence against this Act shall be committed, and unless such person shall be summoned or otherwise served with writ or process within the same space of time, so as such summons or service of writ or process shall not be prevented by such person absconding or withdrawing out of the jurisdiction of the court out of which such writ or other process shall have issued, and in case of any such prosecution, suit, or process as aforesaid, the same shall be proceeded with and carried on without any wilful delay. Wilkinson v. Allot, Cowp. 366; Sutton v. Bishop, 4 Burr. 2287; Petrie v. White, 3 T. R. 5, were cited.

Field, contra, in support of the rule, was not called upon.

POLLOCK, C.B.—We think in this case there has been such a wilful delay as was intended to be prohibited by the Act of Parliament, and although not so great as in Petrie v. White, 3 T. R. 5, where the delay appears to have been six years, yet here the bribery is alleged to have taken place in the year 1859, no action was brought until very close upon the expiration of a year afterwards, and the declaration was not delivered until April 1861; and really the excuse attempted to be set up for it is no excuse at all. The plt. should have been prepared to show in what way he is about to prove his case how the delay arose, and to have given some sort of answer to the deft.'s affidavit and application. He is not to keep these sort of proceedings hanging over the deft.'s head in this way without any reasonable excuse. The plt. and deft. it appears both live in the same town. I think this is a case for the interference of the court, the same as in Petrie v. White. The plt. may, if he desires, have the matter inquired into by indictment; but, as he has already allowed two assizes to go over without proceeding to trial, I think the rule should be made absolute to stay the proceedings.

MARTIN, B.—I am of the same opinion. If we are to give any effect to the Act of the Legislature, this is a case certainly in which I think we ought to interfere. Now what are the facts? The alleged bribery is supposed to have taken place in April or May 1859; no action is commenced until the middle of March 1860, more than a month is then allowed to elapse after the writ is issued before it is served upon the deft., although it is sworn the plt. and deft. both reside in the same town; the deft. enters an appearance to the writ, and it is not for more than eleven months after that the plt. delivers his declaration. If ever there was evidence of wilful delay in proceeding with a suit it is here. What is the answer set up by the plt. for this delay? It is that he has taken such time as the rules and practice of this court allow, which time he has used, he says, in such a manner as appeared to him most convenient under the circumstances of the case, and that the persons required as witnesses were persons who he was informed were actively engaged in a mob at the railway-station, and on account of the feeling existing he has been unable until lately to obtain information to set out specific offences. That is no excuse for the continued delay in the proceedings; persons who bring actions for penalties should see that they are right before they take proceedings, and when they have commenced their actions they ought to be prompt and regular in continuing them, so as not to keep suits of that sort hanging over the heads of parties an unnecessary length of time. The question here is, whether there has not been wilful delay? The statute does not mean perverse delay, but every delay which the plt. cannot account for to the satisfaction of the court in which the action was commenced. If the court see that the action might have been prosecuted in a more speedy manner, and no reason is assigned for it, such a plt. is undoubtedly guilty of wilful delay; that has been so here, and I think it is a clear case for staying the proceedings. Properly the deft. should have applied to the court for the purpose of this application immediately after the declaration, and on that account there will be no costs to either party.

Rule absolute to stay the proceedings without costs.

MINTON v. MINTON.

Construction of will—Joint tenancy—"Surviving children."

*B. bequeathed to his five daughters, naming them, 12,500*l., chargeable on his real and personal estate, the interest to be paid to them in equal shares during their lives, the principal to be invested in trust for them or the survivors or survivor of them for their maintenance, to be free from the debts and control of their husbands, "the principal, after their deaths, in equal parts to their surviving children, as they arrive at the age of twenty-one;" and he gave to his trustees the residue of his property. Two of the daughters died, one leaving two children:

Held, that the principal of the fund was to remain in its integrity until the death of the survivor of the five daughters, and on the death of such survivor the fund to be divided amongst the persons described as "surviving children," but that the time had not arrived to decide who were meant by those words.

This was a petition presented by the daughters of Thos. Minton, deceased, raising the question of the construction of his will.

Thomas Minton made his will dated the 7th April 1832, and thereby appointed his widow Sarah Minton, and his sons Thomas Webb Minton and Herbert Minton, and his son-in-law John Campbell, his executrix and executors and trustees of all his real and personal property, and among others the testator made the following bequest:—"I give and bequeath to my daughters Mary (now Mary Campbell), Sarah, Elizabeth, Julia (now Julia Cave) and Catherine, 12,500*l.*, chargeable on my real estate at Shelton, alias Snape Marsh, and on my personalty, videlicet money in the funds of the stock of England or elsewhere, the interest of the above sum to be paid them in equal parts or shares during their lives, and the principal to be placed in the funds or Bank of England in trust for them or the survivors or survivor of them, and nothing but their receipts shall be a release or discharge to my trustees; nor shall any bankruptcy of themselves or their husbands have any power over them or their trustees, but solely for their maintenance, the principal after their deaths in equal parts to their children as they arrive at the age of twenty-one." After various other intervening devises and bequests, he concluded the gifts in his will by the following:—"I give and bequeath to my trustees all the remainder and residue of my property to buy real estate for my heir-at-law for his or her use for ever."

The testator made certain codicils to his will which did not affect the above bequests, and died on the 29th May 1836.

The above-mentioned sum of 12,500*l.* was, on the 28th May 1838, invested in the purchase in the names of the said Sarah Minton, Thomas Webb Minton, Herbert Minton and John Campbell, as such trustees as aforesaid, of a sum of 13,262*l.* 12*s.* Bank Three per Cent. Annuities.

The testator left surviving him his five daughters named in his will, all of whom had attained their respective ages of twenty-one years before the date of the will. The testator's heir-at-law was his eldest son Thomas Webb Minton, and the testator left three more sons, Herbert Minton, Charles Lee Minton and Arthur Minton, all of whom had respectively attained the age of twenty-one years before the date of the will.

A suit was instituted for the administration of the testator's estate, and on the 8th Aug. 1838 a decree was made by the late V. C. of England (Minton v. Cave, 10 Jur. 86) declaring, amongst other things, that the testator's daughters, Mary Campbell, Sarah Minton, Elizabeth Minton, Julia Cave and Catherine Minton, were entitled to life-interests for their separate use in the sum of 12,500*l.* bequeathed by the testator, and the Court ordered that one equal fifth part of the dividend of the said sum of 13,262*l.* 12*s.* Bank Three per Cent. Annuities, in which the 12,500*l.* had been invested, should be paid to each of the five daughters for their separate use, with liberty to apply on the death of any of the daughters.

The said Elizabeth Minton died unmarried on the 16th Sept. 1845, having by her will, dated the 5th

MINTON v. MINTON.

[V.C. K.]

Aug. 1839, appointed the said John Campbell and Charles L. Minton her executors.

Mary Campbell had four children, all of whom attained their respective ages of twenty-one years. Sarah Minton was still unmarried; and Julia Cave had four children, all of whom attained their respective ages of twenty-one, and she had not had any other child since the death of the testator, except a son, who died on the 17th Jan. 1841 an infant. The deft. W. A. C. B. Cave took out letters of administration to him.

On the 5th Aug. 1853 Louisa, one of the daughters of Julia Cave, married the deft. Colin Minton Campbell, when a marriage-settlement, dated the 2nd Aug. 1853, was made and executed, whereby, after reciting that a marriage was then intended shortly to be solemnised between the said Colin Minton Campbell and Louisa W. C. B. Cave, and reciting, amongst other things, that the said Louisa Cave would be entitled, upon her attaining the age of twenty-one years, to a share of a legacy of 2500*l.* equally with her brothers and sisters, of whom she had three then living, under and by virtue of the will of Thomas Minton, subject to her mother's life-interest therein; he the said Colin Minton Campbell contracted with the said Herbert Campbell and Charles Lee Campbell, that the said legacy to which the said Louisa Cave would be entitled under the said will as aforesaid, and all the estate, property and effects whatsoever, both real and personal, which the said Colin Minton Campbell and the said Louisa Cave, or either of them in her right, was or were then, or should at any time during the said intended coverture become possessed of or entitled to, either at law or in equity, under any gift, devise, or bequest, in her favour, or by descent, qualification, or any other means whatsoever, of the value or to the amount of 100*l.* or upwards at any one time, should be assured and settled upon certain trusts therein declared, for the benefit of the said Louisa Cave and Colin Minton Campbell, during their respective lives, and afterwards for the children and issue of the said intended marriage in manner therein mentioned.

On the 29th March 1854, Julia Mead Cave Brown Cave, another of Mrs. Cave's daughters, intermarried with the Rev. Howard England Tunnicliffe Gough, previously to which a marriage-settlement was made and executed, whereby, after reciting that a marriage was intended to be solemnised between the said Rev. H. Gough and Julia Cave, and that under and by virtue of the will of Thomas Minton, the said Julia Cave would become entitled, upon attaining the age of twenty-one years, to a share of a legacy or sum of 12,500*l.*, or to some interest therein, subject nevertheless to the several life-interests particularly mentioned and created by the same will, or such of them as should be then subsisting and undetermined, the said H. Gough covenanted with the trustees, that in case the marriage should take effect, he and the said Julia Cave and all other necessary parties should, as soon as conveniently might be after the said Julia Cave should have attained the age of twenty-one years, settle and assure all the share or interest of the said Julia Cave in the said legacy, and also all the estate, property and effects whatsoever, real or personal, which the said H. Gough and Julia Cave, or either of them in her right, should at any time during the said coverture become possessed of or entitled to, either in law or in equity, under any gift, devise, or bequest in her favour, or by descent, succession, or any other means whatsoever, of the value of 100*l.* and upwards, should be settled and assured upon certain trusts therein mentioned, for the benefit of the said Julia Cave and H. Gough during their respective lives, and then for the issue of their marriage in manner therein mentioned.

Catherine Minton intermarried with Robert Taylor, and had three children, one of whom died on the 29th

Nov. 1843, an infant, her father obtaining letters of administration to her.

On the 25th Nov. 1845, a supplemental suit was instituted for the purpose of bringing before the court the defts. F. Cave, R. M. Taylor and H. M. Taylor, who had been born since the date of the decree, and also the defts. William Cave and Robert Taylor, in their respective characters of legal personal representatives of their deceased children.

On the 23rd Jan. 1846 an order of that date was made, in consequence of the death of Elizabeth Minton, whereby it was declared that the dividends of a share of the 13,262*l.* 12*s.* Bank Three per Cent. Annuities, to which the said Elizabeth Minton, deceased, had been entitled, became divisible on her death between the other daughters of Thomas Minton, the testator, viz., the said Mary Campbell, Sarah Minton, Julia Cave and Catherine Minton, during their lives, as tenants in common, and liberty was thereby given to any party to apply to the court on the death of any other of the daughters; and it was declared that the dividends which accrued due on the 5th Jan. next after the death of the said Elizabeth Minton were divisible between the legal personal representatives and the surviving daughters in proportion to the time she lived of the half year; the dividends to accrue due, after payment of the costs, to be paid to the said Mary Campbell, Sarah Minton, Julia Cave and Catherine Minton, in equal shares during their lives.

The costs of the suit having been paid by a sale of a portion of the stock, there remained the sum of 13,126*l.* 1*s.* 4*d.* Bank Annuities standing in the names of the trustees, two of whom (Sarah Minton, the widow and Herbert Minton) died, after the date of the above order, leaving Thos. Webb Minton and John Campbell the only surviving trustees.

On the 25th Jan. 1861 Catherine Taylor died leaving Robert Taylor, her husband, and two children, Robert Minton Taylor, and Herbert Minton Taylor, her surviving.

The petitioners claimed to be entitled as tenants in common, during their lives, to the whole of the dividends of the said sum of 13,126*l.* 1*s.* 4*d.* Bank Three per Cent. Annuities from the death of Catherine Taylor, excepting only a proportionate part of the then accruing dividend on the original and accrued shares respectively of Catherine Taylor up to the time of her death. And they prayed that it might be declared that in the events which had happened the dividends on the original or accrued shares of the said Catherine Taylor, in the sum of 13,126*l.* 1*s.* 4*d.* Bank Three per Cent. Annuities, excepting only a proportional part, up to the time of her death, of the then accruing half-yearly dividend thereon, became divisible, on the death of Catherine Taylor, among the petitioners, the other daughters of Thomas Minton, during their lives, as tenants in common, and for their separate use; that the rights and interests of all parties to and in the capital and income of the original and accrued shares might be ascertained and declared; that the costs, charges and expenses of all parties of and incident to the petition might be taxed as between solicitor and client, and might be paid by a sale of a competent part of the sum of 13,126*l.* 1*s.* 4*d.* Bank Three per Cent. Annuities; and that the dividends of the above sum previous to such sale, except such apportioned part as aforesaid, and all the dividends to accrue on the residue of the fund, after such sale of part thereof, might be ordered to be divided amongst and paid to them on their separate account during their lives.

Glasser, Q.C. and Kay appeared for the petitioners, and contended that they were entitled, as the survivors of the five daughters, to the interest of the whole fund for their lives.

submitted that they were entitled immediately to their mother's share.

C. M. Roupell, for the residuary legatee and heir-at-law, submitted that the accrued share was not disposed of except by the residuary gift.

Cecil Russell, for Charles Lee Minton and Arthur Minton, two of the sons of the testator, submitted that the words "surviving children" meant the children of the testator, and included his sons.

The VICE-CHANCELLOR.—The effect of the V. C. of England's decision, and of the language of the will, is, that the principal of this fund is to remain in its integrity, until the death of the survivor of the five daughters, and on the death of such survivor, for the first time the division of the fund is to take place amongst the persons described as "surviving children," but as to who are meant by these words I shall not now decide. Whether it means the sons or the children of the daughters this question does not now arise, although, of course, if the case could not be decided without putting an interpretation upon these words, I should have done so. The testator, beyond doubt, has first given the fund to his five daughters in terms which, if he had stopped there, would have created a joint tenancy in the fund; but he meant to deal with the interest "during their lives," using words importing a tenancy in common, "in equal parts or shares." Prima facie, subject to the effect of the context, the words "during their lives" meant during the lives of the five, and so far it is difficult to say, supposing one dies, that there is a gift beyond that period; but he goes on to direct that the principal shall be placed in the funds in trust for them or the survivor, &c., for their maintenance, and so far it is difficult to hold that there is a joint tenancy. But then comes the proviso as to what is to become of the principal "after their deaths." The V. C. of England held that "after their deaths" meant after the death of the survivor of the five. There was no gift over to any one except after their deaths, and I concur in the former decision that there is no gift of the principal until after the deaths of all. The intention was, that as long as any one was living the fund was to remain as a security for the benefit of them and the survivors, not the capital only, but the income that is in integro, and when Elizabeth died it was decided that the survivors were to have the whole income, not dividing the fund into shares; but there was a survivorship joint tenancy of it, and the survivors divided the income equally, so that they received nothing out of the fund itself, nor was there any gift which made the interest they took depend upon their deaths with or without children, but the survivors were to have the fund, irrespective of leaving children or not. Upon the whole, the construction already put is the sound one, and not until the death of the survivor of the five is a division to be made among some children or other. It is not impossible that he had contemplated the case of their leaving children; but, at all events, he gave the daughters the full benefit of the fund, which was then to go to a second set of objects, whoever they were.

COOK AND OTHERS v. WRIGHT.

Promissory note—Consideration—Compromise of claim.

Defl. was agent for Mrs. Bennett, a non-resident owner of houses in a district subject to a local Act. Works had been done by the commissioners, the expenses of which were chargeable on the owners of the adjoining premises. Notice was given to the defl. to pay as owner the proportion chargeable on A.'s houses; he attended and objected that Mrs. Bennett was owner, when he was told that if he did not pay he would be served as another man had been, against whom proceedings had been taken. Ultimately the amount was reduced, and the defl. gave promissory notes for it:

Held, that the effect of the compromise made by the defl. was, that the commissioners were induced to refrain from taking proceedings against Mrs. Bennett, and that that amounted to a consideration for the defl.'s promise to pay.

Action by the trustees under the Whitechapel Improvement Act 1853, against the defl., as ratepayer and occupier of property in the parish, to recover 21l. 10s., the amount of two promissory notes.

The declaration alleged that defl., on the 7th Feb. 1856, by his promissory note, now overdue, promised to pay to the plts. 10l. 10s. twelve months after date, but did not pay the same. There was another count on another promissory note for 11l. twenty-four months after date, and on accounts stated between them.

Pleas:—1. That after the passing and coming into operation of the Whitechapel Improvement Act 1853, and after the passing and coming into operation of the Metropolis Local Management Act 1855, he, the defl., made the several promissory notes at the request of the plts., and that at the time of making them the plts. asserted and represented to the defl., and the defl. believed such assertion and representation to be true, that there was then due and owing and payable from him, the defl., as the owner of certain lands and buildings in certain streets, called Finch-street, John-street and Dowson's-place, situate within the parish of St. Mary, Whitechapel, to the trustees of the parish of St. Mary, Whitechapel, under the provisions of the Whitechapel Improvement Act 1853, divers large sums of money in respect of paving the streets fronting, adjoining and abutting on such lands and buildings; that at the time of making such promissory notes no sum of money whatever was due or owing or payable from the defl. as such owner to the said trustees, nor was the defl. such owner as aforesaid; that there never was any consideration or value for the defl. making the said promissory notes or either of them, or for his paying the same or any part thereof; and the plts. never were, nor was any person ever a holder of the said notes or either of them, for value or consideration; and defl. says that the said account stated was stated of and concerning the matters and things in this plea mentioned, and not of or concerning any other matter or thing whatever.

2. That defl. was induced to make, and did make the promissory notes mentioned, and each of them, by the fraud, covin and misrepresentations of the plts. and others in collusion with them.

The plts. are four of the trustees acting under the Whitechapel Improvement Act 1853 (16 & 17 Vict. c. cxli.), and the defl. is a smith and ironfounder carrying on business at No. 8, Finch-street, Whitechapel, and renting two houses in John-street, of Mrs. Bennett, at a rack rent. The action was brought to recover the amounts of the two promissory notes mentioned in the declaration, made by the deft. in favour of the plts. It appeared that in 1855 the trustees under the Whitechapel Improvement Act claimed of the deft. the sum in respect of which the notes in question were given alleging that he was liable to pay for having improvements made in front of certain houses in Finch-street, two houses in John-street, and two houses in Dowson's-place. Those houses are situate in and about on public highways within the district of the Whitechapel Improvement Act, and the deft. attended a board meeting of the commissioners and contended that he was not liable to pay the claim made on him, and that he was not the owner of the said property within the meaning of the Whitechapel Improvement Act, but was merely agent for Mrs. Bennett; that he was told that if he did not pay he would be treated as one Goble had been, who, having refused to pay, had been proceeded against, and had ultimately submitted and paid the costs; and he was further told by Mr. Mitchell, the clerk to the improvement trustees, and by the trustees, that, as he paid rates and taxes, he was the owner, and he was requested to give notes for the amount at long dates; that many other persons were doing so; and that an action was pending in one of the Superior Courts in which the question of the liability of the inhabitants would be determined at the instance of the trustees, and that, if the decision was against the trustees, neither the deft. nor any of the other parties would have to pay the notes so given. Deft. asked for a reduction in the amount of the claim, which was agreed to by the board. In consequence of the above representations he gave the said notes. No decision as to the liability of persons to pay for paving improvements in front of houses abutting on highways within the Whitechapel district had been obtained: and on deft. complaining that no decision had been obtained, Mitchell said, "You have signed the notes, and must pay them, and if you do not you will be served as Goble was, which was by levying an execution on him." There was no other consideration for the notes. Deft. was not the owner of the houses, he collected the rents for the leaseholder, and paid her over the amount, deducting a percentage for his trouble; and except as collector he had no interest in the houses.

At the trial before Wightman, J., in London, at the sittings in Easter Term, the learned judge left the following questions to the jury: First, did the deft. tell Mitchell or the board, before he gave the notes, that he was not the owner? The jury found he did. Secondly, did deft. mention, before he gave the notes, that Mrs. Bennett was the owner? The jury found he did. Thirdly, did Mitchell say that, unless deft. gave the notes, he would be served as Goble had been served? The jury found that Mitchell did not say so, but that some member of the board did: whereupon a verdict was entered for the deft., leave being reserved to the plts. to move to enter a verdict for them, on the ground that the evidence did not prove the want of consideration for giving the notes, and that, upon the evidence, the plts. were entitled to a verdict. A rule having been obtained accordingly, Shee, Serjt. (Barnard with him) showed cause.—There was no legal claim on the deft. at the time the notes were given. The jury have found that the deft. was not the owner, and that Mrs. Bennett was. In Edwards v. Baugh, 12 L. J. 426, Ex.; 11 M. & W. 641, it was held that the mere existence of disputes and controversies was not a sufficient consideration, that the existence of a debt must be proved. [CROMPTON, J.—It is enough if he gave a promissory note for another party. After the trustees had taken this note, could they have sued Mrs. Bennett? Yes; the deft. was not liable to pay the amount. [BLACKBURN, J.—Here there was a real controversy between the parties.] (Forman v. Wright, 20 L. J. 145, C. P.; Addison on Contracts, 25.)

[MAG. CAS.]

Hannen in support of the rule.—The deft. was the occupier of two houses in John-street, as tenant from year to year. First, is this a good plea? Secondly, is the plea proved? It is not all proved. The deft. was not the owner, and did not believe himself so to be. [WIGHTMAN, J.—Owner under the provisions of the Act.] There was no such proof. [COCKBURN, C.J.—The officers of the board had made representations to the man that were not tenable.] A deduction was made in the accounts, and he agreed to pay the reduced sum: (Baker v. Walker, 14 M. & W. 465, 467.) [COCKBURN, C.J.—This was not given for the debt of a third person; he gave it to discharge his own liability. The effect of the evidence on my mind is that, in consequence of what he was told, the man believed himself to be liable.] He denies his liability, and asks for time. He must make out that there was no consideration, but he obtains time for the payment. [COCKBURN, C.J.—Yes, but for the payment of money he does not owe.] But he gets time for the third person, who does: (Sowerby v. Butcher, 2 Cro. & M. 368.) [BLACKBURN, J.—At present it is a question of fact, was there any evidence of an agreement for time to be allowed Mrs. Bennett?] The jury have found that a part of the plea was not proved. There was a sufficient consideration in asking for time, by granting which the plt. was prejudiced. [WIGHTMAN, J.—Suppose they cannot find the owner, is the occupier made liable?] Yes: (sects. 11-54.)

Cur. adv. vult.

July 9.—BLACKBURN, J.—In this case it appeared on the trial, the deft. was agent for Mrs. Bennett, who was the non-resident owner of houses in a district subject to a local Act. Works had been done in the adjoining street by the commissioners for executing the Act, the expenses of which, under the provisions of the Act, were charged upon the owners of the adjoining houses; notice had been given to the deft. as if he had himself been owner of the houses, calling on him for the proportion chargeable in respect of them; he attended a board meeting of the commissioners, and objected both to the want of notice and the charge, and also stated that he was not the owner of the houses, and that Mrs. Bennett was. He was told that if he did not pay, he would be treated as one Goble had been. It appeared that Goble had refused to pay the sum charged against him as owner of some houses; that the commissioners had taken legal proceedings against him, and he had submitted and paid it with costs. In the result it was agreed between the commissioners and the deft. that the amount charged upon him should be reduced, and that time should be given to pay it in three instalments; the first of the promissory notes given was duly honoured, the others were not, and were the subject of the present action. At the trial it appeared that the deft. was not, in fact, owner of the houses; as the agent for the owner he was not personally liable under the Act: the commissioners were, therefore, not in point of fact entitled to claim the money from the deft., but no case of deceit was alleged against them. It must be taken that the commissioners honestly believed that the deft. was personally liable, and really intended to take legal proceedings against him as they had done against Goble. The deft., according to his own evidence, never believed that he was liable in law, but signed the notes in order to avoid being sued as Goble was. Under these circumstances, the substantial question reserved, irrespective of the form of the plea, was, whether there was any consideration for the notes. We are of opinion that there was. There is no doubt that a bill or note given in consideration of what is supposed to be a debt is without consideration, if it appear that there was a mistake in fact as to the existence of the debt: (Bell v. Gardiner, 4 M. & G. 11.) And according to the case of Southall v. Rigg,

11 C. B. 481, and Forman v. Wright, the law is the same if a bill or note is given in consequence of a mistake of law as to the existence of the debt. But here there was no mistake on the part of the debt., either of law or fact. What he did was not only the making an erroneous account stated, but a promise to pay a debt for which he mistakenly believed himself liable. It appeared in the evidence that he believed himself not to be liable, but he knew that the plts. thought him liable, and would sue him if he did not pay, and in order to avoid the expense and trouble of legal proceedings against himself he agreed to a compromise, and the question is, whether a person who has given a note as a compromise of a claim honestly made on him, and which but for the compromise would have been at once brought to a legal decision, can resist the payment of the note on the ground that the original claim thus comprised might have been successfully resisted. If the suit had been actually commenced the point would have been concluded by authority. In Langridge v. Dorville, 5 B. & AL 117, it was held that the compromise of a suit instituted to try a doubtful question of law was a sufficient consideration for a promise. In Atlee v. Backhouse, 3 M. & W. 650, where the plt.'s goods had been seized by the Excise, and he had entered into an agreement with the Commissioners of Excise that all proceedings should be terminated, and the goods delivered up to the plt., and a sum of money paid by him to the commissioners, Parke, B. rested his judgment on the ground that this agreement of a compromise honestly made was for consideration and binding. In Cooper v. Parker, 15 C. B. 822, the Court of Ex. Ch. held that the withdrawal of an untrue defence of infancy in a suit was a sufficient consideration for a promise to accept a smaller sum in satisfaction of a larger. In these cases, however, litigation had been actually commenced, and it was argued before us, and was made an argument in point of law, that though where the plt. has actually issued a writ against the debt., a compromise honestly made is binding, yet the same compromise, if made, though litigation is pending, before the writ actually issues, is void. Edwards v. Burgh, 11 M. & W. 641, was relied on as an authority for this proposition. But in that case Lord Abinger expressly bases his judgment upon the assumption that the debt. did not, either expressly or impliedly, show that a reasonable debt existed between the parties. It may be doubtful whether the declaration in that case ought not to have been construed as disclosing a compromise and a real bond fide claim; but it does not appear to have been so construed by the court. We agree that, unless there was a reasonable claim on the one side which it was bond fide intended to pursue, there would be no ground for a compromise; but we cannot agree that (except as a test of the reality of the claim) the issuing of a writ is essential to the validity of the compromise. The position of the parties must necessarily be altered in every case of compromise, so that, if the question is afterwards opened up, they cannot be replaced as they were before the compromise, and they may well be in a less favourable position for renewing litigation. He must be at additional trouble and expense in again getting up the case, and he may no longer be able to produce the evidence which would have proved it originally; besides, though he may not in point of law be bound to refrain from enforcing his rights against third persons during the continuance of the compromise to which they are not parties, yet practically the effect of the compromise must be to prevent his doing so. For instance, in the present case there can be no doubt that the practical effect of the compromise must have been to have induced the commissioners to refrain from taking legal proceedings against Mrs. Bennett, the real owner of the houses, whilst the notice given by the debt., her agent, was running through; the compromise might have afforded no ground of defence had such proceedings been resorted to. It is this detriment to the party consenting to the compromise, arising from the necessary alteration in position, which, in our opinion, forms the real consideration for the promise, and not the technical and almost illusory consideration arising from the extra cost of litigation. The real consideration, therefore, depends not on the actual commencement of the suit, but on the legality of the claim made, and the bond fide compromise. In the present case we think there was sufficient consideration for the notice and the compromise, made as it was, and the rule to enter the verdict for the plt. must be made absolute. Rule absolute.

THE ATTORNEY-GENERAL v. JESUS COLLEGE, OXFORD.

Charity—Decree—Surplus rents—Increase in the value of the charity property—College—School.

A testator in 1712, by his will, gave all his estates to J. College absolutely. By a codicil he stated the amount of the rents of his estates, and pointed out that there was a balance of the surplus rents, which he directed should be applied in a particular manner for the benefit of B. School. A suit was instituted shortly after the testator's death for the administration of the charity estates; in which suit a decree was made, in 1714, establishing the will and codicil, and directing the trusts of them to be executed in the terms thereof. The value and income of the charity estates had considerably increased since the testator's death:

Held, that B. School was now entitled to such proportion of the present surplus rents of the charity estates, when compared with the whole rental of them, as the balance pointed out by the codicil bore to the then existing rental.

This was an information filed by her Majesty's Attorney-General, praying a declaration that by the true construction of the will and codicil of Edmund Meyricke, a school at Bala, founded by his said codicil, was entitled to the whole of the surplus rents and profits of the estates belonging to the testator in the county of Merioneth, after providing for the scholars and exhibitioners at Jesus College, Oxford; or at all events, that the said school was entitled to a much larger proportion of the said rents and profits than had hitherto been paid and applied for the use and benefit of the said school: that a new scheme might be settled for the application of the said charity estates and funds and the income thereof, and that in settling such scheme regard might be had to the rights and interests of the said school at Bala, and to the aforesaid ordinance of the said commissioners, and that trustees of the said school at Bala might be appointed: and for an account of the rents and profits of the charity estates and funds received by the debt., the principal, fellows and scholars of Jesus College, and of the application thereof.

The information stated that the Rev. Edmund Meyricke, by his will, dated the 25th March 1712, duly devised and bequeathed as follows:—"And as to my worldly estate, which God Almighty has blessed me with above my merits or expectations, I dispose thereof in manner following. Imprimis: Whereas I always intended to bestow a good part of what God should please to bless me withal for the encouragement of learning in Jesus College in Oxford, for the better maintenance of six of the junior scholars who are or shall be scholars of the foundation of the college out of the six counties of North Wales, I do give, devise, and bequeath all my real and personal estate other than and besides what thereof is or shall be by this my will, or shall be by any codicil or codicils of this my will, or any instrument in writing under my hand and seal, whereby I may or shall give, devise, or bequeath any part of my real or personal estate, which instrument in writing shall be deemed and taken as a codicil to this my will, and such codicil or codicils, or instrument in writing, shall be annexed to this my will, and shall be as part and parcel thereof, given or to be given, demised, or bequeathed by such codicil or codicils, or instrument in writing, or any such instruments in writing, unto and for these several uses and purposes—that is to say, unto every one of the said six scholars, particularly and severally, the annual sum of 10*l.* of lawful money of Great Britain during his residence in the said college; and for the maintenance and settlement of six exhibitioners in the said college, natives of the six counties of North Wales, or of any or either of the said six counties, and of my kindred, if such of that number of exhibitioners, else such exhibitioners to be others of the said six counties, to make up the said number of six. I do give to each and every of the said exhibitioners the annual sum of 8*l.* of lawful money during his residence in the college, the said 10*l.* per annum to each and every of the said scholars, and the 8*l.* per annum to each and every of the said exhibitioners, as aforesaid, to be paid unto them severally and respectively yearly and every year during their respective residence in the said college as aforesaid, out of the yearly rents, issues and profits of my said estate, and the remainder of the yearly rents, issues and profits of such part of my estate other than and beside what thereof is or shall be by this my will, or shall be by any codicil or codicils, or any instrument or instruments in writing under my hand and seal as aforesaid, given, devised, or bequeathed otherwise; and I do give, devise and bequeath to and for these further uses and purposes, that is to say, for the buying of advowsons, of rectories, impropriations, or vicarages, whereto the principal for the time being, and the fellows of the said college shall or may, as patrons thereof, present fit persons thereto out of the said number of the said six scholars; or if it happen that there be none of such scholars capable to be presented thereto, then any of the said exhibitioners that shall be capable to be presented thereto, such scholars and such exhibitioners to be so presented to such advowsons of such rectories, impropriations and vicarages as there shall be any vacancy or vacancies of such livings or benefices; or if it happen that there be none of such scholars or of such exhibitioners capable to be presented thereto, then one of the North Wales fellows of the said college is to be presented, instead of such of the said scholars, or of such of the said exhibitioners as shall not be capable to be presented as aforesaid to such vacancy as may be of such of the said rectories, impropriations, or vicarages. And my will and further meaning and intent is as to the said six exhibitioners, that they and each and every of them shall be well and duly paid yearly the said sum of 8*l.* per annum, as aforesaid, until they do or shall take their several and respective degrees of M.A., or until they or any or either of them shall have received and enjoy a cure of souls really worth 40*l.* per annum. And I do hereby give, devise and bequeath such part of my estate so given, devised and bequeathed for and to the said six scholars, and the said six exhibitioners, and for the buying of such advowsons of rectories, impropriations or vicarages as aforesaid, and for the use and purposes aforesaid, and the yearly rents, issues and profits thereof, yearly and every year for ever, for and to the same uses and purposes for ever, and to and for no other use, intent, or purpose whatsoever; and that the same may be so well and truly done, from time to time, and at all times as aforesaid, I do hereby nominate, constitute, authorise, empower, appoint and desire my worthy good friends the Right Rev. Father in God Humphrey Lord Bishop of Hereford, and Dr. Jonathan Edwards, Principal of Jesus College, and Dr. Henry Smabridge, canon of Christ's College, in Oxford, and Dr. John Wynne, or any three or two of them, to be trustees to order and manage my estate, so given for the said uses and purposes relating to the said Jesus College as aforesaid, and to receive the yearly rents and profits of such part of my estate as appropriated for those uses and purposes, and to pay and dispose of the same yearly for the said uses and purposes as aforesaid, for and during the term or terms of their natural lives respectively; and after the decease of any two of them that shall happen to die before the other two, then thereupon the principal of the said college, in case the said Dr. Jonathan Edwards happen to be one of the two first, and one of the senior fellows of the college, to be such trustees in the stead or places of such two of the said trustees so deceased, or if the said Dr. Edwards be not one of the two first that shall so happen to die, then one of the said senior fellows of the said college to be one of the said trustees along with the said Dr. Edwards, and the said other surviving trustees for and during their lives respectively; and from and after the deceases of the said four trustees hereinbefore named, then for the future and for ever the trustees of my said estate so given, devised and bequeathed as aforesaid, to and for the said said six scholars, and the said six exhibitioners, and for the buying of such advowsons as aforesaid for the uses and purposes as aforesaid, and all and every the matters and things relating to the same as aforesaid, shall be the principal of the said college for the time being for ever, and two of the senior fellows of the said college for the time being for ever, and they are by me hereby constituted, authorised, empowered and appointed to be such trustees for the said uses and purposes relating to the said college as aforesaid, and to act and do in and touching the same, and in and concerning such part of my said estate so given, devised and bequeathed for and towards the said six scholars and the said six exhibitioners, and the buying of such advowsons as aforesaid for the uses and purposes aforesaid, and the management of such part of my said estate as appropriated to and for those uses and purposes as aforesaid from time to time and at all times as occasion shall be, as they shall think fit or judge necessary yearly and in every year for ever, that the same may be truly and duly done as aforesaid yearly and in every year for ever, according to my true intent and well meaning herein expressed for the said several uses and purposes aforesaid." And after giving the trustees thereby named and every other succeeding trustees, a guinea to buy him a mourning ring out of the yearly rents of such part of his said estate as should come to their hands for the uses and purposes aforesaid relating to the colleges as aforesaid, the said will proceeded as follows:—"Item: I give unto the minister of the parish of St. Peters, in the county borough of Carmarthen for the time being for ever, the sum of 10*s.* for preaching a sermon in the parish church of St. Peters as aforesaid, in the said county borough, on St. Barnaby's day, being the 11th June yearly, being the day wherein I was christened in the year of our Lord 1636; and the like sum of 10*s.* for preaching another sermon in the said parish church of St. Peter's on the 30th day of August yearly, being the day wherein I was ordained deacon and priest of the Church of England by the Right Rev. Father in God Robt. Skinner, then Lord Bishop of Oxford, in New College Chapel in Oxford, in the year of our Lord 1662; the said sermons to be so preached on the said days yearly and in every year for ever; and such minister for the time being yearly for ever to be paid such 10s. and 10s. yearly for ever out of the rent annually due and payable of and for a certain close of mine called Parkley Lone, in the said parish of St. Peter's, which I bought of Jn. Muggle Mercer. Item: I give to the poor people of the said county borough of Carmarthen the sum of 20s. yearly for ever (I mean such poor people as do not receive any poor-rates or pensions) to be distributed amongst them, the value thereof in bread, by the vicar or minister for the time being of the said parish of St. Peter's; that is to say, 10s. worth of bread on the said 11th day of June, and the other 10s. worth of bread on the 30th day of August yearly for ever; and such minister for the time being yearly for ever to be paid such 10s. and 10s. for preaching such sermons, and also such 10s. and 10s. for such bread out of the yearly rent of and for the said close called Parkley Lone; or in default of such payment, such minister to distrain on any corn, hay, or cattle in the said close, in order to recover the same, and his costs and charges touching the same; such sermons yearly being so given by me for the benefit of those devout Christians as shall come to be auditors of the same." "And, lastly, I do hereby nominate, constitute, authorise, empower, ordain, make and appoint the said Rt. Rev. Father in God Humphrey Lord Bishop of Hereford, the said Dr. Jonathan Edwards, the said Dr. Henry Smabridge, and the said Dr. John Wynne to be my executors of this my last will and testament, and only so to be to and for the several and respective ends, intents, uses and purposes aforesaid, and as aforesaid, and as I shall give, devise, bequeath, order, will, or appoint, in and by any codicil or codicils, or such instrument in writing as hereinbefore mentioned and expressed."

The testator duly made a codicil, dated the 14th May 1712, and thereby, amongst other devises and bequests therein contained, devised as follows:—"Item: I give, devise and bequeath all that my messuage and tenement, with the appurtenances thereto belonging, called Tytan-y-Donmen, situate, lying and being in the town of Bala, in the said county of Merioneth, together with my one acre of land in Park and Caeyrillechwedd, now or of late in the possession of Philip Morgan, at or under the yearly rent of 3*l.* 12*s.*, to and for the use and benefit of a school and schoolmaster, in which school there shall be thirty poor boys of North Wales settled and taught grammar learning, until they shall be thought fit to be removed to other schools or employment, or to be put apprentices, at the discretion of the visitors and trustees of and for such school hereinafter named and appointed, and such school to be kept in convenient room or rooms in the said house or messuage, and the rest of the said house and the appurtenances thereunto belonging, and the said acre of land, for the dwelling-house and benefit of such schoolmaster. And I do further give, devise, and bequeath the sum of 15*l.* yearly to the said thirty scholars (that is to say), 10*s.* to be paid yearly for and towards the clothing of each of them yearly and every year for ever, and the sum of 15*l.* of lawful money of Great Britain to the schoolmaster of the said school, for the time being for ever, to be paid unto him by half-yearly equal payments, that is to say, on the first day of May and the 1st day of Nov. yearly for ever, or within fifteen days next after the said days yearly, for the benefit, maintenance and livelihood of such schoolmaster, besides the use and benefit of the said house, messuage and appurtenances, and the said acre of land given as aforesaid. And I do further give, devise and bequeath so much money to be laid out yearly, and as often as the visitors and trustees of such school shall think fit, or judge necessary for the repairs of the said messuage and premises and the keeping of the same in sufficient repair from time to time, and at all times for ever, there being the sum of 4*l.* 17*s.* of the present rents of my estate in Merionethshire above the sum of 109*l.* per annum, by me given by my last will to six scholars and six exhibitioners in Jesus College, in Oxford, as in and by my said will, and over and above the said 15*l.* towards clothing the said thirty scholars, and the said 15*l.* per annum for such schoolmaster as aforesaid, but the said house or messuage and acre of land, given as aforesaid for the use and benefit of such school and schoolmaster, being of the yearly rent of 3*l.* 12*s.* as aforesaid, being so much of the said 4*l.* 17*s.*, the remainder thereof is 1*l.* 5*s.* per annum, for the repairs of the said house and messuage and premises, and keeping the same in repair yearly and at all times for ever as aforesaid. And I do desire, constitute, authorise, ordain and appoint the Right Rev. Father in God the Lord Bishop of St. Asaph and Bangor for the time being, and my nephew Robert Meyrick, and Kinsman John Adams, of Kyftu, during their respective lives, and after their respective decease the heir of Ucheldre for the time being, when he shall be of the age of twenty-one years, to be visitors and trustees of and for the said school and schoolmaster and the said scholars, and for the ordering and management of the same according to my will and true intent and meaning herein, and concerning the same as aforesaid from time to time and as often as there shall be occasion for ever, only I do hereby will, order and appoint Mr. Evan Griffiths, the present master of my charity school at Carmarthen, to be the first schoolmaster of the said school at Bala, and to have, hold and enjoy the said house and messuage and acre of land for the use and benefit of the said schoolmaster of such school as aforesaid, and also to be paid the said 15*l.* per annum, given to and for such schoolmaster as aforesaid, for and during his the said Evan Griffiths' natural life.

The testator died soon after he had made the said will and codicil, and they were duly proved by the Principal of Jesus College alone, on the 6th May 1813.

In 1714 a suit having been instituted for the administration of the charity estates, a decree was made, whereby the will and codicil were established, the trusts thereof declared to be performed, and the several payments directed by the will and codicil ordered to be made and provided for in the terms and according to the express intention of those instruments.

Various other suits have from time to time been since instituted with reference to the charity estates; and several decrees and orders for investment, and other purposes, have been made in such suits.

The income of the property has, from the death of the testator to the present time, increased considerably in amount, and the estates and funds now applicable to the charitable objects of the testator's will and codicil were stated by the information to be the following:—

the college, arising from surplus rents and profits of real estate.

In pursuance of the provisions of the 17 & 18 Vict. c. 81, the commissioners appointed for the purposes of that Act framed an ordinance dated the 3rd April 1857 in relation to Jesus College, Oxford.

The information set out several clauses of the ordinance (to which, however, it is not necessary here more particularly to refer), and stated that the possible effect of the said ordinance would be that shortly there might not be a single scholar or exhibitor from North Wales on the foundation of the said college, but that they all both scholars and exhibitors might be natives of South Wales or England; and that even if there should be North Wales scholars and exhibitors, they would be superannuated at five years from the date of their matriculation, and that therefore none of them would be in holy orders, except under very unusual circumstances.

The informant therefore submitted that, by the true construction of the will and codicil of the said Edmund Meyricke, the whole surplus rents and profits of the testator's estate in Merionethshire, after providing the annual sums by the testator directed to be paid for scholars and exhibitors in Jesus College in Oxford, were applicable for the use and benefit of the school at Bala, founded by the codicil to the testator's will, or, at all events, that the said school was now entitled to a much large proportion of the increased rents and profits of the testator's estate than it had yet received by virtue of the aforesaid orders of this court. The informant showed that it appeared by the codicil, and was the fact, that the real estate of the testator in Merionethshire was of the annual value at the date of the said codicil of 142*l.* 17*s.*, and that the whole then surplus consisting of 1*l.* 5*s.* per annum was given to him for the maintenance and repair of the said school. And the informant further submitted, that it was the intention of the testator that there should for all time be trustees and visitors of the said school apart from and wholly independent of the principal and fellows of Jesus College, Oxford, to whom the management and supervision of the said school and the protection of the interests thereof should be intrusted. The information then stated that neither to the original suit, in which the decree of 1714 was pronounced, nor to any of the subsequent proceedings hereinbefore referred to, was any person as trustee or otherwise exclusively representing the interests of the said school made a party, except that the Bishops of St. Asaph and Bangor were named as relators; and prayed to the effect hereinbefore particularly mentioned.

Palmer, Q.C. and J. H. Terrell appeared for the Attorney-General.

Lloyd, Q.C. and Grenside for the defts., the principal and fellows of Jesus College; and Hobhouse for the visitors.

The following authorities were cited in the argument:—Attorney-General v. The Dean and Canons of Windsor, 24 Beav. 679; The Thetford School case, 8 pt. Rep. p. 401.

The MASTER of the ROLLSSaid:—The question on this information turns upon the proper construction to be put upon the will of the Rev. Edmund Meyricke. The testator left considerable estates to Jesus College, and the object of the information is to have the whole of the surplus rents of his estates in Merionethshire, or a large portion of them, applied to the use of the school at Bala. The information prays as follows: [His Honour read the prayer as above stated and continued.] The will, which bears date the 25th March 1712, is to this effect. It begins with a recital in these terms: "Whereas I always intended to bestow a good part of what God should bless me withal for the encouragement of learning in Jesus College, in Oxford, and for the better maintenance of six of the junior scholars who are or shall be scholars of the foundation of the said college, out of the six counties of North Wales, I do give, devise and bequeath all my real and personal estate, other than," &c. That recital is very important. Although the recital cannot control the plain meaning of the words of disposition, yet if the words of the devise are ambiguous, the recital may be referred to to explain and ascertain what was the real meaning of the testator. After giving certain directions with respect to the maintenance of six scholars and six exhibitors, and the payment to each of the six scholars of the annual sum of 10*l.*, and to each of the six exhibitors the annual sum of 8*l.*, he proceeded thus: [His Honour then read the devise in the will, as above stated, and continued.] It is important to observe that complete control is given to the trustees, who in effect are members of the college and persons concerned in the government of the college. The will then gives certain pecuniary legacies, and concludes by the testator appointing the said trustees his executors: "And only so to be and for the several and respective ends, intents, uses and purposes aforesaid and as aforesaid, and as I shall give, devise, bequeath, order, will, or appoint in and by any codicil or codicils, as hereinbefore mentioned and expressed." I am quite clear as to the general effect of the will. In the first place, the whole of the property, subject to the legacies and limited interests which are carved out of it, is given to Jesus College, for the full benefit of the college, in the manner pointed out by the will. Those gifts are subject to the gifts contained in the codicil, and the question is how far the codicil takes away the gifts in the will? The rule applicable to all these cases is that there must be distinct words in the codicil to have that effect. I have no doubt that the effect of the will is to give to the college an absolute and beneficial interest. The testator made a codicil to his will, dated the 14th May 1712, which was in these terms: [His Honour then read the codicil as above stated, and continued.] The testator then appointed certain persons to be visitors and trustees of the said school. The result of my consideration of the codicil is, that it does not alter the final destination of the estates which are devised for the benefit of the college, and that the testator did not intend, and has not expressed his intention, that the whole estate, or that the whole of the surplus rents, should be applied for the benefit of the Bala school, subject to the payments thereon in favour of the scholars and exhibitors. It is not possible for me to assent to that view of the information which seeks a declaration accordingly. I think that, according to the true construction of the codicil, the Bala school is entitled to an apportionment of the surplus rents in the manner I shall state. I regard the payments of 15*l.* and 30*s.* as fixed payments; and I am of opinion that in such proportion as 4*l.* 17*s.* originally stood to the whole of the rents, the Bala school is now entitled to the surplus of the present rents, to be applied, after payment of the rent of the school-house, for the purposes of the school. It is unnecessary to refer to the numerous cases which were cited, commencing with the Thetford School case. The principle of all those cases is well established; the application of it depends upon the meaning to be given to the language of the testator. By his will the testator in this instance gives the whole estate for the benefit of Jesus College; but when in the codicil he points out that there is a balance of 4*l.* 17*s.*, which is to be applied for the benefit of the Bala school, I cannot say that the amount of the gift is merely limited to that sum in addition to the 15*l.* and 30*s.*, but I think that they are entitled to such proportion of the surplus rents at the present time as 4*l.* 17*s.* bore to the rents at that time, and that this proportion is to be applied for the benefit of the school, and a scheme must be directed accordingly. I will make a declaration to that effect, but I cannot go further. I think the information was a proper one, and that the costs of the information must be paid out of the rents of the estate.

PARE v. CLEGG.

Friendly society—Certificate—Creditor's suit—Trustee and cestui que trust—Parties.

The certificate of a friendly society, duly made under the Friendly Societies Acts, was in a creditor's suit held to be conclusive as to the character of the society.

The plt. lent money to a friendly society; but on the occasion of the loan all the due formalities required by the rules of the society were not observed. It was clear, however, that the society had had the benefit of the loan:

Held, that they could not object to the plt.'s claim on the ground of informality.

The plt. was a member of the society, and under the circumstances of the case the relationship of trustee and cestui que trust was held to have been established.

There were classes, of upwards of 400 persons, interested in the society, which was, in fact, extinct.

The plt. in the creditor's suit made one of each class parties to represent such persons:

Held, that all parties interested were sufficiently before the court.

This was a creditor's suit, instituted against the defts., as trustees of a certain society, called "The Rational Society." The society had under that name been certified by Mr. Tidd Pratt in 1842 to be a friendly society, and the nature and objects of it, and the character of the plt.'s claim, may be shortly stated as follows:—and first, as to the nature of the society: that will best appear by an extract from the rules of it.

Rule 17. Non-responsibility. — It is therefore evident that man has not been created to be a responsible being in the ordinary acceptation of the term, but that he is left to experience the necessary effects of his conduct, which teach all in the best possible manner, through the sensations of pain and pleasure, the means of increasing happiness; and through this knowledge a dull man in society may effect the greatest improvement in the character and condition of the infant man and of the human race."

Rule 20. For further exposition of the objects and principles of this society, reference is made to the "Outlines of the Rational System of Society, by Robt Owen."

The outline, as referred to, contained the following paragraphs:—Creed and duties of this system, and the religion of the new moral world. Articles: 1. That all facts yet known to man indicate that there is an external or internal cause of all existences by the fact of their existence, and this all-pervading cause of motion and change in the universe is the power which the nations of the world have called God, Jehovah, Lord, &c. &c.; but that the facts are yet unknown to man which define what that power is. 2. That all ceremonial worship by man of this cause whose qualities are yet so little known, proceeds from ignorance of his own nature, that it can be of no real utility in practice, and that it is impossible to train men to become natural in their feelings, thoughts, or actions, until all such forms shall cease. On the responsibility of man: 5. No one shall be responsible for his physical, intellectual, or moral organisation. 6. No one shall be responsible for the sensations made on his organisation by external circumstances. 7. No one shall be responsible for the feelings and convictions within him, and which are to him the truth while they continue. On the general arrangement for the population: 15. Under the rational system of society, after the children shall have been trained to acquire new habits and new feelings derived from the laws of human nature, there shall be no useless private property.

Secondly, as to the objects of the society:—They were stated to be to raise by subscriptions amongst its members, or by voluntary contributions, donations, or loans, funds for the mutual assistance, maintenance and education of their wives, and husbands and children or nominees, in sickness, infancy, or advanced age, or other natural state or contingency, during which the funds were to be applied in the purchase or rental of land whereon to erect buildings wherein the members should by united labour support each other under every vicissitude, and thus by lawful means to arrange the powers of production, distribution, consumption and education in order to produce among the members feelings of pure charity and social affection for each other, and practically plant on earth the standard of peace and goodwill towards men.

The community fund was to be raised by subscription from such members as might be able and willing to contribute thereto. The directors of such society were by the original rules empowered to borrow by way of security or otherwise any such sums of money as might be required for the purposes of the society, provided a resolution to that effect was agreed to unanimously by the directors at a meeting held after fourteen days' special notice. And it was also provided that every sum of money so borrowed should be taken in the names of the trustees of the society for the time being, and be charged upon the stocks, funds, lands, buildings and premises of the society, and remain as a security for the full payment and satisfaction of the whole of such money; principal, interest and costs. Those rules were, however, subsequently modified, and the power to borrow was given to the central board upon an unanimous resolution to that effect being agreed to at a special meeting, and it was provided that for every sum of money borrowed by the society on the security of the community fund, a certificate in a certain form should be granted to the lender which should pledge community property of the society for repayment of the sum borrowed. The modified rules also provided for the payment of interest on all loans of money at 5 per cent., and that in the event of a dissolution of the society, or of any of its establishments, all moneys contributed by the society should be first repaid, and that the balance should be divided among the members in the ratio of the sums originally contributed by each.

Thirdly, the character of the plt.'s claim appeared to be the following:—In the year 1839 certain leasehold property was demised to the defts. W. Clegg and C. F. Green and J. Finch (the father of E. Finch, one of the defts.) for a term of ninety-nine years from Michaelmas 1839, at the yearly rent of 376*l*. The society took possession of the property so purchased, and erected and kept up at considerable expense an establishment thereon, called "Harmony" or "Harmony-hall." Part of the money so expended was lent to the society by the plt., who was a member of it, and partly by certain persons on behalf of the "Home Colonisation Society." The sum lent by the plt. was one of 500*l*, which he raised by the sale of certain railway shares. The 500*l* was paid to the society in the month of May or June 1842, through their general secretary, who was the proper authority to act in the borrowing of the money by the central board. The terms upon which the plt. made such loan were, that the same with the expenses and interest should be repaid at the end of a month. In the case of the plt.'s loan, however, the formalities prescribed by the rules were not observed, and he did not take a certificate in the form mentioned in the rules for the money lent by him. Before the expiration of the month from the time of the loan, the plt. consented, at the request of the secretary, to postpone the payment till the 30th Sept. following; but the amount of such loan and interest was not paid, and still remained due to the plt. In the month of June 1843 a minute was entered in the minute-book of the central board as follows:—"A sum of 500*l.* having been raised by Mr. Pare in June 1842 as a loan to the society for one month, which loan is not yet repaid, and an expense of 9*l.* 16*s.* 9*d.* having been incurred in raising the same, Resolved that this debt and expenses be paid by the society, and that interest at the rate of 5 per cent. per annum be allowed for the principal sum, until the same be paid." In the month of Feb. 1845 the plt. applied by letter to the central board pressing for an immediate settlement of his claim in respect of the loan made to the society. In reply to that application Mr. J. Buxton, the then president of the society, wrote to the plt. a letter dated the 18th day of the same month of February, in which, after stating that his claim rested upon merits peculiar to itself, and objecting to the memorandum which had been made by the central board as improper, considering the temporary character of the plt.'s loan, he stated that he did not make such statement in order to invalidate the plt.'s claim, but only out of a desire to discharge a public duty, and he expressed his willingness, should the plt. not be present at the then ensuing congress, to lay before the delegates any application the plt. might think proper with a view of arriving at an amicable settlement. The congress alluded to in that letter was held on the 23rd May 1845, and several resolutions were passed as to the unsatisfactory state of the affairs of the society. Among those resolutions was the following one, made after a full statement of the plt.'s claim, "that the minute of the central board dated the 17th June 1843 in relation to the claim of Mr. Pare, be and is hereby confirmed by this congress." At a further special congress held on the 10th July following, it was resolved that all the property of the society should be assigned to Messrs. Buxton, Bracher and Bate in trust for the benefit of the creditors. In May 1846, in consequence of the difficulties and liabilities of the society, Mr. J. Finch, on behalf of his co-lessees and himself, took possession of the leasehold property in question in this suit. At a special meeting of the officers and members of the society (including the plt.) held on the 29th June 1846, the following resolutions were passed:—"First, that in the opinion of this meeting the appointment of Messrs. Buxton, Bracher and Bate, or other person or persons by the Rational Society as assignees, was not legally carried out, and was and is therefore of no avail, and this meeting is further of opinion that the lessees have alone legal possession of the property of the society, and they having stated that their object is to see justice done to all parties, and that as speedily as possible, this meeting has full reliance on the honour of the said lessees, and hereby requests that they will proceed to dispose of the property, and make such distribution of the proceeds as to them shall appear, under all circumstances, just and equitable. Secondly, that this meeting is of opinion that Mr. Buxton should immediately place in the hands of the lessees any and all the documents, papers, &c., which he may hold, and which are connected with the society's affairs, and necessary to the proper wind-up of the same, together with any information which may tend to the same object; and further, that having done so, he should forthwith withdraw from the premises, that the lessees having entire and undisputed possession, may be enabled to make the most of the property for the benefit of the creditors. Thirdly, that the resolutions of the meeting be signed by the chairman on its behalf, and that Messrs. J. Ardill, J. Jackson and W. Pare (the plt.) be and are hereby appointed to lay the same before Mr. Finch, the acting lessee, and request his acquiescence, at the same time assuring him that this meeting is prepared to give him any aid which in them lies in carrying the said resolutions into effect." Those resolutions were adopted and approved at a special congress of the society, held on the following day, the 30th June. In 1847 the lessees underlet the leasehold premises to Mr. Edmondson for the purpose of a schoolhouse, and the tenancy still subsisted, and they also sold to Mr. Edmondson the stock and other moveable property thereon for a considerable sum of money, and they applied such money in the payment of certain debts of the society. Mr. J. Finch, one of the lessees, died in 1857, having previously assigned all his interest in the property to the deft. Edward Finch for the residue of the term granted by the lease. No further step had been taken to wind-up the society. Under these circumstances the plt. instituted the present suit, alleging that the leasehold property was community property of the society, and had become and remained subject to a charge in the first place for the repayment of all moneys advanced, or contributed under the above-stated rules, relating to loans to the society; and as to the balance, if any, according to the directions laid down in that behalf in the said rules.

The plt. filed the bill on behalf of himself and all lenders or contributors of moneys, for the purposes of the society under the rules aforesaid (except the creditors of the society who were defts.), against W. Clegg, Chas. F. Green and Edwd. Finch, as such trustees as aforesaid; and the bill prayed that such defts. might be declared to be trustees of the leasehold estate for the plt. and all other persons interested therein; and that the rights of the plt. and all other persons might be declared; for an account, for sale of the trust estate, and for payment out of the proceeds of the debts due to the plt. and the other persons entitled thereto. The society had long since ceased to exist, and was not made a deft., there being no board of directors, or other official person in existence, to represent it. The plt. had, however, made Mr. and Mrs. James Wm. Barton defts. to the suit, as representing the certificated loan-holders of the society, and Mr. Geo. Holyoake, as representing the ordinary members. All the persons interested in the trust-estates were more than 400 in number; but they were represented by the actual parties to the suit.

Follett, Q.C., Baggallay and Westlake appeared for the plt., and contended, first, that this society had been duly certified by Mr. Tidd Pratt to be a friendly society, within the rules of the Society Acts; secondly, that although the society had in fact ceased to exist, yet, as all classes of persons interested in it were before the court either as pltas. or defts., it was virtually, and therefore sufficiently, represented; thirdly, although the formalities required by the rules had not on the occasion of the plt.'s loan been all observed, his money had been clearly applied for the benefit of the society, and was therefore made a debt due from the society to the plt.; the formalities were required for the protection of the society, and not for the creditor, and the society could waive them if they chose, and in this case they had done so; further, the plt.'s claim was recognised and confirmed by the members of the central board, and the vote of the general board; fourthly, the transactions between the lessees of the property in question and the society and its creditors, established the relation of trustee and cestuis que trust between them: The debts became, therefore, a charge upon the society, and the Statute of Limitations had no operation: (10 Geo. 4, c. 56; 4 & 5 Will. 4, c. 40; Hodges v. Wale, 22 L. T. Rep. 144; Yeates v. Roberts, 3 Drew, 170; 18 & 19 Vict. c. 63, ss. 17, 18; 15 & 16 Vict. c. 86, s. 42, r. 9.)

Morris appeared for the defts. Mr. and Mrs. Barton, and Mr. G. Holyoake.

Lloyd, Q.C. and Batten appeared for the trustees, and contended, first, that the society in question was, having regard to the above-stated nature of it, clearly founded for an immoral and illegal purpose, and therefore the money advanced by the plt. for its benefit was not the proper subject for a suit in equity; secondly, that the society, in its character of a society, was not represented on the record; and thirdly, that as on the occasion of the loan being made by the plt., the proper formalities prescribed by the rules of the society were not observed, and as the debt, being one of simple contract, even if it originally bound the society, was barred by the Statute of Limitations; the plt. could not succeed in this suit. They cited Southey v. Sherwood, 2 Mer. 435; Laurence v. Smith, Jacob, 471; De Begnis v. Armstead, 10 Bing. 107; Ewing v. Osbaldiston, 2 Myl. & Cr. 53. Follett, Q.C. in reply.

The MASTER of the ROLLS said:—This is a suit by a person claiming to be a creditor of a society called the Rational Society, and seeking to have some property belonging to that society, in the hands of the three first defts. upon the record, applied in the payment of the debts due by the society to the plt. and to other creditors circumstanced similarly to himself. That the property belongs to the society is not disputed. The first question is, whether the plt. ever was a creditor of the society, and whether he is so still? The following facts appear to me to be clear: First, that the plt., in May 1842, advanced 500*l.* for the purpose of its being applied for the benefit of the Rational Society, and that it was, together with other sums of money, contributed by members of the Home Colonisation Society, applied for the benefit of the Rational Society. Secondly, that at the meeting of the directors of the Rational Society, which took place on the 3rd June 1843, the following resolutions were passed [his Honour read the minute above stated, and continued:] Thirdly, that on the 8th Feb. 1845, the plt. wrote to the central board of the society requiring payment; in answer to which application Mr. Buxton, the chairman, disputed the claim; but the annual congress of the society, held on the 23rd May 1845, duly confirmed the entry which I have read, relating to Mr. Pare's debt. After those transactions I think it impossible to say that Mr. Pare was not a creditor of the society at that time for the sum of 509*l.* 16*s.* 9*d.* It does not, however, rest there; for he seems afterwards to have been treated as a creditor by all parties concerned. In June 1846 Mr. Buxton summoned a meeting of all parties interested in the society for the 29th of that month, for the purpose of making a full disclosure of the affairs of the society; and, by the same advertisement, issued under the rules of the society, he summoned a special congress of the delegates of the society for the following day, viz. the 30th June, to take into consideration the affairs of the society. The meeting of the 29th June 1846 took place accordingly, at which the following resolution was come to. [The M.R. read the resolution above stated, and continued:] At the special congress, which was held the following day, viz. the 30th June 1846, those resolutions were adopted and confirmed. I am of opinion that after those transactions it is impossible for any one to contend that Mr. Pare was not for the time a creditor of the society, or that he is not so now, for the sum of 509*l.* 16*s.* 9*d.* An argument against the plt.'s claim was founded on those sections of the rules of the society which gave the central board a power of borrowing, which specified in what manner that should be done, and which also provided that a certificate should be given to the members—none of which formalities were followed on the occasion of the plt.'s loan. But, although the absence of those formalities might raise a question of priorities, I am of opinion that the society might have incurred debts independent on this rule; for, unless it could have done so, it could not have gone on; and it, or those who represent it, and have had the benefit of the plt.'s money, cannot now repudiate the debt. And I am of that opinion, although the society did not adopt the right method of giving to the creditor the proper certificate. The first and most material objection to the claim of the plt. was, that, admitting the entry and resolution of the congress to bind the society, still this was only a simple contract debt; and that, as no steps have been taken to enforce payment until the filing of the bill in this suit in 1860, the debt is now barred by the Statute of Limitations. I think, however, that the argument of the plt.'s counsel as to that objection is a conclusive answer to it, viz., that the resolutions passed in June 1846, and sanctioned by the special congress (which resolutions I have read), constituted a trust of the leasehold property in question for the benefit of the creditors generally. That being so, the relationship of trustee and cestuis que trust was constituted, and that being established no question as to the statute arises. That the defts. are the trustees of the property for the benefit of the creditors is not only established in the manner I have mentioned, but in truth it is not disputed by any of them; and the only real question raised by two of them (for the third consents to act as the court shall direct) is, whether the plt. is or is not one of such cestuis que trust? There were, however, two other objections which were very strenuously urged against the right of the plt. to sustain this suit. The former, and more important of them, was this—that the society was founded for an immoral and illegal purpose; which it was contended appeared from the rules of it. The immorality with which the society was charged, is of this kind; that it was founded, first, for the purpose of propagating natural religion to the injury of revealed religion; secondly, in order to put an end to all moral restraint on the actions of mankind; and thirdly, with a view to destroy the institution of private property generally. I have perused the rules of the society for the purpose of considering the force of that objection; and although I am of opinion that the society is based upon irrational principles, and seeks to realise a visionary and unattainable object, it ought not to be considered as founded for the purpose of propagating irreligious and immoral doctrines, in the ordinary and correct acceptance of those words. It is not such a society as to disable a person dealing with it from acquiring the right to enforce a contract into which the society may have entered with him. I consider that the certificate of Mr. Tidd Pratt must, in the present case, be held to be conclusive as to the character of the society, and that it is to be treated by me as any other ordinary friendly society. That objection therefore cannot, in my opinion, be sustained as a bar to the suit. The only remaining question argued against the constitution of the suit was, that the society, in its character of a society, is not represented on this record. In consequence of the failure and the insolvency of the society there is not now an officer or board in existence who can be made parties as defts. to this suit for the purpose of representing it. The plt., therefore, has adopted this course: he has selected a member of the society from each of the classes of members composing it, and which classes are not represented by the plt., to represent the class to which the plt. does not belong; and accordingly Mr. and Mrs. Barton are made defts., to represent the creditors who have certificates under the rules to which I have already referred. Mr. Holyoake represents the ordinary class of the members of the society as distinct from the creditors. Having done that, the plt. has, in my opinion, done all that can be required of him; and the circumstance that the defts. so selected, think fit to support the case of the plt., and desire to have an ordinary decree for an account, does not lead me to the conclusion that they have not acted as is the best for the class to whom they respectively belong. Nor does even the selection of the plt.'s solicitor to conduct their case (if, as I am informed, such is the fact in the present instance) weaken or destroy that opinion on my part. That being so, I think that the plt. is entitled to a decree for an account against the first three defts. upon the record in respect of the lease assigned to them, and to an inquiry as to who the creditors of the society are, and what are their respective priorities; and I must reserve further consideration and costs.

The solicitors for the plt. and some of the defts. were Messrs. Ashurst, Son and Morris.

The solicitors for the other defts. were Messrs. Warry, Robins and Burgess, Messrs. Field and Roscoe, and Mr. Atkinson.

DEVON SUMMER ASSIZES 1861.

Exeter, July 30.

(Before CHANNELL, B. and a Special Jury.)

PINCKNEY v. EWENS.

Action for nuisance—Lawful trade—Questions for the jury.

In an action for a nuisance, caused by a fellmonger's yard and business, the following questions were submitted to the jury:—

1. Was the plt.'s enjoyment of his property sensibly diminished by the nuisance, if any, caused by the defts.?
2. Is the trade of a fellmonger a proper trade?
3. Was it in this instance carried on in a proper manner?
4. Was it carried on in a proper place?

This was an action for a nuisance.

M. Smith, Q.C., Karlake, Q.C. and Leigh for the plt.

Collier, Q.C. and E. W. Cox for the defts.

The nuisance complained of was caused by the erection of buildings for the purpose of carrying on the business of a fellmonger, in the town of Colmington.

It was proved on the part of the plt. that when the wind blew in the direction of the vicarage in which he lived, a noisome smell proceeded from the hides and lime pits of the defts., and that the foul water from the pits had deprived him of the use of a stream, into which they were emptied, and which flowed through his garden and lawn. The ground had been but lately converted to its present purpose.

On the part of the defts., witnesses were called to prove that the business of a fellmonger is not necessarily noisome, nor is it at all noxious; that it is carried on in the centre of many populous towns; that this one was conducted by the defts. with even more than common care and cleanliness; and that no unpleasant smells were discovered to proceed from the yard by other neighbours living nearer to it than the plt.

Collier directed the attention of the judge to the case of Hole v. Barlow, 4 C. B. 334, in which Byles, J.

had told the jury that a nuisance was subject to this exception, that an action for it could not be maintained by a private person by reason of disagreeable odours produced by a lawful and proper business, beneficial to the public, carried on in a proper manner and in a proper place; and he contended that the case of the present defts. was within the exception so stated by Byles, J., whose ruling was afterwards confirmed by the full court.

CHANNELL, B., in summing up, said that the case to which his attention had been called had certainly very materially modified the law of nuisances, as hitherto understood. The same question was now before the Court of Ex., and the judges there differed in opinion upon it. But inasmuch as it was a unanimous judgment of the C. P., the court in which the present action was brought, he should hold that decision to be the law until it was otherwise determined. He should therefore put four questions to the jury, on each of which he would take their opinion, so that, if necessary, the point may be further considered by a higher tribunal. He should ask them to say, in accordance with the old law, First, whether the plt. was sensibly hindered in the reasonable enjoyment of his property by reason of the smells alleged to proceed from the defts.'s premises, and he should tell them that it need not be a smell injurious to health, nor was it necessary that it should annoy the dwelling-house; it was enough that it fouled the air in the grounds or the garden. Secondly, is the business carried on by the defts. a lawful and proper business? Thirdly, is it carried on in a proper manner? Fourthly, is it carried on in a proper place?

The jury returned—First, That the plt. was so hindered in the enjoyment of his property. Secondly, That it was a lawful and proper business. Thirdly, That it was conducted in a proper manner. Fourthly, But that it was not in a proper place.

Verdict for plt., damages 40s.

REG. v. THE INHABITANTS OF BRIGHTON.

Poor-law—Husband's settlement—Illegitimacy of marriage.

A marriage between a man and the niece of his deceased wife is unlawful, notwithstanding that the niece's mother was an illegitimate child of the deceased wife's mother.

Special case for the opinion of this court, stated by the Middlesex Court of Quarter Sessions, upon confirming an order of removal of a pauper from the parish of New Brentford, Middlesex, to the parish of Brighton, Sussex.

Elizabeth Morgan, the pauper, was alleged to be settled in Brighton by reason of her marriage with John Morgan, whose settlement in Brighton is admitted, and who was dead at the date of the order of removal.

The pauper's maiden name was Jones, and she was the legitimate daughter of Daniel Jones and Ann, his wife.

The pauper's mother Ann was the illegitimate child of Elizabeth Bartlett. After her birth the said Elizabeth Bartlett married one Thomas Haines, and had by him, amongst other legitimate children, a daughter named Mary. The said Mary was legally married, in 1835, to John Morgan, the pauper's alleged husband, and died on the 19th Nov. 1842. On the 19th Oct. 1843 John Morgan was married to the pauper at Chepstow, in Monmouthshire.

The question for the opinion of the court is, whether the marriage celebrated between John Morgan and the pauper was valid.

HAILES v. MARKS.

[Ex.

The case was argued (June 5 and 8) by Metcalf (Poland with him) in support of the order of Sessions, and Denman and H. Mathews for the apps.

It is unnecessary to quote the authorities or report the argument, as the same authorities, with the addition of Brook v. Brook, 4 L. T. Rep. N.S. 93, and the same line of argument was resorted to as is to be found in the very full and able report of the case of Reg. v. Chadwick, 11 Q.B. 173.

At the close of the argument of the resps.

COCKBURN, C. J. said:—It would be a great public scandal if it went forth for a moment that where a marriage between persons of legitimate relations was prohibited as being within the prohibited degrees; he court had any doubt in holding that such a marriage was equally prohibited and unlawful when the parties were only related by the natural ties of consanguinity, and not by legitimate relationship. Cur. ad. vult.

COCKBURN, C. J.—This was a case argued before us during the term, in which, in consequence of my unavoidable absence at the close of the argument, my learned brothers did not deliver judgment, wishing to have my concurrence in the judgment as one of the entire court, and not on account of any doubt they entertained as to the judgment that ought to be pronounced. It was a case of settlement, and the question was, whether the marriage with the niece of a deceased wife was a legitimate and lawful marriage. I will now state as the united opinion of the court, that the marriage was not lawful, and consequently that the settlement fails. In that we are guided by the express decision of the court in the case of Ellerton and Wife v. Gastrellin, Comyn's Reports, p. 318, where all the authorities are collected, and in which it appears, that upon the review of many cases, all ending in the same result, the court were of opinion that such a marriage was within the prohibited degrees. Now we have the Act of the 5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 54, which makes marriages within the prohibited degrees not only voidable, but void, and we must consider that Act as having been passed, with reference to the known and ascertained state of the law, as administered by the Ecclesiastical Courts of this country, sanctioned and confirmed by the decision of this court, in this instance, in the particular case to which I have referred. That being so, we entertain no doubt, that upon that authority, and with the Act of Parliament, to which I have referred, this marriage was bad, and consequently that the settlement failed. There was another point in the case, which was, whether one of the parties, being illegitimate, the illegitimacy made any difference with reference to the validity or the invalidity of the marriage. We disposed of that on the argument, stopping the counsel on the other side, and I only advert to it now, because in a report which I happened to see in a newspaper of the case, it was stated that the court had taken time to consider that part of the case. Now that was clearly an error, and quite the contrary of what fell from the court, because I remember stating, somewhat emphatically perhaps, that I thought it would be a great public scandal if it could be supposed that this court entertained for a single moment the supposition that legal consanguinity was necessary, as well as natural consanguinity, to make a marriage void, which would otherwise be good. If, indeed, that had not been from the very first assumed as a thing too plain to admit of a moment's doubt, there was abundant authority for it in a case of Haines v. Jeffreys, in which the court, with equal determination, repudiated the doctrine that illegitimacy could at all affect the question of the validity of a marriage within the prohibited degrees. That is found in the same report: (Com. Rep. 2.) However, I should not have adverted to this part of the case, as it was disposed of

during the progress of the argument, had it not been for the mistake made in a public print, and which, the matter being one of great public importance, I could not pass over without an observation.

Order of sessions quashed.

HAILES v. MARKS.

False imprisonment—Reasonable and probable cause—Amendment of plea at trial—C. L. P. A.

In an action for false imprisonment, defl. pleaded a plea of justification, setting out many circumstances as showing reasonable and probable cause. At the trial, several of those circumstances were not proved at all; some were proved; and others not proved in the terms as alleged in the plea. An amendment of the plea was required, by striking out that part not proved, and altering that part not proved in the terms alleged; to make it accord with the facts as proved:

Held, that such an amendment could be made, and that the facts remaining in the plea as proved, afforded sufficient reasonable and probable cause; and was a question for the judge at the trial to determine.

Declaration.—Trespass and false imprisonment.

Pleas.—1. Not guilty. 2. That defl. was possessed of certain prints and engravings which had been stolen; that he had good reason to, and did suspect the plt. of stealing them, for these reasons: that the goods were stolen from defl.'s stock, in his business of a printseller, at divers times between Christmas 1860 and 6th Feb. 1861, when they were discovered, and plt. had been, during all that time, making frames for defl. Plt. often went to defl.'s place of business, where the goods were stolen from, and on many occasions sent defl.'s boy out for things, or on some errand or excuse, on which occasions he was down in the room in which the said goods were kept, and from which they were stolen, and had the opportunity of stealing same; and although during that time he was in pecuniary difficulties, and paying off a County Court judgment at the rate of 6s. a month, he was dealing very largely in prints of the same sort as those which had been stolen from the defl., and had frequently left large bundles of such prints at a public-house, and, according to the statement of one Brall, had sold to him during that time 300*l.* worth of prints; wherefore the defl. did suspect and believe, &c.

The cause was tried before Channell, B., in London, when defl. failed to prove that plt. was in pecuniary difficulties, or was paying off a County Court debt, and the proof was that Brall said he had bought 300*l.* worth of prints of him altogether during their acquaintance, which extended over some years, and not that he had purchased them of plt. between Christmas and February. It was also proved that plt. had been paid for his work in prints. Application was made to amend the plea at the trial by altering so much as related to the statement of Brall, and striking out the averments not proved. The judge left the facts of the second plea to the jury, reserving leave to move the court as to the power of amendment, and leave to enter a nonsuit. The jury found a verdict for plt., damages 30*l.* A rule nisi was afterwards obtained to set aside the verdict as against the evidence, or to enter a verdict for the defl., on the ground that the facts as proved and found by the jury afforded reasonable and probable cause, which was for the judge to determine after the jury had found some of those facts proved, although not all proved, and that the learned baron should have amended the plea.

Joyce and B. Rigby showed cause.—The plea should not be amended in the way the deft. seeks. He puts a number of false statements in his plea of justification which he cannot prove, and then, failing to prove them, wishes to strike them out; he puts the whole together forward as the ground of his reasonable and probable cause to suspect and imprison the plt. On failing to prove the whole of what he alleges as his ground of suspicion, his plea necessarily fails. The real question is, whether the several matters alleged and set out in the deft.'s plea of justification are those which operated on his mind at the time? In Broad v. Ham, 5 Bing. N.C. 725, Tindal, C. J. says: "In order to justify a deft. there must be a reasonable cause, such as would operate on the mind of a discreet man. There must also be a probable cause, such as would operate on the mind of a reasonable man; at all events, such as would operate on the mind of the party making the charge." [MARTIN, B.—The question of the amendment depends now entirely upon the C. L. P. Act.] The words of the Act are very comprehensive, but the jury negatived the chief statements in the deft.'s plea. Indeed, there was no evidence to prove the principal part of it. Even Brall's statement was negatived in substance. The pleas ought to have been proved entirely, and the facts as alleged; if not, the grounds found by the jury did not amount to reasonable and probable cause. Harris v. Dignum, 1 Foa. & Fin. 688; and Hogg v. Ward, 3 H. & N. 417, were cited. Reasonable and probable cause is a mixed question of law and fact: (Davis v. Russell, 5 Bing. 354.)

Robinson, contra, in support of the rule, was stopped.

CHANNELL, B.—I think this rule should be made absolute. The facts of the case, as in evidence before me at the trial, were these. [The learned judge stated the facts.] The first question is, whether the deft.'s plea of justification can be properly amended. It was contended that, as this was a plea setting forth the deft.'s grounds of suspicion, and reasonable and probable cause to act as he did, every allegation in the plea specifically stating such cause must be proved. But I do not think a deft. is bound necessarily to prove everything he has alleged. If he can prove sufficient to justify his acts, it is enough. The question of reasonable and probable cause was for me to determine upon the facts proved and found to be proved by the jury. I also think the judge had the power to make the amendment asked. If he has power to amend by striking out, he has the power to make the alteration the deft. required.

POLLOCK, C.B.—I think our judgment should be for the deft.; it is more consistent than a nonsuit. The question we are now to decide is, whether a plea of this description may be amended; the other question, whether the plea furnishes an answer to the action, is a secondary consideration. In my opinion it is not compulsory for a deft. to prove all he states in his plea; but it is enough if the judge thinks what you do prove shows sufficient reasonable and probable cause. Here I think what was proposed to be added may be added—it is substituting what is true for what was untrue. It has long been settled that it is for the judge and not for the jury to decide what is reasonable and probable cause. It often happens that what would be enough on the criminal side to find a man guilty is not considered sufficient to furnish reasonable and probable cause on the civil side. I think the plea may properly be altered in the manner proposed, and when altered that the facts remaining show sufficient reasonable and probable cause.

BRAMWELL, B.—Since Panton v. Williams, 2 Q.B. 69, I have thought reasonable and probable cause was for the judge to determine, and the only question for the jury to determine was, whether the facts alleged were proved. A plea states a variety of matters which are supposed to show reasonable and probable cause, the judge has to determine whether such as are proved constitute reasonable and probable cause. If he thinks they do the others are immaterial, and he may strike them out. Then comes the question whether he can add or qualify. I think he can. The question is not what cause the deft. acted upon, but whether he had reasonable and probable cause to act as alleged. I think the plea might be amended as required.

Rule absolute.

HARDWICK v. MOSS AND OTHERS.

Highway Act, 5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 50, s. 109—Surveyor entitled to notice of action—When.

A surveyor of highways made an excavation in the highway for the purpose of erecting a weighing machine, and left the same by night not fenced off; an accident occurred in consequence, for which an action was brought against him without any notice of action being given as required by sect. 109 of the Highway Act:

Held, that the surveyor was entitled to notice of action, as he had reasonable ground for believing that he acted under the authority of the Highway Act in what he did.

This was an action against the defts., who were surveyors of the highways leading from Bradford to Leeds, for causing certain earth, stones and rubbish to be placed in the highway. It was left there by night without being fenced off, or any light or other notice to protect travellers from running against it. The plt. was an articled clerk to an attorney at Leeds, and on the 17th Oct. last was returning home in a dog-cart about nine o'clock in the evening, when, not observing this heap of rubbish, &c., which had been placed upon the road by a man employed by the defts. to erect a weighing machine there, he drove upon it, caused the carriage to upset, and he was thereby seriously injured.

The declaration alleged that the defts. wrongfully and carelessly made a certain excavation in the highway leading from Bradford to Leeds for the purpose of erecting a certain weighing machine there, and wrongfully and carelessly placed certain large quantities of earth, stones and rubbish dug up from the said excavation in a heap in and upon the said highway, and permitted the same to remain there during the night without any light or means to prevent persons from driving against the same, whereby the plt., whilst he was lawfully driving along the said highway in the night time, drove his horse and carriage against the said earth, stones and rubbish, and upset the said carriage, and the plt., who was then riding in the said carriage, was thereby and by reason of the premises greatly injured, &c.

Plea, not guilty by statute.

The cause was tried at York, before Keating, J., when a verdict was found for the plt.—damages 70*l*. A rule nisi was subsequently obtained to set aside that verdict, and enter a nonsuit, on the ground that the defts. were entitled to notice of action, and also on the ground that, as the defts. at the time of the accident were acting as surveyors of the highways, the action under the circumstances would not lie against them.

Overend, Q. C., Mellish, Q. C. and Quain showed cause.—The defts. had no authority at all to make this excavation in the highway, get up stones and rubbish, and leave the same there wholly unprotected. It was said this was done under an order of the vestry; but in fact it was not done by order of the vestry, and the learned judge at the trial asked why the defts. endeavoured to obtain leave of the vestry, if they thought it within their duty to erect the machine. A surveyor of highways has no power to dig there, except for the purpose of making or repairing drains, or to repair the road. The Highway Act, 5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 50, does not authorise a surveyor to erect weighing machines on the highway. It is different with reference to turnpike roads, where weighing machines are erected, as permission is expressly given by the Turnpike Acts, but not so in parish highways. [MARTIN, B.—Is it not the question here whether the surveyors believed they were acting in virtue of their authority?] It is not sufficient that the surveyors believe they are so acting unless there is some provision in the Act which authorises them to do so; and here there is none. For making culverts there are sections specially enabling them to do so. In Smith v. Hopper, 9 Q. B. 1015, the correct rule is laid down "that bona fides is not alone sufficient to bring a case within the privileges of such an Act of Parliament. . . . And some of the cases have said that it is not enough for the deft. to have thought generally that he possesses the power to do what was done, he must also think that it was done in execution of some particular provision of the statute which applies." This rule will not be departed from without strong cause for it. [CHANNELL, B.—It has been held to be a nuisance to carry an extraordinary weight over a highway. Does the Highway Act give no general powers to surveyors apart from their specific powers? It may be necessary, perhaps, sometimes to have machines on parish highways as well as on turnpike-roads.] There is no general or special provision for erecting such machines on parish roads. The following cases were referred to:—Davis v. Curling, 8 Q. B. 286; Smith v. Shaw, 10 B. & C. 277; Lawson v. Dumin, 9 C. B. 61; Hopkins v. Crowe, 4 A. & E. 774; Cann v. Clipperton, 10 A. & E. 583; The Proprietors of Witham Navigation v. Padley, 4 B. & Ad. 69; Huggins v. Wadey, 15 M. & W. 357; Cook v. Leonard, 6 B. & C. 351; Kens v. Evershed, 10 Q. B. 143; Read v. Coker, 13 C. B. 850; Arnold v. Harnel, 9 Ex. 404; and Edge v. Parker, 8 B. & C. 697.

S. Temple, Q.C. and Manisty, Q.C. in support of the rule.—The defts. were entitled to notice of action according to the 5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 50, s. 109, which enacts, "that no action or suit shall be commenced against any person for anything done in pursuance of or under the authority of this Act until twenty-one days' notice has been given thereof in writing to the justice, surveyor, or person against whom such action is intended to be brought, nor after sufficient satisfaction or tender of satisfaction has been made to the party aggrieved, nor after three calendar months next after the act committed, for which such action or suit shall be so brought;" "and the deft. in such action or suit may plead the general issue, and give this Act and every special matter in evidence at any trial which shall be had thereupon, and if the matter or thing shall appear to have been done under or by virtue of this Act, or if it shall appear that such action or suit was brought before twenty-one days' notice thereof given as aforesaid, then the jury shall find a verdict for the deft." The plt.'s attorney wrote on the 7th Jan. 1861 requiring compensation, and threatened legal proceedings. The action was commenced on the 12th Jan. 1861, and no notice of action was given as the Act requires. By sect. 6 of the Highway Act the surveyor is to repair and keep in repair the several highways in the parish for which he is appointed. Rates are to be made and materials are to be purchased for the repairs of the highways; the surveyors in the discharge of their duty are to see that proper materials, and in due measure, weight and quantity, are supplied. The means of ascertaining this is to be provided with a machine for the purpose of weighing, and they were here acting in the due discharge of their duty by causing one to be erected. If the persons who did the works left them not fenced off or guarded by light by night, defts. are not responsible. The 36th section imposes a penalty of 5*l.* on the surveyors allowing stones, &c., to remain on the highway by night to the danger of any person passing. Smith

v. Hopper is a decision in favour of the defts.; there it was held that those persons are within the protection of the 109th clause, who, although their act be not legally justifiable under the statute, act in a bona fide belief that they are executing some particular provision of the statute, provided such belief be not utterly unreasonable. Here there cannot be the least doubt but that they really believed they were acting in pursuance of their powers under the Act of Parliament.

June 4.—POLLOCK, C.B.—It appears to me that the rule that a deft., to entitle him to twenty-one days' notice of action, must be acting under the authority of some particular clause in an Act of Parliament, is too narrow. In my judgment, if the Act done is done by a public officer in the capacity of a public officer, with reasonable grounds for believing that he is authorised by virtue of his office, he is entitled to notice of action. In this case there is no doubt but that the parish is bound to repair the highways, and for that purpose the surveyors must buy stones and pay for them—usually, I believe, according to weight; they should, therefore, be provided with a weighing machine. Here it seems the parish gave directions to have a weighing machine erected, and the defts. were carrying out these directions. I am of opinion that the defts. acted in a public capacity, and had reasonable grounds for believing that they were acting under the authority of the Act of Parliament.

MARTIN, B. concurred.

BRAMWELL, B.—I was at first inclined to accede to the plt.'s argument, that the defts. had no authority for the erection of this machine, but the defts. met that by saying that they believed they had authority and that they had reasonable grounds for believing so. I think that is a good answer.

CHANNELL, B.—I think so too. It is clearly shown that the defts. had reasonable grounds for believing they had authority under the Act of Parliament, and that, in my judgment, is sufficient to entitle them to notice of action. The rule must be made absolute. Rule absolute.

CONSISTORY AND METROPOLITAN COURT OF ARMAGH.

Friday, March 22.

(Heard in Dublin, before Dr. RADCLIFF, Q.C., V.G. of the Diocese.)

The Office of the Judge promoted by the LORD BISHOP OF DOWN AND CONNOR AND DROMORE v. THE REV. THOS. FITZWILLIAM MILLER, D.D.

THE SAME v. THE REV. SAMUEL G. POTTER

Inhibition against a stranger preaching or officiating in a diocese—No previous citation—Bishop's jurisdiction—Licence in one diocese, what effect as regards another—Occasional preaching—Leave of incumbent.

An inhibition signed by the Vicar-General of a diocese, and under the seal of the Consistorial Court, forbidding a clergyman preaching in the diocese, is in fact the inhibition of the bishop, and is not a judicial act requiring a previous citation. A bishop of one diocese has the power to inhibit, at his pleasure and without cause assigned, a beneficed and licensed clergyman of another diocese from officiating or preaching in his diocese without his licence, though the clergyman has the leave of the incumbent to preach in his church. A licence to officiate in one diocese determines by the institution into and licence in another. A usage of clergymen of different dioceses to occasionally assist one another, and preach, without the bishop's licence, is of no avail against his inhibition.

[IRELAND.]

BISHOP OF DOWN v. REV. T. F. MILLER, D.D.

[IRELAND.]

These cases, which had been sent to Armagh by letters of request from the Vicar-General of Down and Connor, had been, on the 5th and 7th Jan. last, argued on an exception to the admissibility of the articles tendered by the impugnants respectively, as defensive and responsive to the articles of the promoter. The facts of the cases will appear from the pleadings. The first article filed by the promoter in is the first case pleaded, that by the laws, canons and constitutions ecclesiastical of the realm, no rector or curate, or other minister of any parish church, chapel, or other place of worship, is to permit any stranger to preach or perform any ecclesiastical duties or divine offices of the Church of England and Ireland, in their respective churches, &c., without the licence or other lawful authority or permission, express or implied, of the bishop of the diocese first had. The second article pleaded the 39th canon of 1634, "Strangers not admitted to preach without licence," viz., "Neither the minister, churchwardens, or other officers of any parochial or collegiate church shall suffer any stranger to preach unto the people in the churches except they know him to be sufficiently authorised thereto, as is aforesaid." The third alleged that Dr. Miller was the Vicar of Shankill, otherwise Belfast, in the diocese of Down, &c., and lawfully instituted and inducted thereto, and bound to obey and pay due reverence to the lawful and honest commands, &c., of the bishop. The fourth article pleaded a certified copy of the act of institution of Dr. Miller to said vicarage. The fifth pleaded the ordination vow taken by Dr. Miller, as in the ordination service in the Book of Common Prayer, viz., "That you would reverently obey your ordinary and other chief minister, unto whom is committed the charge and government over you, following with a glad mind and will their godly judgments." The sixth alleged the oath taken on the occasion of Dr. Miller's institution, viz., "I do swear that I will perform true and canonical obedience to the Lord Bishop of Down, &c., and his successors, in all things lawful and honest, so help me God." The seventh alleged that Mr. Potter was, at the time of preaching the sermon in question, viz. the 12th Aug. 1860, a beneficed clergyman in the diocese of Leighlin, and had no licence or authority then to preach or perform ecclesiastical duties in the diocese of Down, &c., and that Dr. Miller was aware of that. The eighth alleged an interview between the bishop and Dr. Miller at the Vicar-General's office, when the bishop expressly admonished and commanded Dr. Miller not to permit Mr. Potter to preach in Shankill Church on the 12th Aug. The ninth stated a letter written on the 8th Aug. by the bishop to Dr. Miller, at his request, in which the bishop, amongst other things, said, "As I understand that you have invited the Rev. Mr. Potter to preach in your church next Sunday, I regret to say that I feel it my duty to inhibit him from doing so upon account of the sermon preached by him in Down Cathedral on the 12th July, as I consider its tone and language, as reported in the Downpatrick Recorder, calculated to stir up, rather than allay religious animosities between us and our Roman Catholic brethren." The tenth article set out Dr. Miller's reply of the 10th Aug., in which he stated, amongst other things, that he was under the impression that the incumbent had the sole control over his pulpit, and that the bishop would exercise authority not sanctioned by law, did he try to limit the freedom of the incumbent in that respect, and that he felt constrained to allow Mr. Potter to preach as advertised. The eleventh article stated, that on the 10th Aug. the bishop caused to issue his inhibition under the consistorial seal, and signed by the Vicar-General of the diocese, which was served on Dr. Miller on the 11th Aug., and is as follows:— "Robert, by Divine permission, Lord Bishop of Down and Connor and Dromore, to all singular clerks and literate persons within the diocese of Down and Connor, greeting — Whereas, the Rev. Samuel George Potter, incumbent of Stratford-on-Slaney, in the diocese of Leighlin, has taken on himself to preach in the parish church of Shankill, Belfast, in our diocese of Connor, without our licence or authority, contrary to the laws and canons of the Church of Ireland, we authorise and strictly enjoin you, jointly and severally, that you peremptorily inhibit, or cause to be inhibited, the said Rev. Samuel George Potter; and we do, by the tenor of these presents, inhibit that he presume not to preach in said church, or in any other church in our said diocese, or perform any clerical office in our said diocese, without our authority aforesaid had and obtained for that purpose according to the law and canons aforesaid, and also that you inhibit, or cause to be inhibited, the Rev. Thomas Fitzwilliam Miller, D.D., vicar of Shankill; and we do, by the tenor of these presents, inhibit him that he do not permit the said Samuel Potter to preach in said church, or any other church in the said parish of Shankill, without our licence or authority aforesaid to preach or officiate. To which we have caused our consistorial seal to be affixed this 10th day of Aug. 1860." The twelfth averred the fact of Mr. Potter having, at Dr. Miller's request and by his permission, preached at Shankill on the 12th Aug., without any licence, and contrary to and in defiance of the commands and inhibition of the Bishop of Down, &c., and in violation of the ordination vow and the oath of canonical obedience, and the articles prayed for suspension for one month, and a monition not to offend again in like manner, and pay costs, &c.

The articles in the second case filed against Mr. Potter were similar to the 1st, 2nd, 11th and 12th of the foregoing, and prayed for his due correction and payment of costs, &c.

By a consent of the 13th Oct. 1860, signed by the proctor for the impugnants, the foregoing facts were substantially admitted. The articles which were sought to be pleaded as responsive, alleged, on Mr. Potter's part, that Mr. Potter had been originally ordained a deacon of the Established Church in 1845, and on the 13th Dec. 1846 was admitted a priest by the then Bishop of Down and Connor in his diocese, and was for two years duly licensed as curate of Cushendun in the same diocese. That in 1849 he was appointed to the inappropriate curacy of Stratford-on-Slaney, and was duly licensed on the 30th May 1849, by the Bishop of Leighlin and Ossory, and that though the Bishop of Down was not his ordinary, he had occasionally assisted in Divine service, and preached in the diocese of Down and Connor on the invitation of the respective incumbents of the churches, without any objection on the part of the bishop, and that it was the usage and custom of the Church of Ireland for clergymen to assist in service and preaching in churches to which they have no special appointment or licence, when requested by the incumbent and churchwardens, and that a book was kept in every parish church in Ireland in which the different clergymen who preached entered and signed their names for the information of the bishop, and that he (Mr. Potter) had the consent of the incumbent and churchwardens to preach on the occasion in question. That by his ordination and the matters aforesaid, he was fully authorised to preach in said diocese, and stated the request to preach a charity sermon on the 12th Aug. made to him for building a chapel of ease, and objected to the inhibition as a judicial act requiring a citation before issuing, and therefore void, and that it was not served until the 11th Aug., the day before the sermon was preached.

Dr. Miller, in his articles, relied on the same defences as Mr. Potter, and also that the letter of the bishop did not contain any inhibition, but called for explanation and reply, and that the inhibition itself was void, being in the nature of a judgment or sentence, and that no citation had previously issued, and he relied generally on the sole authority of the incumbent of the church over his own pulpit.

BISHOP OF DOWN v. REV. T. F. MILLER, D.D.

[IRELAND.]

Drs. Ball, Q.C. and Darley, Q.C. (with whom was Dr. Knox), for the bishop, contended that the articles tendered were irrelevant and unnecessary, as the real question in the case arose fully on the articles of the promoter. The question to be decided was, had the bishop the power to prohibit by name a particular individual, a stranger to his diocese (being a beneficed clergyman in another diocese) from officiating in his diocese. If the bishop had the power, nothing contained in the articles tendered would be an answer to it. The case is not the case of a clergyman doing duty for another, and then being sued for having done so without the licence of the bishop (which would not be perhaps a judicious proceeding on his part), but it is the case of a clergyman of one diocese, in disobedience of a direct command from the bishop of another diocese, intruding into and doing duty in the latter. In fact, the real question is, what are the true limits of episcopal authority in this respect. First, as to the general principles of the Church before the Reformation. Originally the bishop had the entire cure of souls in the district—the cura animarum. It was his parochia; there were then no subdivisions: (2 Hooker's Eccl. Polity, book 7, sect. 2, and book 8, sect. 9; Taylor's Episcopacy Asserted, sect 37, Plowd. 495; Clerk v. Heath, 1 Mod. 11; Portland v. Bingham, 1 Hagg. Consist. 161; Carr v. Marsh, 2 Ph. 206; Rose v. Lee, 3 Ph. 575; Provincial Canons of 1571; Smith v. Lovegrove, 2 Lee, 171; 1 Add. 103, N.; Colefall v. Newcomb, 2 Ld. Raym. 1205; Finch v. Harris, 12 Mod. 641; Linwood, 294; 1 Burn. Eccl. L. 193.) But afterwards, as the Church extended, clergymen were employed under the bishop, and they had distinct places marked out for them, but they held only by delegation from the bishop, and the presence of the latter in the place did, for the time being, suspend the powers of the clergymen. Preaching, originally, was no part of the minister's duty, only reading mass and administering the sacrament, and the bishop appointed the preachers: (Colefall v. Newcomb, 2 Ld. Raym. 1205; 3 Burns, 442.) So matters continued up to the Reformation, and in Edw. VI. and Elizabeth a royal licence was granted to preach: (3 Burns, 442.) Secondly, the canons of the Church, though not binding on the laity, bind the clergy; that is conceded by the counsel and judge in Marshall v. Bishop of Exeter, 6 C. B. 716; S.C. 6 Jur. N.S. 1301.) In England the canons now in force are dated 1603. In Ireland 1634. The earliest canons were Theodore's: (see 1 Johns. Can. 91 and 92, and 2 Ib. 499.) The 9th canon (Irish) requires every beneficed clergyman, allowed to be a preacher, and residing on his benefice, to preach one sermon every Sunday, and the 11th requires the parson, vicar, or curate, on every Sunday, to catechise the youth and ignorant persons of his parish in the Commandments, Belief and Lord's Prayer; these plainly point to a local duty, viz. the parish of the clergyman: and the 39th refers to the 38th, which contemplates permanent duty. The 26th, 27th and 28th require residence on the benefice, and preaching there. The 30th requires the candidate for orders to exhibit to the bishop a presentation of himself to a preferment in that diocese, or a certificate that he is provided with a curacy, &c., in that diocese: (see Martyn v. Hind, Cowp. 437.) The 36th, 45th, 46th, 47th, 49th, 50th, 51st and 52nd of the English canons were also cited to show that, though the Irish canons were confined to a licence from the diocesan, the English canons contemplated also a royal licence; and the 46th (9th Irish) showed that a clergyman could not get the right to preach by his merely getting a benefice, as it says, "Every beneficed man, not allowed to be a preacher, shall procure sermons to be preached in his cure once every month at the least," &c.; but none of the canons give him the right to preach as against the will and command of the bishop; much less none of them countenance a stranger intruding from another diocese, nor the right of one bishop to license for another diocese. The Irish Act of Uniformity (17 & 18 Car. 2, c. 6, sect. 13) enacts that no person shall be a lecturer, or allowed to preach in any church or other place of public worship, unless he be licensed by the bishop of the diocese; and the ordination service of both deacons and priests showed that they were applicable to local services; the former, "Take thou authority to read the Gospel in the Church of God, and to preach the same, if thou be thereunto licensed by the bishop himself." The latter, "Take thou authority to preach the Word of God, and to minister the holy sacraments in the congregation where thou shalt be lawfully appointed thereunto." The 23rd article of the Church was also relied on. As to the inhibition, no citation was necessary. In Rex v. Archbishop of Canterbury, 15 East, 117, Lord Ellenborough held that, on the corresponding English Act of Uniformity, a bishop had a discretion in the granting of the licence, and was not bound to hold a judicial inquiry, but only "to exercise his conscience, duly informed on the subject:" (pp. 140, 146.) The following cases were also cited:—Hodgson v. Dillon, 2 Curt. 388; Barnes v. Shore, 4 Notes of Cases, 593; Freeland v. Neall, 6 Ib. 55; Ellis v. Nixon, 20 Ch. Remembrancer, 292; 3 Chr. Ex. 323, and Milw. 392; Archbishop of Dublin v. Gregg (not reported); Hodgson v. Gladstone, Times, 4th May, 3rd and 11th June 1852, which was a proceeding against the impugnant for preaching in an unlicensed place. Also Border v. Merton, Times, 2nd Nov. 1853. In these cases no citation had issued, and in Gregg's case the inhibition was under the consistorial seal, as in this case. Also Bartlett v. Kirkwood, 2 Ell. & Bl. 776. The inhibition here is not a perpetual one, but only until the bishop grant his licence. It pronounces no judgment on Potter's status; the bishop could not do so, as he was not under his control. The licence originally granted to him to preach in the diocese of Down and Connor determined by his acceptance of a benefice in Ossory, and so he admits by his pleading in his fifth article, where he refers to the Bishop of Ossory as his diocesan. The mere ordination cannot give the right contended for, as in the case of a curate ordained on the nomination of a bishop of another diocese, and to a curacy in another diocese, he would have no authority to preach in the diocese in which he was so ordained: (Cripps on the Clergy, 635; Watson's Clergyman's Law, 3rd edit. 147; Bishop of Exeter v. Tucker, not reported.)

Dr. Battersby, Q.C. and Dr. Walsh, Q.C. (with whom was Dr. Lindesay), contra, contended that the articles tendered were strictly responsive and admissible. We do not dispute that, for which a great many authorities were relied on by the other side, viz. that a bishop may revoke at his pleasure a licence granted during his pleasure, and in his own diocese. The case cited from the diocese of Exeter (Bishop of Exeter v. Tucker) is not reported, and is merely noted by the registrar of that diocese in a schedule to a return ordered by the House of Commons as a case which had occurred, but the particulars are all omitted, save the important one, that the clergyman, by his own consent, was sentenced: therefore, it is no authority whatever. The other side adopt the Roman doctrine, that the will of the bishop is the sole law of the Church, but the Roman Catholics have some canons and rules to rely on for that; but the other side here rely on the ordination vow, and contend that by it the will of the bishop should prevail in things indifferent.

and not only in things strictly coming under and cognisable by the laws of the Church. The bishop puts his case on this: it is my right, no matter how groundless or absurd my reasons or motives, or what the circumstances or exigencies of the case—Hoc volo, hoc jubeo. The bishop must, therefore, go the length of arguing that under the 39th canon his licence is indispensable in every instance for a clergyman preaching in his diocese. If that is so, every clergyman probably in Ireland has violated that canon. We say that long and immemorial usage, uncontrolled by any law, is in our favour, and that it is the abstract right of one clergyman to get occasional aid from another without the bishop's licence, and notwithstanding the 39th canon. That usage uncontrolled by any law is part of the established common law of the Church. See 1 Bl. Com. 64, and the case of The Office v. Nixon is an express authority for us as to the right, and nothing in Burton, J.'s judgment is contrary to it. We admit that, for a permanent cure of souls, a licence from the diocesan is, under the 38th canon, necessary, and all the modern cases cited on the other side are within the 38th and not the 39th canon, as in them permanent service was persevered in against the will of the bishop and within his diocese, and in several of them in unconsecrated places. The ordination service of a priest is our licence, and we require no other—"Take thou authority to preach the Word of God, and to minister the holy sacraments in the congregation where thou shall be lawfully appointed thereto." Those words do not, as argued by the other side, confine the authority of preaching to any local jurisdiction, but are used in the same sense as in the 23rd article of the Church, and that article plainly shows that a clergyman, when ordained, acquires the right thereby to preach generally, and such authority was only subject to such restrictions as to time and place as have been adopted by the Church of England for the convenience of the Church, either by canons or rules, but such as are against or in derogation of the rights of the priest must be construed strictly, and be founded on some authentic law. The 39th canon is the only one which the other side pretends supports the right claimed, and they say that the words "as is aforesaid" refer to the 38th canon, where permanent duty is contemplated; but we contend that those words refer to the prior canons which require examination before ordination, &c., and the heading of the canon, "strangers not admitted to preach without showing their licence," shows that a stranger, though not licensed in the diocese, has a right, and whether licensed or unlicensed, the canon gives the right of occasional service. "Stranger" is no new word; "a man is no stranger who has been ordained in a diocese." See Linwood, 47 and 238, n. u.: "Potest tamen ex causa necessaria ad tempus modicum deservire curæ suæ per substitutum, dato ei pretio, ut puta professione necessariâ imminente vel ubi contingit ex justâ causâ eum abesse." Gates v. Chambers, 2 Add. 177, in which Sir J. Nicholl admitted an allegation, responsive to articles filed against a clergyman who, against the 48th canon, officiated out of his own diocese without licence of the bishop, is an express authority for us; the only difference is as to the inhibition—as none was there—but we say that the inhibition is not a judgment, decree, or valid order that could make wrong what was right within the laws of the Church. Smith v. Lovegrove, 2 Lec. 162, was the case only of a lecturer, and in p. 172 he is stated not to have ever had a licence to preach or perform divine service from any bishop whatever, or from either university. Rowe v. Lee, 3 Phill. 566, turned on whether the locus had been erected into a peculiar jurisdiction exempt from the ordinary, and as strong doubts existed on that point, the articles were rejected and the suit dismissed. Rex v. Archbishop of Canterbury was not a case of capricious refusal, as the archbishop there swore that he had acted upon due consideration and inquiry, and entirely on account of the doctrines contained in a sermon on infant baptism. So Rex v. Bishop of Ely, 2 T. R. 336. As to the case of Hodgson v. Dillon, and that class of cases, they are all within the 21st and 22nd canons, referring to the administration of the communion in private houses, and performing service in private conventicles, but they show that the rector or vicar has the sole care of souls in the parish, and the right, in their own judgment, to an assistant-priest to help them, subject to this restriction, that they conduct themselves properly, and that if otherwise they are subject to the ordinary. But here Mr. Potter actually had the licence of the ordinary; he was originally ordained in that diocese, and was a licensed curate there, and there is no authority, nor is it averred, that such licence was revoked by the acceptance of the benefice in Ossory. Ayl. Par., "Licence," 353, shows that it must be recalled on just grounds and for good cause, not wantonly and wilfully. Ordination would alone give authority to preach; a multo fortiori if that ordination had been, as here, in the particular diocese: (Marshall v. Bishop of Exeter, 7 C. B. 716.) The 49th English canon requires that no person not examined and approved of by the bishop, or not licensed, shall preach in his own cure or elsewhere, &c. Here Mr. Potter has the licence of and was examined and approved of by the bishop of the diocese. As to the inhibition, the bishop had no power to issue it, but if otherwise the canon on which it is based (39) is obsolete; besides, according to the old law the inhibition rendered a party disobeying it liable to excommunication, and therefore there should be some reason shown for issuing it. There is no authority in a bishop to issue it without a cause pending, but on his own motion. The 58th and 59th canons require the signature of an advocate. In the case of appeals, it is issued properly as a suit is before the court. In Gregg's case no question was raised on the point, and this order being unlawful there was no disobedience of the oath of canonical obedience. Bonacre v. Evans, 16 Q. B. 162; Capel v. Child, 2 Cr. & J. 558; Bartlett v. Kirwan, 2 Ell. & Bl. 771; Trebeck v. Keith, 2 Atk. 498, were cited, to show that a party should be heard in his defence.

The Judge having refused to decide the main question in the case on the motion, an order was made whereby the defensive pleas were admitted, but all questions of law as well as costs of the exception and argument were reserved to the hearing. And on the 4th March, the promoter filed responsive articles, principally alleging that Mr. Potter's licence for Cushendun ceased and determined by his appointment to Stratford-on-Slaney, and if not, it was by the admission and collation on the 16th Nov. 1849 to another benefice in the diocese of Down, of the rector (in 1847) of Cushendun, on whose nomination Mr. Potter's licence was granted, and they set out the certified copy of such act of collation, and alleged that Mr. Potter's right to preach in Shankill, as claimed by him, depending on the permission of Dr. Miller, such right ceased with the right to which it was incident. The facts alleged in the impugnant's articles and in the responsive articles were admitted by consent, and by consent the archbishop's attendance was dispensed with, and the Vicar-General authorised to give judgment in Dublin without prejudice to the right of appeal.

March 23.—Dr. RADCLIFF, Q.C., after stating the several pleadings filed on both sides, and the several documents and consents in the two causes, proceeded to dispose of the preliminary objection taken to the inhibition. The objection that it issued under the consistorial seal, without a previous citation and purported to be a judicial act and penal, is answered by reading the document itself, which could not have been done on the argument of the exception. It does not purport to be issued under a decree, nor to be more than the bishop's prohibition against Mr. Potter preaching in his diocese until licensed by him. It could not bind the impugnants as a judgment not appealed from, so as to prevent their questioning the right of the bishop to inhibit, as would be the case if it were a judicial act, nor could process issue thereon to enforce its execution or punish its violation, as if it were a judgment or sentence of the Consistorial Court. The seal of the court rendered it more formal, but it did not convert it into a judicial act; it has really little, if any, more effect than the inhibition contained in the bishop's letter of the 8th Aug., and though signed by the Vicar-General, it was plainly, if not admittedly, the act and the inhibition of the bishop. The bishop claims the right to have inhibited Mr. Potter from preaching in his diocese without assigning any reasons save that he had no permission from, and was forbidden by him to do so. He did in conversation with, and in his letter to, Dr. Miller assign reasons for prohibiting Mr. Potter, grounded on a sermon preached by Mr. Potter on the 12th July, and in a letter of his, afterwards published, but no reasons are given in the inhibition, nor are such reasons submitted to the court for its opinion or judgment. The sole question now is, whether the incumbent of a parish with or without the churchwardens may allow a clergyman not beneficed nor licensed in that diocese to officiate or preach in his church after that clergyman, though beneficed and licensed in another diocese, shall have been inhibited by the bishop of the diocese in which the church is, and though no reasons for such inhibition be given. It has been argued on behalf of the impugnants that every incumbent has the right to avail himself of occasional aid from other clergymen in priest's orders, particularly if beneficed and licensed in another diocese, and that the bishop of the diocese in which such occasional assistance is given has no authority to interfere, unless the clergyman so assisting should preach strange doctrine, or otherwise misconduct himself, in which case the bishop (as any one else) might proceed against him in his consistorial court; but that his summary inhibition issued without some charge made and substantiated after an opportunity being given for defence, would be a nullity. On the other hand, the bishop says that no clergyman can preach or officiate in his diocese when not beneficed or licensed therein without his licence or authority, express or implied, and that the issuing of an inhibition against him so acting, with or without cause assigned, concluded all question of implied authority, and rendered the person so acting, and the incumbent permitting him to act after service thereof, punishable for contempt of the bishop's authority. As there is no case reported in which the precise questions appear to have been decided, the arguments on each side were chiefly grounded on the ecclesiastical laws, canons and usages of the Church, the relative positions of bishop and incumbent and the rights flowing therefrom respectively. It will, therefore, be requisite to consider, as regards the questions in controversy, the diocesan and parochial system of church government and discipline adopted in the United Kingdom. Originally there was but one diocese called Parochia, and the bishop was himself the sole parson, and had the sole cure of souls in the entire diocese. In course of time the diocese was divided into several others, and ministers were ordained by the bishops to assist them, and sent out to serve the cures and preach in the several districts assigned to them, while the bishop and clergy resided together where the church or cathedral was. When churches were founded and endowed, the bishop sent out his clergy to reside and officiate in those churches and the districts annexed, which formed parishes, reserving, however, a certain number in his cathedral to counsel and assist him, who are now called the deans, prebendaries and canons. But the cathedral continued, as it had been, the parish church of the whole diocese: (Stillingfl. Ecc. C. 88, 143; 1 Barn. E. L. 194, 283.) The bishop was the chief pastor or (as termed by some) the universal incumbent of the diocese, having the cure of souls therein, and in every parish thereof, and so the right of institution and collation of clerks to parishes belonged as of right to him: (1 Van. Esp. 132, Hooker, book 7.) They received from him and as his assistants and curates the cure of souls, and they were for a long period called curators, and all the inferior clergy were bound to obey the bishop as their ordinary and superior, and to take the oath of canonical obedience from a very early period on being admitted into their cura. Preaching was deemed of great importance and to be peculiarly the duty of the bishop himself, and he was enjoined by the early constitutions and canons to be active in the discharge of that duty. Formerly the inferior prelates and clergy could not preach without special authority from the bishop, and which was revokable at his will. In progress of time, however, when the parochial clergy were better established, the right of preaching in their churches passed to incumbents, as belonging to their care of souls, by institution or collation to the benefices or cures, after which the bishop could not at his will and pleasure have deprived such incumbents of their right to preach, though no special licence or authority had been granted for the purpose, but in other respects this jurisdiction and right of control over all clergy within his diocese remained as before. The bishop had also the right and used to licence and send preachers, though not beneficed, through his diocese as assistants to himself, and a canon of the Council of Lateran, under Innocent III., directs bishops, especially those having dioceses of great extent, to take to their assistance able preachers, so that the people might be properly instructed. Certain franchises were, however, by the papal authority entitled to preach wherever sent by their superiors, but such privileges were restricted, and were conceded by the Pope, as the supreme head; but the bishop could, at his mere will and pleasure, revoke any licence granted to any preacher sent by himself through his diocese, and also, in like manner, could revoke, limit, or modify, any licence or authority to preach granted to any secular or regular not having beneficium curatue, as contradistinguished from those having cure of souls granted by institution: (1 Van. Esp. pt. 1; tit. 16, s. 14.) The bishop was also authorised to send preachers to the churches of those who, having cure of souls, were unable or unfit to discharge their own duty (Van. Esp., supra); and he might also have sent preachers to the churches of those having cure of souls in Advent or Lent: (Ibid. c. 7.) A new church or chapel could not, without the consent of the bishop, have been erected in any parish (3 Hag. 510); nor could any incumbent officiate without licence of the bishop in any unconsecrated, though he might have done so in any consecrated place in his parish, by virtue of his institution: (2 Hag. 46.) Each bishop had the exclusive right of ordaining the clergy for his diocese, and orders conferred by strange bishops without letters demissory were held irregular without a special dispensation. A bishop also could not exercise his episcopal office in another diocese without the licence expressly given of the bishop of that diocese; but having a general authority to preach everywhere, he might do so in any other diocese if permitted by the incumbent, unless expressly prohibited by the bishop of that diocese (1 Van. Esp., pt. 1, 16); nor could any secular clergy exercise functions in any diocese without the authority of the bishop, and the parish clergy were directly enjoined not to permit any one to preach in their churches without being satisfied that they had been ordained, and had letters from their own bishop as to their faith, &c. : (see Lynn, 48-9, and 133, 289.) But the bishop was also placed under control. A canon of the Council of Lateran, A.D. 1179 (2 Johns. 87), decreed that, if any bishop should ordain any deacon or priest without a title, he should maintain him till he could make a clerical provision for him; and it appears from 2 Gibson Codex, app. forms 8, 9, 10, that these canons were not merely in terrorem. These general rules and constitutions having been adopted by councils and otherwise, and become part of the common law of the Church of England and Ireland, were specially enforced in both countries, and canons were made in both countries before the Reformation for such purpose. The earliest English canons appear to be those of Archbishop Theodore, A.D. 673; and these and others are collected in 1 Johns. 187, et seq. In 1400 was the first statute requiring preachers to be licensed (2 Hen. 4, c. 15), and was followed in 1408 by the constitutions of Arundel, which, though only provincial, show that they only purported to enforce the ancient laws of the Church, and forbade clergymen, unless authorised by the canon or special privilege, from preaching within or without a church unless examined and licensed by the diocesan for a certain parish, and the penalty added for violation of it is excommunication: (see also 2 Johns. 333, 465, 513; Lynn, 33, 48.) Incumbents also had remedy, by action of trespass, against any one who should preach or officiate in their churches, save the ordinary: (Smith v. Reynold, 12 Mod. 420, 433; Duke of Portland v. Bingham, 1 Hag. C. R. 161.) By a regulation at the synod of Cashel, after the arrival of Henry II. A.D. 1172, all Divine service in the Church of Ireland was ordered to be in the same manner as in the Church of England; and all the English Acts made against provisors were adopted here, first in 1434 by the 32 Hen. 6, c. 1, and the liturgies and services of Ed. VI. were adopted here by 2 Eliz. c. 2, and again by the 10 Hen. 7, c. 1; and see Steph. 45, 8vo ed., and 5 Art. Union, 39 & 40 Geo. 3, c. 67. The Irish canons are similar: see 1 Ware, 315, 317; 1 Wilk. Concilia, p. 2, 548, 551; Julian's Bull, 1503; followed by 5 R. 2, c. 5, and 2 Hen. 4, c. 15, against preaching without licence of diocesan, and imposes penalties; and Ireland was included in them. 2 Hen. 4 was repealed by 25 Hen. 8, c. 14, by which the earlier Acts against heresies were confirmed; but 25 Hen. 8 did not further interfere with the law of licensing preachers. This repeal was considered to include Ireland. See 3 & 4 P. & M. c. 9 (Ireland). The 2 Eliz. c. 1 (Ireland), repealed 3 & 4 P. & M., and revived 5 R. 2, and 2 Hen. 4, c. 15, and restored the common law, save as altered by the Reformation. And so it appeared that, according to the common law of the Church of England and Ireland, no person could have preached in any church without the authority of the bishop, express or implied, unless specially exempt by such privilege as would after the Reformation be valid or conferred by the Crown, and an implied authority resulting from usage could not be of greater force than an express licence, and must have been subject to a similar power of revocation. The incumbent's consent in either case would have been necessary—whether the bishop's permission were express or implied; nor could an unlicensed clergyman be in a better position than a bishop who had a general authority to preach everywhere, but should succumb to the prohibition of the bishop of another diocese. Such was the law at the time of the repeal of 2 Hen. 4, c. 15. It was continued by the Acts 25 Hen. 8, c. 19 (England), and 28 Hen. 8, c. 13 (Ireland), except as to the Pope's powers and privileges: (see also 3 & 4 Ed. 6.) Unless, therefore, this jurisdiction of the bishop in respect of persons who shall preach in his diocese has been taken away or modified by some subsequent canons, statutes, ordinances and usage, it must be taken to be in full force as it was at the repeal of the 2 Hen. 4, c. 15; but there was no disposition on the part of the Crown or those in authority in the remainder of the reign of Hen. VIII., or in Ed. VI., or of Elizabeth, to relax the laws imposing restraints on preachers; on the contrary, such rights were placed under very strict regulations by proclamations and injunctions from the Crown, and the prerogative of the Crown was stretched to the utmost. At one time, no one could preach unless licensed by the Crown or Archbishop of Canterbury, or bishop of the diocese, save the beneficed clergy; at another time, even the beneficed clergy should have such a licence for preaching. Even in Ed. VI. the bishops were directed not to give licences to preach—the proclamation reserving that right to the Crown and the Archbishop of Canterbury. His Honour then referred to the convocation in 1603, in the reign of James I., and the canons framed under it, and the patent of confirmation following the 25 Hen. 8. The canons from 31 to 35 inclusive related to the ordination of the clergy—adopting the rules already mentioned, adapting them to the Reformed Church: (see Nelson, 138.) The 36th requires subscription to the three articles of supremacy of the Crown—adherence to the Book of Common Prayer and adoption of the Thirty-nine Articles, and suspends for twelve months bishops' licensing without such subscription—thus depriving them of any discretion to dispense with the law. The 37th is only supplementary to the 36th—requiring a person licensed to preach by the archbishop or one of the universities, on coming into a diocese where he has got an appointment, again to subscribe the three articles before the bishop, and is in affirmance of the bishop's authority and of the ancient laws, but is not compulsory on the bishop. The 39th, 40th and 41st relate to institutions to benefices, &c., and 42nd, 43rd and 44th to residence and preaching of deans, &c., the episcopal authority being preserved. The 45th relates to preaching once every Sunday in the church, &c., "where the clergyman may do conveniently near adjoining (where no preacher is)," &c., but does not authorise him to do so in another diocese, if not permitted to do so: "where he may conveniently," &c., merely enforces and localises the performance of the duty. The 46th provides for a limited class of occasional preachers, the necessity of whom was to be determined by the ordinary. The 47th relates to non-residents supplying a licensed preacher; the 48th to the previous examination and licence of the ordinary of curates and ministers, &c.: (see Gates v. Chambers, 2 Add. 189.) The 50th, 51st, and 52nd more immediately relate to occasional preaching, read along with the 36th and 49th, requiring the bishop's examination and approval. "No person whatsoever not examined and approved by the bishop of the diocese, or not licensed, as is aforesaid, for a sufficient or convenient preacher, shall take on him to expound in his own cure or elsewhere, &c., but only read homilies." This seems to adopt so much of the constitution of Arundel as begins with, "but let parish priests and temporary vicars (not perpetual), who are not sent in form aforesaid, only preach those things contained in the constitution of," &c.: (2 Johns. 460, 282.) Probably, the 49th canon only referred to deacons who might, at that period, have been admitted to benefices: (13 Eliz. c. 12, s. 3.) The 50th canon is: "Neither the minister, churchwardens, nor any other officers of the Church, shall suffer any man to preach within their churches, &c., but such as, by showing their licence to preach, shall appear to them sufficiently authorised thereunto as aforesaid"—i. e. licensed by the archbishop of the province, bishop of the diocese, or one of the universities; for no others conferred authority to preach in a different diocese, and no licence to preach is mentioned in the 36th or any prior canon save those. The 51st precludes strangers from preaching.

in cathedral or collegiate churches, except allowed by the archbishop of the province, or bishop of the diocese, or one of the universities. The 52nd refers to a book to be kept for noting the names of the preachers; but, reading this with the 50th and 51st, it would preclude the view that the licence of any bishop is sufficient authority to a stranger to preach in another bishop's diocese, as they refer to the licence, in the 36th canon, and were framed to supply the bishop with information as to the sermons preached in his diocese as to those who should presume to preach without licence in violation of the 50th canon, and clear words would be necessary to deprive the bishop of his diocesan authority, but inferences and presumptions could not change the common law of the Church or divest rights, and the words in the canon "the name of the bishop of whom he had licence" may mean "the authority of whom he had licence," otherwise an entry of a licence from the archbishop or either university need not be made; and if their names were not intended to be entered, then it would seem that those licensed by strange bishops were meant as "presuming to preach without licence" of the bishop of the diocese, and guilty of contempt. It is said that the churchwardens themselves might enforce the authority given by the 50th canon—see Creswick v. Rokeby, 2 Bulstr. 49; but as the canons were not ratified by statute and rested (as to the province of York, in which province Creswick v. Rokeby arose) merely on the King's mandate—having been made by the provincial council of Canterbury alone—the convocation or the Crown, after 25 Hen. 8, c. 19, could scarcely have deprived the incumbent of the legal right (if he had it) to admit any priest in orders to preach in his church without the bishop's leave and to give the churchwardens and sidesmen the power to control him; but if he had not such right up to 1603, and if the bishop could have prevented strangers preaching in his diocese, then the churchwardens, as a kind of new machinery, might, as to this, have acted for the ordinary, as they do in respect of seating the parishioners, and the words "that the bishop may know," &c., enforce this view, as it was to support his authority they were to act. The 71st canon relates to service in unconsecrated places. These canons were not extended to Ireland by the Crown; but, by a national synod authorised by Charles II., the Irish canons of 1634 were prepared and ratified, and are, as to the matters in controversy here, similar to those of 1603, save that the only person competent to licence or authorise preachers is the bishop of the diocese, and none of them requires a book to be kept for preachers' names; but they merely embody the ancient common law and canons of the Church adapted to the Reformation. It is doubtful if they apply to occasional preachers; they certainly do not deprive the bishop of any of his authority. The impugnants' advocates strongly urged that the licence of any bishop to preach was sufficient, founded on a supposed opinion of Watson, 4th edit. 147, where he says the licence of any bishop is sufficient; but in the 3rd edit., p. 147, he says, "that a preacher by the canons must have licence from the bishop of the diocese in which the church is." This is omitted in the 4th edit., which runs, "but a licence of any bishop of any diocese is sufficient;" but this edition, and also the third, were published after Watson's death, so that even Watson's opinion cannot be relied on to controvert the general doctrine adverted to, though the passage in the 4th edit. should bear the interpretation put on it, which it would not seem in fairness to do. His Honour then went minutely through the English and Irish Acts of Uniformity, 13 & 14 Car. 2 (English), A.D. 1662; 19 & 20 and 17 & 18 Car. 2 (Irish), c. 6, and 1 Eliz. 12, the clauses of which are the same (see Watson, 4 ed., 338), who considers the clause in the 19th section (English) extends to all ministers preaching in any church, of which they have not the cure; and admitted the inconvenience of extending the canon and statute so as to require every clergyman preaching an occasional sermon in a strange diocese to have a licence under the seal of the bishop of that diocese. In Gates v. Chambers, 2 Add. 189, nothing was really decided; and Sir J. Nicholl expressed great doubts. The first charge against the impugnant there (who had preached by the incumbent's desire, and without any objection of the bishop, but in opposition to attempts to stop him made by a dismissed curate) was for violating the 48th canon for preaching without licence; and, so far as can be collected from the report, Sir J. Nicholl's opinion was against that. The second charge was for having obstructed a duly licensed curate in the discharge of his duties; but nothing was done on this; the pleading was admitted on other grounds, and the suit was abandoned. But here is a different question; for even if the 48th and 50th canons (English) and 38th and 39th (Irish) do not apply to occasional sermons, the impugnants further must show that the bishop has no power to prevent any such clergyman from so preaching or officiating. He had, up to 1603 in England, and 1634 in Ireland, such power; and if the canons do not refer to such a case, the power still remains, unless taken away by statute or usage. The Acts of Uniformity may not require a licence from the bishop to enable a stranger to preach occasional sermons absolutely essential, though they might be so construed, but they do not in any view deprive the bishop of any authority or jurisdiction; and I cannot find any case or dictum to the effect that a bishop could not at his will, without cause assigned, prevent any stranger from preaching or officiating in his diocese till licensed—and any abuse of such right is subject to correction by the metropolitan—and there are also powers in the Crown which might be brought into operation. [The oath was also referred to as taken by the bishop.] Greater abuses might follow if the unrestricted right were allowed incumbents as claimed without any adequate remedy, and no limit could be put to it, and some clear authority for it should be shown. The ordination service, as now in use, had been strongly relied on by the impugnants; and it was urged that, by reason of that service, licensing preachers had fallen into disuse, but no change in it had occurred since the 5 & 6 Edw. 6. There is nothing in it, or in the Thirty-nine Articles, to specify what authority, unless that of the ordinary, shall enable a clergyman to preach in a particular place; and the Thirty-nine Articles and the ordination service were in force when the injunctions of Eliz. and the canons of 1603 and 1634 were issued, and the two Acts of Uniformity enforce the use of such service which recognises the parochial and diocesan system. The discontinuance of the practice to grant the general licence to preach without restriction as to locality cannot be attributed to the ordination service, which has not varied, but more satisfactorily is accounted for by the superior education of the clergy having rendered such licence unnecessary. No authority but the Crown, the archbishops and the universities could grant such general licence. The bishop could only grant a licence in his own diocese, and when the former ceased to grant it, no authority remained but the bishop; but it is difficult to understand that, therefore, his authority was entirely superseded. The forms of institutions and collation for two centuries in use is, "We do commit to you the care and government of the souls of the parishioners," &c. There is no special mention of preaching, or of sacraments, or other duties—all being included in the cure of souls; but in the form to serve perpetual cures the words are, "to serve the cure of souls within, &c., to preach, &c., and administer the sacraments, &c., there," and so as to assistant curates; and when he was only to read prayers, "to read prayers as assistant." Dr. Miller's institution and Mr. Potter's licence are in accordance with those forms (see 2 Burns, 167); and, if institution alone could confer the power claimed, some trace of it would be found in the forms, but they never vary. Whenever a change of cure renders a licence necessary, it contains a licence to preach in the new cure, even in the same diocese. Usage has, in fact, been the other way, as in the cases of Mr. Taylor, whom, on suspicion of holding infidel opinions, and Mr. Nowlan and others, whom the Archbishop of Dublin inhibited; but if the argument here is valid, they might have preached here in defiance of the archbishop, who thus would be deprived of all episcopal power; but, in fact, usage without an adjudication would have little effect on the question. As to the colonies and foreign countries and Scotland, see 59 Geo. 3, c. 60, s. 3; 3 & 4 Vict. c. 33, ss. 1, 2, 3. The general rule that no clergyman can preach in any diocese without the diocesan's consent, express or implied, has been laid down by the temporal as well as ecclesiastical courts—Finch v. Harris, 12 Mod. 641, a prohibition case, the dicta in which, as to the necessity of licence and the effect of the orders, are important, and agree with Sir G. Lee, in Smith v. Lovegrove, 2 Lee, 163. In this case it was not necessary for Sir G. Lee to consider the law as to preachers, because Smith, as a permanent lecturer, came within the Act of Car. 2 and the canons; but, on performing divine service, he is clear that such is prohibited by the 36th and 37th canons: (Trebec v. Keith, 2 Atk. 498, 500.) Dr. Trebec was in holy orders, and Lord Hardwicke puts the very case of occasional officiating without licence as the contempt: (Car v. Marsh, 2 Phill. 206.) Hodgson v. Dillon, 2 Curt. 388, was a case of preaching after an inhibition; so also was The Office v. Neal, 6 N. C. 252; Office v. Nixon, Milw. 390, n.; same case heard on appeal 1838, before Dr. Miller, as surrogate in Armagh, in which he adopts Dr. Phillimore's opinion (Chr. Exr. May 1838, p. 325): "I apprehend that a bishop has no authority to prevent any incumbent within his diocese from admitting into the pulpit of his church any regularly ordained minister of the church, not resident within his diocese, from preaching an occasional sermon in any church within his diocese, provided he has the sanction of the incumbent of that church for so doing." But for that no authority is relied on except the past usage, and therefore it cannot be extended beyond that: (see also Freeland v. Neal, 1 Rob. 651; Office v. Nixon, 20 Ch. R.; Office v. Gladstone, Times, 4th May 1852; Office v. Morton, Times, 3d Nov. 1853.) These were as to unconsecrated places, but the sentences ran forbidding them to preach there or elsewhere in the diocese unless licensed; and the dictum of Lord Mansfield, in Martyn v. Hinds, Cowp. 445, was not relevant to the point under discussion here, as readers (the class in question there) need not have been priests or deacons, and the fuller report, in 1 Doug. 146, throws great doubt on the accuracy of the report. As to the inhibition being void, Bonacre v. Evans, 16 Q.B. 162, was cited; but this inhibition was not a judicial act. It was only a withdrawal of the bishop's permission, and this suit is the judicial proceeding for doing so. Now, on the whole, I am of opinion that the bishop had a legal right to prohibit Mr. Potter from preaching, and also Dr. Miller from permitting him to do so, without assigning cause, and the sentence must be in accordance with that view; but, under the circumstances of Dr. Phillimore's opinion, acted on by Dr. Miller, the surrogate in Armagh, and the other circumstances in the case, I give no costs. Let each party abide their own costs.

ATTENBOROUGH v. KEMP.

Church-rate—Justice and fairness of—Founded on poors-rate—Difference between church-rate and poors-rate—Duty of churchwarden—Appeal as to costs.

Though a church-rate is often made according to the assessment for the poors-rate, it acquires no validity from that circumstance, and the poors-rate may be void and yet the church-rate good. A church-rate does not require to be upon the full rateable value, it merely requires to be just and equal. Yet the acquiescence of a parish in the poors-rate is presumptive evidence that a church-rate made upon the same basis is just and equal. The substantial inequality which will render a church-rate invalid may be either the omission of property that ought to be rated or the under-rating some and the over-rating others.

A church-rate differs from the poors-rate in three things: it need not be upon the net annual value; if just and equal, it cannot be compounded for; and the landlords of small tenements cannot be rated for part thereof in lieu of the occupiers.

The churchwardens in making a church-rate need not follow the poors-rate, and should not do so unless satisfied it is just and equal; and to make it a mere copy of the poors-rate, may make the rate bad.

The general rule that no appeal can be allowed on a mere matter of costs, applies only where the court below fairly exercised its discretion on the matter of costs.

This was an appeal from the Arches Court of Canterbury. A cause of subtraction of church-rate was originally commenced in the Consistorial Court of Rochester, by John Kemp and William Page the younger, the churchwardens of the parish of Southminster, in the county of Essex, diocese of Rochester, and province of Canterbury, against George Attenborough, a parishioner and inhabitant of the said parish. A libel was given and admitted on behalf of the churchwardens, and an allegation was then brought in on behalf of the said George Attenborough, setting forth his objections to the rate on the ground that the assessment thereof was unjust and unequal.

The judge of the Consistory Court of Rochester having ordered this allegation to be reformed, an appeal was entered to the Arches Court, and the judge of that court admitted the allegation with some amendments, and retained the principal cause.

The learned judge (Dr. Lushington), in the course of his elaborate judgment, made the following observations bearing upon the points of law involved:—"The churchwardens for the parish of Southminster, in the county of Essex, are Mr. John Kemp and Mr. William Page. The first article of the libel pleads, that pursuant to notice duly given, a vestry was called on the 19th June, 1857, to make a church-rate—that an estimate was then exhibited; that sundry amendments were moved as to various items, which amendments were rejected, and a poll demanded; that a poll was had on the 20th June, and the result was, that a rate of 3d. in the pound was granted by a majority of 117 against 25. The third article pleads, that Mr. Attenborough was duly assessed for the house and land in his occupation at a yearly rateable value of 197l. 10s., the amount of the rate being 2l. 9s. 4½d. The allegation

ATTENBOROUGH v. KEMP.

then alleges that the rate has been demanded and not paid, Mr. Attenborough having been previously summoned before the magistrates, and declared that he objected to the validity of the rate. It is further pleaded in this article, that Mr. Attenborough was rightly, duly, and legally assessed. I am of opinion that, with respect to the circumstances attending the granting of this rate (I mean the mere making and granting of the rate itself), the churchwardens have established to my satisfaction, that the rate was duly and legally made if the assessment be found to be just and equal. I now come, having briefly stated the contents of the original proceedings, to consider the defence. The first material statement is to be found in that which was originally the second article in the defensive allegation. It is alleged, and the fact is admitted, that this rate was made according to the assessment for the poors-rate. In the St. Neot's case I entered very much at large into the considerations which might arise from making a church-rate according to the poors-rate. I do not deem it necessary to repeat those observations at length. I shall content myself with stating the substance of them. First, a church-rate acquires no validity by being in conformity with the poors-rate. The statute which directs the mode in which a poors-rate should be made is silent as to church-rate. Secondly, a poors-rate being laid upon nearly the same properties as a church-rate, and almost always for a much larger amount, the acquiescence of a parish in such a poors-rate furnishes presumptive evidence that the rate has been justly and equitably made, and, consequently, that a church-rate made on the same basis is made upon a just and equal assessment. Thirdly, that a poors-rate may be illegal and void by the provisions of the statute, and yet a church-rate made on the same assessment may be valid. This position requires some explanation. The statute enacts that a poors-rate shall be made according to the full rateable value, and declares that if not so made such poors-rate shall be null and void. There is no statute to govern church-rates. If a church-rate be just and equal as upon a moiety of the rental throughout the parish, it would be valid, though a poors-rate so made would be by the statute invalid. Fourthly, I have said the acquiescence in a poors-rate furnishes a presumption in favour of a church-rate made on the same basis, and so it does, and also for another reason, because the presumption is that the law has been complied with, and the law requires an equal assessment. But this presumption may be rebutted by circumstances and by evidence. A statute is not always, as we well know, strictly obeyed, and in the case of poors-rates it is very often violated. Reverting to the allegation, the next averment is, that the assessment is unequal and unjust. Now, if the assessment be substantially unequal, it must be unjust and illegal. That, then, is the issue which the Court has to try. I use the expressions "substantially unequal," because perfect equality is utterly unattainable, and the law requires no such impossibility. I will here observe that, if there be a substantial inequality, it matters not what the cause of such inequality may be, whether the omission of property that ought to be rated, or the underrating some and the overrating others. The Court is bound to express its opinion upon the validity of the rate, and it cannot pronounce a rate to be valid, which from any cause is substantially unequal. The issue, therefore, which I have to try is, not whether Mr. Attenborough is correctly rated with regard to the annual value of the property he occupies, but whether also the other parishioners are adequately assessed. This is the only mode in which I can treat this or any other church-rate case, though if I were to try such a case by reference simply to the rating of one individual, the rate might be good as to one person and bad as to another, which cannot be. The whole rate is valid or invalid in toto. The Court must pronounce the rate to be valid before it can enforce it against any one. It cannot take a partial view of a rate, and, as is well known, it cannot amend it. But before I approach the subject of the evidence of the unequal rating, I think it expedient to state the difference which exists in law between a rate for the poor and a church-rate. I shall do so as briefly as possible. As to the poor-rate, no rate not made according to the provisions of the statute of the 6 & 7 Will. 4, c. 96, can be valid: I leave out considerations of mere matter of form. Such poors-rate must be made upon the nett annual value of the rent for which the premises might reasonably be expected to let from year to year free of the charges enumerated in the statute. With respect to church-rates, the first essential difference is, that provided it be just and equal, it may be made upon any assessment or estimate whatever. Now it follows from this essential difference, as I have already said, that a poors-rate would be invalid, but a church-rate may be valid. I will see if this is so. Then, again, there is another distinction. The owners of certain tenements may compound for poors-rates as declared by the 2nd section of the statute. And lastly, reference with regard to poors-rate must be had to the 13 & 14 Vict., which does not apply to church-rates. That statute gives the power of rating the landlord for small tenements at three-fourths, and other proportions of their value; and be it remembered, that the Legislature—and I should imagine, for wise reasons—have confined that statute in its operation to poor-rate and highway-rate. Such being the state of the law, let me consider the duty of the churchwardens in making a church-rate. They should bear in mind that they are bound to take pains to make the church-rate just and equal, that there is no authority which justifies them simply making the rate according to the poors-rate; that there is no legal rule whatever which enables them to say, "I have made this rate according to the poors-rate, therefore it must be deemed a valid church-rate." At the same time, as I said before, the presumption, under ordinary circumstances, is in favour of the poor-law assessment acquiesced in; but that presumption alone will not do, and they ought to remember the heading of the rate, and it is their duty to be satisfied before they adopt a poors-rate as a basis for a church-rate, that the poors-rate itself is a just assessment. I will not read the declaration over again, but that declaration states clearly and correctly what the duty of churchwardens is in a matter of this description; and I would that the churchwardens in this case, who seem to have taken great pains in order to make a valid rate, had availed themselves of the assistance of a person exceedingly well qualified to give good advice; I mean Mr. Veley, from his knowledge of Church-rate law. I would that, instead of having consulted him only as to the mere form of making a rate, they had advised with him as to that which is of infinitely more real importance—the justness of the basis upon which this assessment was to be founded. Now, therefore, several things follow from this, and the judgment I am about pronouncing may, when it comes to be made public, and be known in various other parishes so far as I can entertain a humble hope, prevent some of the confusion which is constantly occurring. The churchwardens must remember that the church-rate cannot lawfully be a mere copy of the poors-rate assessment, for in church-rate there can be no compounding; every one in strictness ought to be rated, though, under circumstances, the churchwardens may be excused from attempting to enforce a rate upon the very poor.

Passing over, then, a great deal that might be said upon the question of the injustice of the rate, let me briefly advert to the judicial decisions which have taken place upon the question. I hope that in my search I have not omitted any that can have the least important bearing upon it; but there are very few.

PRIV. CO.]

ATTENBOROUGH v. KEMP.

[PRIV. CO.]

With reference to judicial decisions there are not more than two or three cases which have been adverted to as to the adoption of a poor-rate assessment to found a church-rate. They afford, therefore, very little assistance indeed towards the decision of such a case as this, and in fact those cases state no proposition whatever, admitting, as I think, of denial, and are utterly useless for the decision of this case. In Lamb and Simpson v. Weall, 4 Hagg. 100, a judgment of Sir John Nicholl, and to his judgments I pay very great respect for his knowledge of the law and his great accuracy. What said Sir John Nicholl? He said, "Prima facie the poors-rate seems to furnish a fair ground of analogy. It is generally much higher than a church-rate, and therefore the assessment is laid with greater accuracy." So far good. I accede to that proposition as I have already done before, and say that it affords a strong presumption. "But," adds Sir John Nicholl, "if the poors-rate is not fairly laid over the whole parish, it ceases to be a just rate." That brings us exactly back to the very place in which we were before, namely, whether the poors-rate be a correct assessment or not. Then he adds, "The acquiescence of the parish for some years in this mode of assessment is prima facie evidence of its propriety:" a proposition, I think, undoubtedly true—"strong prima facie evidence," and unless that prima facie evidence was rebutted by evidence at least as strong, the court would pronounce in favour of the rate. This I say has not relieved me in the slightest degree from the task I have to perform. In Les and Parker v. Chalcroft, all Sir John Nicholl said was, "The burden of proof is strongly upon the ratepayers;" and here again I agree with him, and "that if the case was left in reasonable doubt it must be decided against the ratepayer." Admitting all this to be as I have said, I have already expressed my opinion that the assessment of 1859 proves the assessment of 1857 to be erroneous and in some respects unequal. And I am of opinion that it is a question of degree whether it is in such a degree unequal and founded upon erroneous principles as to call upon the court not to enforce the rate. I have read the abridgment which I made, showing what are the variations in this church-rate of 1859, and I cannot reconcile it to my mind to say that these are unimportant variations upon the correct scale. I cannot think that 45 per cent., in one instance 50, in others 30 and 40, and that within a period of two years, are other than substantial variations. Being therefore of this opinion, that a substantial inequality is proved, and that by reference to an assessment which cannot admit of dispute, and which assessment has been adopted and sanctioned by the churchwardens and parishioners for making a church-rate of 10*d*. in the pound; I feel myself compelled to say that I cannot pronounce a decree in favour of a rate with such gross inequalities. The assessment is manifestly founded upon an imperfect and unequal basis; and if an unequal basis, then it is no longer consistent with justice. I cannot conclude this judgment without making a few observations upon the state of the law. With respect to the poors-rate, the Legislature spares no pains. They have afforded every facility for its being made upon a just and equitable basis. Statutes direct upon what basis, and according to what rules poor-rates shall be made. The most ample opportunity is given to individuals overrated to obtain facile and cheap redress, and the means of correction are certain and speedy. Now, look to church-rates: they have existed from time immemorial. All the circumstances and relations of the country have undergone a change. Save the 53rd of Geo. 3 as to the collection of church-rates where the validity is not disputed, not one statute has passed facilitating the making of a legal church-rate; not one statute, allowing a just opportunity to individuals to complain and obtain redress for the overrating or affording any remedy where the demand was just, save the cumbrons and obsolete proceeding of the Ecclesiastical Court. In such state is the law which I have to administer. Hence such suits as this, which I will not characterise, save to declare my opinion, that if church-rates are to be maintained, there ought to be afforded the means of doing justice, a rule on which the assessment should be founded, means to correct that assessment, and an expeditious and cheap mode of recovering the rates. I attribute no moral blame to the churchwardens. They followed in the steps of those who preceded them; but they have not fulfilled the requirements of the law. They have thought it was a mere matter of course to adopt the poors-rate. Now, hear what Bailey, B. says: "In making church-rates" (reported 9 B. & C.), "the making of church-rates is an act requiring judgment and discretion, affecting the property of others." The churchwardens have not verified the declaration prefixed. They have taken no pains at all, and know nothing of the justice or injustice of the assessment. I cannot pronounce for the rate. Now, as to the question of costs. The general and almost universal rule is, that costs should follow, and be granted to the successful party, and it is a rule that I should be reluctant to depart from, especially where the matter in dispute is of such small value, except upon the soundest reasons. But costs are in the discretion of the court, and I must look to the conduct of all parties, before I determine how I will deal with them. Now, I look to the meeting when this rate was made in June 1857, and I do not find that upon that occasion, any one of the parishioners, Mr. Attenborough who was present, or any one else, objected to the adoption of the poors-rate. I think it would have been but consistent with candour and fair dealing, if, intending to object to this rate upon the grounds of the inequality of the poors-rate, which was then to be taken as a basis for the rate, that declarations had then been made, when the churchwardens might have considered the position which they were in, when they might have corrected any mistake, and when the rate might have been made, perhaps, on a sounder basis. If a party will lie by, and will oppose a church-rate, upon what, I believe, are manifest grounds—opposition to all church-rates whatever—and afterwards base his defence on an inequality which he might possibly have corrected at the time, in my judgment it is not a case for costs, and I shall make no order as to costs.

Mr. Attenborough appealed from this judgment to her Majesty in Council, as regarded the question of costs.

Deane, Q.C. for the app.

Twiss, Q.C. for the resps., was not called upon.

TURNER, L.J.—Their Lordships do not think it necessary in this case to hear counsel for the resps. They do not wish to lay it down as a general rule that in no case will an appeal lie in respect of costs alone; because there may be cases where no discretion has been fairly exercised upon the question, and where the decision of the court has proceeded upon mistake or misapprehension. Their Lordships, therefore, do not think that any general rule can be laid down which is applicable to cases of that description; these cases their Lordships desire to leave untouched. But when there has been a bona fide case, and discretion exercised on the part of the judge, then their Lordships have no hesitation in stating their opinion that in such cases no appeal will lie as to costs. Here the learned judge, with respect to the question of costs, weighed the reasons on both sides with due deliberation. He considered on the one hand that the churchwardens followed the course adopted by their predecessors, and on the other that the present app. was present at the time when the original church-rate was made, and took no objection on the ground of the church-rate being founded upon the poor-rate. It is manifest, therefore, that the question met with all proper consideration on the part of the learned judge. Their Lordships do not see any ground whatever for differing from him in the discretion which he has exercised, even if that discretion were a question for their consideration. But they think it is not a question for their consideration whether that discretion was well or ill exercised, if it was bona fide exercised after due deliberation. Their Lordships, therefore, must advise her Majesty to dismiss this appeal with costs.

Decree affirmed with costs.

V. C. WOOD'S COURT.

Reported by W. H. BENNET, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

March 8 and 12.

FRIEND v. DENNETT.

Contract — Board of health — Rates — Concurrent jurisdiction — Specific performance.

A board of health has no power to enter into a contract which can bind the rates of the particular district, unless such contract is made, and the engagements therein contained entered into, in the mode prescribed by the Act of Parliament.

A court of equity, equally with a court of common law, has jurisdiction to adjudicate upon the validity of such contract.

The object of this suit was to obtain specific performance of a contract entered into by the plt. with the Worthing Local Board of Health, for the drainage of Worthing.

It appeared that the Board of Health of Worthing had, some time ago, entered into a contract with one Dowell, for a portion of the drainage of the town and the construction of certain works in connection therewith. The works were discontinued by Dowell, and the plt., in Nov. 1856, made a tender for executing the drainage required to complete the works upon certain specified terms. The contract was entered into on the part of the local board of health by a resolution, not under seal, and not in accordance with the provisions of the Public Health Act 1848, sect. 85. But it appeared that the deft., the clerk to the board, had prepared a draft contract, and in Dec. 1856 sent it to the plt. for their perusal and approbation, and that they never returned the draft, although requested so to do, which was the reason why the contract was never executed in accordance with the provisions of the Public Health Act 1848.

The plt. were urged to commence operations by the deft. Dennett, the clerk to the board, and in Dec. 1856 they proceeded with the unfinished works. During the progress of the works, the local board paid to the plt. from time to time various sums of money, as the engineer, Mr. Robert Rawlinson, certified the plt. to be entitled to receive them.

Differences very soon arose between the parties as to the works, the plt. complaining that the sewers had not been kept clear of water by the board of health, pursuant to their alleged undertaking. Upon the completion of the works these differences were referred to Mr. Robert Rawlinson, C.E., in accordance with the terms of the draft contract which had been prepared though never executed, and Mr. Rawlinson, on 4th Oct. 1857, certified that there was a final balance due to the plt. of 128*l.* 18*s.* 9*d.* in full of all demands, which was immediately paid by the board. By this certificate Mr. Rawlinson disallowed the claims set up by the plt. by their action at law and by their bill in equity.

In Nov. 1857 the plt. commenced an action against the local board of health to enforce their contract, and to obtain damages for its nonperformance by the defts. The defts. put in issue the validity of the contract, and the Court of C. B. held that the board of health had no power to bind the rates unless by contracts entered into by the modes prescribed by sect. 85 of the Public Health Act 1848.

The plt. having failed at law, filed their bill praying specific performance of the contract, and that, if necessary, the defts. might be ordered to execute a formal contract under the seal of the board.

Rolt, Q.C. and Kingdon for the plt.

Sir H. Cairns, Q.C. and Nugent for the defts.

The cases cited were Kirk v. Bromley Union, 2 Phill. 640; Nixon v. Taff Vale Railway Company, 7 Hare. 136; and Ambrose v. Guardians of Poor of Dunmow Union, 9 Beav. 508.

The VICE-CHANCELLOR said:—I cannot decide in favour of the plt. in this case. The deft. Mr. Dennett represents the local board of health, and the local board of health has power to tax the inhabitants of a certain district for certain purposes in a certain way. The case has been tried at law upon this question, and it seems to me that it is very difficult to point out any distinction between what ought to regulate a court of equity and a court of law upon this point. The Act of Parliament points out a certain mode in which contracts should be made. It is not a question of seal only, but a number of points which must be considered important for those who are to be affected by the contract. In truth, the board of health is without power to enter into any contract which can bind the rates, unless they execute the engagement in the manner in which the Act prescribes. The section of the Act in the first place says that the contract shall be under seal if it exceed 10*l.* Then it is provided also that, before contracting, the board shall have an estimate of the probable expense, and it is provided also that before any contract to the amount of 100*l.* and upwards is entered into, ten days' public notice shall be given—not by any means an unimportant provision—expressing the nature and purpose thereof, and inviting tenders for the execution of the same, and the local board are to require and take sufficient security for the performance of the same. Now, in this case, it does not appear that any one of these formalities has been complied with in the case of Mr. Dowell. If the question in dispute on the contract itself were independent of the preliminary question, I should have been very willing to have seen my way to a decision in favour of the plt. if I could possibly have done so, and I began at first to consider how far one could treat Dowell's contract, assuming it to be entered into with all the formalities requisite having been complied with, as simply finished by this gentleman the plt.; but that would not answer the plt.'s view, because, he says, Dowell tendered at a sum which made him fail. He sent in a tender at the time, but he says it was not in the same terms as Dowell's was—that is, as to payment. Further than that, the plt. says, "There is another very important item of the contract upon which I insisted I must be in a better condition than Dowell—that whereas he only had a contract with the board that they would free the sewer of water, but complied with a condition that they were not to be liable to any damage to the trenches in any respect, I said they were to keep it free from water, and were to be liable for any damage;" and the bulk of his claim, now to the extent of 250*l.* against the board of health, is for damage in not doing that which he says, by the contract entered into between them and him, they were bound to do, as varied and distinguished from Dowell's contract. The result would be, if I decided in favour of the plt., that the rate-payers would be bound by a contract not made by advertisement, not complying with all the requisite solemnities, and more than solemnities, because advertising and tenders are things of substance not made in that mode in which the Act of Parliament says alone they were to be bound, and that was the ground of the decision in the court of law. That seems a substantial ground, going far beyond the formality of seal, which this court is bound to attend to quite as much as a court of law. The Chief Justice at first expressed, with a good deal of warmth, his objecting during the opening of the argument to this sort of resistance relying upon the want of compliance with the formalities of the Act. But the counsel proceeded with their argument, and then, further on, the Chief Justice says, "You may say that their power to bind the rate arises entirely from the Act of Parliament, and that unless they observe the Act of Parliament they cannot bind the rates." Then the counsel, proceeding, says, "Exactly so; and on these grounds it is submitted that the rules must be absolute to enter a verdict for the debt." Then the Chief Justice says: "This rule must be made absolute, a conclusion which I regret to come to. The object of this action is to make the rates liable by means of an action against the clerk of the board. Now the power of the local board to enter into contract, so as to bind the rates, is entirely the creature of the statute; and the statute having prescribed a mode by which these contracts are to be made, that I think is part of the power given; and the board of health has, as it seems to me, no power to bind the rates unless by contracts entered into by the mode pointed out by the Act, and in this view Mr. Field's argument is very powerful." Williams, J. says: "This Act of Parliament publicly says that persons dealing with these bodies can only do it in a particular way. That has not been done here. I am therefore of the same opinion with the Lord Chief Justice." Willes, J. says: "It has been argued on the 85th section that it gave only a mode of entering into a contract; but that is not so, for the first time it gives these bodies a power of binding the rates which did not exist before. Therefore, according to the usual rule, the enactment must be strictly pursued." Now, every one of these observations is just as forcible here as in a court of law. If you find that the ratepayers are only to be bound in a given way, and more especially if you find it is not simply a question of common seal, but whether they are to be bound by a contract entered into without advertisements, and without tenders, and without estimates, the question is whether this court would say that they are to be bound by that, the work itself having been done. Of course I expected the counsel for the plt. would say, and he put it very properly, what would this court be disposed to say if the whole work had been done, and there had not been a farthing paid? In that particular point of view, all one can say on such a subject is, that the contractor might possibly, for aught I know, have a remedy against the individuals who contract with him, or he might not, according to the form in which he made the contract. But this court would find great difficulty, as it seems to me, in saying that, if done as against the ratepayers, who are the persons here represented by the debt, without tender and without any of those solemnities which are required by the Act, independently of the seal, they could be made liable in consequence of the work having been so done by a decree of this court. But, at the same time, I do not forget the class of cases in which even the public have been held bound. There is a class of cases in which the Attorney-General has been held bound by acquiescence. That was well considered in the case of The Attorney-General v. The Sheffield Gas Consumers Company, and in the case of The Attorney-General v. Johnson, in which it was held that, at all events, to the extent of laches and acquiescence, the public could be bound and the Attorney-General could be bound as regards the public, by a certain degree of laches or acquiescence. Here the lightest case that is put is a simple case of money demand against a body of this description with reference to work which is said to have been executed for their benefit. At present my feeling is, that I should have the same difficulty even if the whole had been done, and nothing paid for it, which I have now that the bulk has been done; and it is only a question of what is now to be paid for a small amount. There is a difficulty in seeing what right this court would have to say that, in consequence of acquiescence, these persons could be bound to consent to the levying a rate for the purpose of reimbursing the contractor, who had done the work according to the terms of the contract so entered into. Whether or not one would find a way to do justice in the best mode that could be done in such a state of circumstances I will not stop now longer to consider, feeling that the difficulty would be very considerable even in such an extreme state of things as I have suggested. But the difficulty is much greater with reference to the case before me. The difference here is simply this—the work has been done, and the work, with the exception, I think, of the timber, has really been paid for according to the contract. It is a question whether there was not something left undone by the contracting parties for which they are liable in damages. The question raised is this—not whether you have not paid us (except a question about the amount of timber that may be left in the trenches), but having entered, as the plt. says, into a contract by which you were bound to keep this main sewer free from water, in consequence of your not doing so, the work became more expensive than it otherwise would have been, and I have suffered damage in respect of that which I now claim to be paid for. There is no provision in the contract that in the event of your not doing it you are to pay a specified sum, but having been paid for my contract, I want to make the ratepayers liable for the damage which has accrued from one portion of the contract not having been fulfilled. That is an exceedingly different case. But further than that I think the contract is hardly brought so high, because it stands thus in the absence of all evidence on the one side or on the other. The agreement is to do it according to Mr. Dowell's specification; that is the agreement which the plt. insists upon. Then besides that, these words are added—the board are to pay such and such a sum of money, the works to be completed within six months from the commencement, and "the existing sewers or drains to be kept clear of water by the board. That is how it stands. Now neither side denies that Dowell's contract, except so far as it may be varied by that, is embodied in the agreement. In Dowell's contract there were two very distinct matters: the one that the contractor was to keep his new works free from water; but the other was that the board were, as soon as the sewage pumps were sent, to free the existing sewers from water, and the contractor might then drain any trenches in which he was at work into such sewers, "but the board will not be responsible for damage or otherwise in such trenches." As soon as the pumps are set, Dowell's contract, it is said by the plt.'s counsel, is an unintelligible contract to a certain extent—namely, that they contract to do that, and say they will not be liable for any damage which may result from its not being done. At all events, this is the contract that Dowell was content to enter into, neither does it seem to me so extremely insensible because it might give this right—"I cannot begin my work, you cannot have any damages against me for not performing the work, because I cannot do it, you not having performed your part of the contract." That is one way in which he might assert his right; but the board say, "You shall not assert your right in the shape of damages if you choose to work." That might very well be their reason. It was a new engine. The contract says, "When the sewage pumps are set." It seems they were about to set a new engine, and they might well say, "We engage to free the water, but we do not intend to make ourselves liable in the event of any damage by flooding or otherwise to the trenches." Then the question is, whether these words, "the existing sewers or drains to be kept clear of water by the board," coupled with the engagement to act entirely under Dowell's contract, supersede that last clause. It might have been argued that they were inconsistent with it, if you had not found the identical clause that is put in conjunction with that clause. It might be open to argument to say, "If I stipulate that you are to keep the thing clear of water, you must be answerable for damages," if you did not find in the contract itself that there is that identical contract, and that they did stipulate to keep them free from water, and did not make themselves answerable for damages. Why are you to say that that proviso is not to be tacked on to this—"The existing sewers or drains to be kept clear of water by the board?" The plt. to a certain degree feels that, no doubt. I have not the least doubt myself that he is saying what he believes to be true, but he is contradicted by the other persons who were present. That might have been his intention; but the question is, whether he sufficiently expresses that intention. He says, "My intention was to cut out the two clauses of the agreement—the one that I was to be obliged to keep the trenches dry; and also to cut out the clause that you were not to be liable for damage." That is what he says. But the three persons who were present say that not a word of that kind was said. One of them says: "I made a memorandum of what did pass, and it does not contain any such entry; I showed that to the gentleman at the time, and he did not make any remark upon it;" so that you have to read the two agreements together. It is rather of very considerable doubt whether one would be able to come to any conclusion in favour of the plt. even upon his own view, if the whole matter were open now upon that part of the case. But I make this further observation. It results in a claim for damage—not for any benefit done by him in respect of works beyond what he was bound to do; but he says, "I have in doing this work been put to more expense than I should have been, and I want to fasten that upon the ratepayers." It seems to me, for the reasons given by the learned judges, that it was intended the ratepayers should have all the benefit of notice, and so on, and that I cannot fix them with the consequences of this alleged damage in respect of this breach of the contract in a case in which the contract has not been made in a form by which they might reasonably be expected to be bound. There is the other claim about the timber, which is a claim to be paid for things actually furnished. There is nothing here in the shape of fraud alleged—it is nothing like the case of Macintosh v. The Great Western Railway Company. It stands thus: There is a dispute upon the effect of the contract. The contract with Dowell is, that wherever timber is put in by the order of the engineer or the surveyor, then you are to be paid for that timber if it is left, unless the engineer or surveyor certifies that it was from your fault that it was left. I rather agree with Mr. Rolt: he says it does not turn upon whether they gave the order to put that timber in. I do not find a dispute that timber in certain specified places was necessary. There is no certificate that this was not necessary, therefore I presume it was considered on all sides to be necessary. But they raise a question upon the effect of the contract, whether the fact that he was to have higher prices in certain specified places did or did not include a higher price in consequence of timber being necessary, and therefore was not provided for under Dowell's contract. If it rested upon Dowell's contract alone, for the reasons for which I say, it appears to me the plt. would have a difficulty in saying that his debtors had varied the contract; I should rather have been inclined to say that no reference being made to the contract, the contract would not be superseded, and it would rest upon Dowell's contract. [Sir Hugh Cairns.—Your Honour has not heard us upon the construction of this.] That would be my impression, but there is no question of fraud at all, and it comes back to the contract, it is a question of the construction of the contract. This gentleman does not say these things have not been ordered, neither does he say—"I have certified that they are good for nothing; that the timber was occasioned by your default;" but he leaves it upon the construction of the contract if I could get at it, but it seems to me I cannot get at it. I doubt exceedingly whether I could get at it in a much stronger case than this; but with regard to these adjuncts to the case with reference to the damage done by something which the defts. are averred on their part to have performed, and with reference to the payment of the timber, I do not see how I can fix upon the ratepayers these liabilities. This gentleman with his eyes open—because the Act of Parliament is presumed to be known to him—has chosen to do that which will not give him a hold upon those who are to be made liable only in specified manner to the engagements which are in the Act pointed out. The courts of common law have gone very nearly as far as courts of equity, where parties have had the benefit of a contract, showing strongly that this decision rests upon a distinction which they are bound to follow. Renter v. The Electric Telegraph Company is a strong case where a company is a trading company, a railway or other company, who for their own benefit may get an act done by their own directors whom they have chosen—that is by their own agents: the question is very different. The court has found the means of getting at them when they have had the benefit of the arrangement. But the class of persons who are appointed by Act of Parliament with certain powers of taxation, to be exercised in a given mode, are in a position extremely different from those who are to be affected by those powers of taxation or those who are the recognised and chosen agents, as in the case of a company who are transacting their business for them, and who being limited to do it in a particular way, do it in another way. On the other hand, the ratepayers have, by authority of Parliament (and they are supposed to give their consent by sending their representatives to Parliament), appointed over them certain persons who have a right of raising money from them, but they have no right unless they comply with the regulations of the Act of Parliament, which says how that money is to be raised, and how the contracts are to be entered into which are to bind those ratepayers. I think, therefore, in that view of the case, the decision of the court of law really precludes me from entering into other considerations which are raised here upon the contract, and I must therefore dismiss the bill, and necessarily with costs. Decree accordingly.

CLERK v. THE QUEEN.

Venue—Quo warranto—Change of venue—Inherent power of court.

The Court of Q. B. has an inherent power to change the venue in the trial of a quo warranto information, and even in a trial for murder, on a suggestion that it will be more conveniently tried elsewhere than in the original venue.

H. OF L.]

CLERK v. THE QUEEN.

This was a writ of error upon a judgment of the Ex. Ch., affirming a judgment of the Q. B. in favour of the prosecutor of an information in the nature of a quo warranto.

Liverpool.—Be it remembered that Charles Francis Robinson, Esq., coroner and attorney of our Sovereign Lady the Queen, &c., at the relation of Thomas Rigby, of the borough of Liverpool, wine and spirit merchant, according to the form of the statute in such cases made and provided, brought into the court of our said Lady the Queen before the Queen herself, then here, a certain information in the nature of a quo warranto against John Clerk, late of the borough of Liverpool aforesaid, merchant, which said information follows in these words, that is to say, In the Q. B. of Hilary Term in the twenty-second year of Queen Victoria. Liverpool.—Be it remembered that Charles Francis Robinson, Esq., &c., at the relation of Thomas Rigby, of the borough of Liverpool, &c., gives the said court here to understand and be informed, that the borough of Liverpool is one of the boroughs named in the schedule (A) annexed to the Act of Parliament made and passed in the sixth year of the reign of King William the Fourth, intituled "An Act to provide for the Regulation of Municipal Corporations in England and Wales," and that within the said borough, according to the provisions of the said Act, there are and of right ought to be divers, to wit, sixteen wards of the said borough, one whereof is called and known as No. 4 or Saint Paul's Ward, and that within the said borough, according to the provisions of the said Act, there are and of right ought to be divers, to wit, forty-eight councillors of the said borough, that is to say three councillors of and for each of the said sixteen wards of the said borough, to be elected in the manner in the said Act specified, and that the place and office of a councillor of the said borough is a public office of great trust and pre-eminence within the said borough, touching the rule and government of the same (that is to say), at the borough of Liverpool aforesaid in the county of Lancaster, and that John Clerk, late of the said borough of Liverpool merchant, heretofore, to wit, on the 1st Nov. 1858, at the borough of Liverpool aforesaid, in the county aforesaid, did use and exercise, and from thence continually afterwards to the time of exhibiting this information hath there used and exercised, without any legal warrant, royal grant or right whatsoever, the office of a councillor of and for the said ward, called No. 4, or St. Paul's Ward, in the said borough, and for and during all the term aforesaid hath there claimed, and still doth there claim to be a councillor of and for the said ward, and to have, use and enjoy all the liberties, privileges and franchises to the office of a councillor of and for the said ward belonging and appertaining, which said office, liberties, privileges and franchises he the said John Clerk for and during all the time aforesaid upon our said Lady the Queen, without any legal warrant, royal grant or right whatsoever, hath usurped and still doth usurp, that is to say, at the borough of Liverpool aforesaid, in the county aforesaid, in contempt of our said Lady the Queen, to the great damage and prejudice of her royal prerogative and against her crown and dignity: whereupon the said coroner and attorney of our said Lady the Queen, for our said lady the Queen, prayeth the consideration of the said court here in the premises, and that due process of law may be awarded against him the said John Clerk to make him answer to our said Lady the Queen, and show by what authority he claims to have, use and enjoy the office, liberties, privileges and franchises aforesaid.

Plea.—That under colour of the premises contained in the said information he is greatly troubled and vexed, and that by no means justly, because protesting that the said information and matters therein contained are not sufficient in law, and that he need not nor is obliged by law to give any answer thereto, yet for plea in this behalf the said John Clerk says, that he did not use or exercise the said office of a councillor of and for the said ward, nor claim to be a councillor of and for the said ward, nor to have, use, or enjoy the liberties, privileges and franchises of the said office of a councillor of the said ward belonging or appertaining or any part thereof in manner and form as by the said information is above laid to his charge, and of this he puts himself upon the country, &c.

Issue thereon.

And now on the 2nd March 1859 it is suggested and manifestly appears to the court here, that the trial of the said issue above joined between the said coroner and attorney and the said John Clerk may be more conveniently had in the county of Middlesex than in the county of Lancaster. Therefore, according to the statute in such case made and provided, let a jury of the said county of Middlesex come, &c. The record then set out a verdict of guilty, and the judgment of the Court of Q.B. therein.

A writ of error having been brought to the Ex. Ch. the judgment was affirmed, whereupon a writ of error was brought to the H. of L.

The assignment of errors was as follows:—That it appears by the said record that the issue joined in the said information was tried in and by a jury of the county of Middlesex, and not in or by a jury of the county or place where the venue in the said information is laid, wherefore in this there is manifest error; and there is also error in this, that there is no statute or law to warrant a trial of the said issue by a jury of the county of Middlesex upon a suggestion that the trial thereof might be more conveniently had in that county than in the county of Lancaster, wherefore in this there is manifest error; and also there is error in this, that the judgment aforesaid of the said court of our lady the Queen before the Queen herself by the record aforesaid appears to have been given for our lady the Queen against the said John Clerk, whereas by the law of the land the said judgment ought to have been given for the said John Clerk against our said lady the Queen, therefore in this there is manifest error; and also there is error in this, that the judgment aforesaid was affirmed in the Court of Ex. Ch. of our said lady the Queen, whereas by the law of the land the said judgment ought to have been reversed, therefore in that there is manifest error: And the said John Clerk prays, that the judgment and affirmance thereof aforesaid, for the errors aforesaid and for other errors in the said record and proceedings being, may be reversed, annulled and altogether holden for nought, and that he may be restored to all things which he hath lost by occasion of the said judgment and the said affirmance thereof.

Brett, Q.C., for the plt. in error, contended that there was no power in the court below to change the venue on a mere suggestion of greater convenience attending the trial in Middlesex. [Lord Chancellor CAMPBELL.—Then you must contend that the trial was utterly bad. It is too late to insist on such a ground of contention. Even in the case of murder the venue has been changed in the same way again and again. The Court of Q. B. does this by its own inherent power. It is vain for you to go on arguing this case.]

Re RAMSAY'S SETTLEMENT.

The Succession Duty Act 1853—The 16 & 17 Vict. c. 51, s. 2—Settlement—Predecessor—Donee of a power.

A husband, by his marriage-settlement, in consideration of 6000*l.* then settled by his intended wife, and for other considerations, covenanted to pay, and afterwards paid, 10,000*l.* to the trustees of the settlement, to be invested for the benefit of the wife, for her life, and then for her children (if any) by him, and in default of such children, for the children of the wife by a former marriage. The wife had no children by her second husband:

*Held, that the children by the first marriage took the 10,000*l.* as strangers, and that under the 16 & 17 Vict. c. 51, s. 2, the second husband was, as to them the "predecessor" in the fund, and that they must, therefore, pay 10 per cent. duty.*

Where a settlement contains a power of appointment, in some one other than the settlor, and the exercise of the power transfers the property from the settlor to some one else, the donee of such a power is the "predecessor" of the appointee under the above Act.

This was a petition presented by a Mr. and Mrs. Batten and the trustees of their marriage-settlement. Mrs. Batten was the daughter of the late Lady Ramsay. The petition prayed the payment out of court of a sum of 5845*l.* 5*s.* 3*d.*, which had been paid in under an order made in a suit of Sandiman v. Mackenzie. The question now argued was, to what amount of succession duty the Commissioners of Inland Revenue were entitled upon the fund? and the answer to that question depended on the ascertaining whether Sir Thomas Ramsay or Lady Ramsay was the "predecessor" within the meaning of the 16 & 17 Vict. c. 51, s. 2.

By the 16 & 17 Vict. c. 51, s. 2 (the Succession Duty Act), it is enacted as follows:—"Every past or future disposition of property, by reason whereof any person has or shall become beneficially entitled to any property or the income thereof, upon the death of any person dying after the time appointed for the commencement of this Act, either immediately or after any interval, either certainly or contingently, and either originally or by way of substitutive limitation, and every devolution by law of any beneficial interest in property, or the income thereof, upon the death of any person dying after the time appointed for the commencement of this Act, to any other person in possession or expectancy, shall be deemed to have conferred or to confer on the person entitled by reason of any such disposition or devolution, a 'succession'; and the term 'successor' shall denote the person so entitled; and the term 'predecessor' shall denote the settlor, disponent, testator, obligor, ancestor, or other person from whom the interest of the successor is or shall be derived."

The facts of the case were shortly the following:—

By the marriage-settlement of Sir Thomas and Lady Ramsay, and which was dated the 10th June 1819, after providing that a sum of 6000*l.*, to which Lady Ramsay was then entitled, and all the real and personal estate which she might acquire during the coverture, should be vested in the trustees of the settlement upon trust for herself for her life, with remainder to Sir Thomas for his life, and on his death as she should appoint, and in default of appointment, to her next of kin, and if he died in her lifetime, then for her absolutely; Sir Thomas agreed to pay the trustees the sum of 10,000*l.* upon trust to invest the same, and pay the interest to him for his life, remainder to Lady Ramsay for her life, and at the death of the survivor, upon trust for the children of the marriage, as Sir Thomas should appoint, and in default of appointment to them equally; and in default of issue of the marriage, then in trust, after the decease of the survivor of Sir Thomas and Lady Ramsay, to pay and assign the same trust-fund unto all or such of the children of Lady Ramsay by her late husband Mr. William Chisholm (except her eldest son Alexander William Chisholm), as Sir Thomas should appoint, and for want of such appointment, in trust for all and every the then present children of Lady Ramsay (except as aforesaid) who should attain twenty-one, in equal shares if more than one, and if but one such child (except as aforesaid), then the whole for that one younger child. By an indenture dated the 30th July 1819, and indorsed on the last indenture, Sir Thomas Ramsay released the sum of 10,000*l.* agreed to be paid by him from his power to appoint the same among the children of Lady Ramsay by her former husband; and it was directed that the trustees should stand possessed thereof after the death of the survivor of Sir Thomas and Lady Ramsay, and in case of failure of issue of their marriage, upon similar trusts in favour of the children of her former marriage, as before declared, except that Lady Ramsay was substituted for Sir Thomas as the appointing party. Lady Ramsay had at that time three children only, viz. A. W. Chisholm, her eldest son, Duncan Macdonald Chisholm, and Jemima Chisholm. Sir Thomas Ramsay paid the 10,000*l.* to the trustees of the settlement, who invested the same in the purchase of 11,903*l.* 19*s.* 1*d.* Consolidated Bank Annuities; and he died in 1830, leaving Lady Ramsay, but without leaving any issue of his marriage with her. 1500*l.* Consols (part of the 11,903*l.* 19*s.* 1*d.* like annuities) was in 1837 advanced and paid to Mr. Duncan Macdonald Chisholm by Lady Ramsay's direction and appointment. By an indenture dated the 28th July 1843, being the settlement made on the marriage of Miss Jemima Chisholm and Mr. Edward Batten, the sum of 5951*l.* 19*s.* 6*d.* Three per Cent. Annuities, which represented her moiety of the sum of 11,903*l.* 19*s.* 1*d.* like annuities invested in the names of the trustees of Sir Thomas and Lady Ramsay's settlement, was assigned by Miss J. Chisholm, with the privity and consent of Lady Ramsay and Mr. E. C. Batten, to trustees upon certain trusts to take effect after the death of Lady Ramsay, as thereby declared. Lady Ramsay died in Oct. 1859 without having exercised the power of appointment reserved to her by the deed of the 30th July 1819. In March last the sum of 5845*l.* 5*s.* 3*d.* Bank Three per Cent. Annuities (the balance of the 5951*l.* 19*s.* 6*d.* like annuities, after providing for certain costs, charges and expenses payable thereout under an order made in the suit of Sandiman v. Mackenzie) was paid into court under the Trustees Relief Act. That was done in consequence of the question which had arisen as to the amount of succession duty payable in respect of the fund upon the death of Lady Ramsay. The Commissioners of Inland Revenue claimed the succession duty at the rate of 10 per cent., considering that Sir Thomas Ramsay was the person from whom the interest of Mrs. Batten in the trust-fund was derived; while the petitioners were advised that Lady Ramsay was the person from whom the interest of Mrs. Batten was derived, and that the duty was only 1 per cent. The petition prayed to the effect already stated, and that the proper directions might be given for the payment of the succession duty.

R. Palmer, Q.C. and G. O. Morgan appeared for the petitioners, and contended that Lady Ramsay was the "predecessor," for by her marriage with Sir Thomas Ramsay, by the settlement of her 6000*l.* then, and by the benefit which she had conferred on him when he released his power over the 10,000*l.* Lady

REG. v. BOYES.

[Q. B.]

Ramsay purchased the fund for the benefit of herself and her children by her former husband. They cited Price v. Hathaway, 6 Madd. 304; Attorney-General v. Baker, 4 Hurl. & N. 19; Roe v. Mitton, 2 Wils. 356; Newstead v. Searles, 1 Atk. 265; Dickenson v. Wright, 29 L. J. 150, Ex.; Re Jenkinson, 24 Beav. 64.

The Attorney-General (Sir R. Bethell, Q.C.) and Hanson appeared for the Commissioners of Inland Revenue, and contended that the arguments addressed to the court for the petitioners were merely "moral," and would, if allowed to prevail, lead to the wildest confusion. The original owner of the property was the true "predecessor" within the Act, and when Sir Thomas Ramsay agreed to settle the property of which the fund in question was a part, he was the original owner of it. But the agreement in this case to settle it did not alter that ownership; and the settlement or payment afterwards made, only carried out the agreement. Therefore Sir Thomas, and not Lady Ramsay, was the predecessor in this case.

R. Palmer, Q.C. in reply.

The MASTER of the ROLLS.—The question in this case is, what is the proper rate of succession duty payable under the provisions of the Succession Duty Act, the 16 & 17 Vict. c. 51, upon a sum of 5845*l.* 5*s.* 3*d.* Bank Annuities, now in court, and which the petitioners pray may be paid out to them? The petitioners are a Mr. and Mrs. Batten, and the trustees of their marriage-settlement. Mrs. Batten is the daughter of the late Lady Ramsay, and the fund in question forms part of a sum of 10,000*l.* which was invested in Consols, in pursuance of a covenant by Sir Thomas Ramsay to that effect in his marriage-settlement. The 5845*l.* 5*s.* 3*d.* Bank Annuities became, under the trusts of the settlement and on the death of Lady Ramsay, the property of Mrs. Batten; and the question is, whether Sir Thomas or Lady Ramsay is to be considered, as to these annuities, the "predecessor" within the 2nd section of the Succession Duties Act? If Sir Thomas Ramsay was the predecessor, the rate of duty would be 10 per cent.; but if Lady Ramsay was, then the rate of duty would be only 1 per cent. The second section of the Succession Duty Act is as follows:—[His Honour read the section as above stated, and continued.] The argument on behalf of the petitioners, who, of course, are the "successors" in this case, was, that the predecessor need not be the person to whom the fund actually belonged in the first instance, but the person who either pays the consideration which induces, or who may induce another party to create the fund. That was illustrated in this way: if a person buys a charge on the estate of another, the purchaser in reality creates the fund; he, therefore, is the predecessor, and not the person who for value received originally charged his estate with the amount which he afterwards sells. So here, it was contended that Lady Ramsay, by her marriage with Sir Thomas Ramsay, by her then settling 6000*l.*, and by the benefit she conferred on him when he released his power over the 10,000*l.*, purchased that fund for her children by her first husband. Lady Ramsay was the person who bought the property, who in reality created the fund. She, therefore, and not the person who originally advanced the 10,000*l.*, was the predecessor. Lady Ramsay, it was also said, by the payment of the 6000*l.* to the trustees of the settlement made on her marriage with Sir Thomas, and by the gift to him of a life-interest therein induced him to create a charge in favour of her children by a former marriage. She, therefore, by so creating the fund became the "predecessor" as to it. Jenkinson's case, which was cited in the argument, was different from the present. There the tenant for life made an arrangement with the tenant in tail in remainder, to enable the tenant for life to settle a certain sum of money; and I there held that the tenant for life was the "predecessor." I do not think that the circumstance here of the 6000*l.* having been paid by Lady Ramsay is material. The marriage was a sufficiently valuable consideration. The real question is, whether, if the owner of an estate marries, and then agrees to settle a sum of money upon the relations of his wife, she is, as to that money, to be considered the "predecessor" within the Act? It is to be observed that where a contract is made for a valuable consideration, by which property is to be settled, it does not belong to the person who induces the other to settle it, but remains in the possession of the owner, subject to the trusts of the settlement; and the word "settlor" is there equivalent to the word "predecessor." If that is not so, the result would be singular, for then the wife's property would be considered to belong to the husband, and the husband's to the wife. Here, in consideration of certain moneys paid by the wife, and of the marriage, the husband agreed to settle a certain sum of money upon the wife for life, and then upon the children of that marriage, and in default of such children, upon the children of the wife by a former husband. The ultimate destination of the fund cannot affect the question who is the "predecessor" as to it. If in this case the ultimate trust had been in favour of Sir Thomas's children by Lady Ramsay, there could have been no doubt but that he would have been the "predecessor." But instead of this, he and she agreed that the fund should be limited to the relations of the wife. That, however, cannot alter the rights of the parties. I think the effect of the statute upon charges on estates is, that if such a charge, created in consideration of a marriage, be settled, or if the estate itself be then settled, whatever the trusts of the settlement may be, the "predecessor" is the person to whom the property charged or settled belonged, and who made the settlement. I think that is the true view; and is so, without taking into consideration the motives which induced him to make the settlement. This qualification, however, and which is essential to the purpose, must be added, viz., that if the settlement gives to a person other than the settlor himself a power to dispose of the property settled—that is to say, if the settlement transfers the property settled to the donee of the power—the latter, when the power is exercised, is the disponent from whom the succession is derived, and was the "predecessor;" the successors in that case taking the property under the exercise of the power, and not under the trusts of the settlement. But here the petitioners take under the exercise of no power, but under the trusts of the settlement itself. The "predecessor," therefore, was in this case Sir Thomas, the settlor; and the duty must be 10 per cent. I do not consider it necessary to refer more particularly to the power in this case, because I have decided it without reference to the power. But in fact the power rather helps to confirm me in my view of this case; for if the power to appoint among the children had been exercised by Lady Ramsay, she would have been the predecessor; but as the petitioners take under the settlement, and not under the power, they take as strangers, and must pay the 10 per cent. If I had been compelled by the statute to give the commissioners the costs of the petition, I should have of course done so; but as that is not the case, I shall not give any costs to the Crown.

REG. v. BOYES.

Witness—Privilege on ground of tendency to criminate—Pardon—Liability to answer—Accomplice—Corroboration.

Q. B.]

REG. v. BOYES.

[Q. B.]

On the trial of an information against the deft., for bribery at a parliamentary election filed, by the Attorney-General, in pursuance of a resolution of the House of Commons, a person, alleged in the indictment to have been bribed, was called as a witness; he refused to answer any question, on the ground that the answer would tend to criminate him. A pardon under the Great Seal was then handed to the witness, but he still refused to answer, upon which the judge compelled him to answer, and on his evidence the deft. was convicted:

Held, that the pardon took away the privilege of the witness so far as any risk of prosecution at the suit of the Crown was concerned; and that, though the witness might still be liable to an impeachment by the House of Commons, notwithstanding the pardon, by reason of the 12 & 13 Will. 3, c. 2, yet that was so unlikely to happen that the witness could not be said to be in any real danger, and he was therefore rightly compelled to answer.

To entitle a witness to the privilege of not answering a question as tending to criminate him, the court must see, from the circumstances of the case and the nature of the evidence which the witness is called to give, that there is reasonable ground to apprehend danger to the witness from his being compelled to answer. If the fact of the witness being in danger be once made to appear, great latitude should be allowed to him in judging of the effect of any particular question. The danger to be apprehended must be real and appreciable, with reference to the ordinary operation of law, in the ordinary course of things, and not a danger of an imaginary character, having reference to some barely possible contingency.

Information filed by the Attorney-General against the deft. for bribery committed at the parliamentary election for the borough of Beverley, Yorkshire, in April 1859.

The information contained eight counts, each charging a distinct act of bribery to different voters. The third count, upon which alone a verdict of guilty was found, charged the deft. with having given a bribe to a voter named John Pougher.

The trial took place at the Yorkshire summer assizes 1860, before Martin, B., and the jury thought the evidence in support of all the other counts but the third insufficient. In support of the third count John Pougher, the voter bribed, was called as a witness, and the learned judge considered it to be his duty to tell him that he was not bound to answer, if by answering he would criminate himself. The witness declined to answer the questions. Upon that the Solicitor-General put his hands into a blue bag which was lying before him and produced a document, which he handed to the witness, and said, "There is your pardon." The man looked at it and said, "What have I done to deserve a pardon?" The learned judge, acting upon the authority of two cases which he had before him, considering that he was justified in so acting, said, "I still tell you, if you object to answer the questions, you need not do so." The Solicitor-General contended that he could compel him to answer. Martin, B. said, "I do not like to do that; it is a very serious responsibility, because if I tell him so to do and he refuses, I shall send him to goal; and to act in so summary a way seems to me very undesirable; I cannot, I do not think I ought to do it. I believe that he is not compellable to answer, but I will consult Wilde, B." Having consulted Wilde, B., Martin, B. said that he entertained likewise a strong doubt, but under the circumstances he recommended him, and he should adopt that view, to compel him to answer. "If I am wrong, it must be perfectly understood again by the Solicitor-General that the court is to set me right, and if I am wrong in compelling this man to answer, the prosecution ought to drop." Pougher then deposed that he went to a room in a house in the borough, where the other witnesses went each upon different times, and that there they saw newspapers and other things. The deft. was in the room conversing with them, and they went from thence into another room, where a man gave them, as runners or watchers, or officers of that kind, 1*l.*, in some cases 2*l.*, and it was stated that the 1*l.* was for the service for so many days, or the 2*l.* if they were required for more days. That was the species of bribery that was proved in these cases. It was contended by the deft.'s counsel, that there was no corroboration of the witness's evidence, and that he being in the nature of an accomplice, the learned judge ought to have directed the jury not to act upon his evidence alone, and to acquit the prisoner. In the summing up Martin, B. thus commented upon the evidence: "If that man's evidence was true, this was the very morning of the election, he went there and saw the deft.; he was desired to go into the room, and after saying, 'Now, my man, is that thou?' and 'I said, of course it was;' he goes into a room, heard a voice saying 'two.' That is followed up by the two sovereigns being put into his hands. He immediately gets into a cab and goes and polls for Walters. Now you must ask yourselves whether you believe that the two sovereigns were given to the man for his vote, and whether you believe the deft. was concerned in the matter, and whether it was done with his authority as part of a transaction in which he was engaged. Assume for the purpose of the present discussion that this man was speaking the truth. Is there any law which prohibits a jury from believing a man who (it must be assumed for the sake of the argument) spoke the truth simply because he is not corroborated? I know of none. I know of no rule of law myself, but there is a rule of practice which has become so hallowed as to be deserving of respect; I believe these are the very words of Lord Abinger, it deserves to have all the reverence of the law. This case is distinguishable from that cited by the counsel for the deft., for they were there accessories properly so called, and all the persons were concerned in the same offence in which they came to give evidence against this man. In this particular case it is not so, because all of these cases are separately gone into, and it is not one and the same offence; and if you think that all these witnesses have spoken the truth, then it is clear that each case is clear and separate; each person giving money is a distinct offence. I have endeavoured as far as I can to explain to you these matters that have occurred in this case. I own I think also that that is a very important point, and that it may be very doubtful whether or not the evidence in this case will be found to be of that corroborative character which the law requires."

The only witnesses called were the voters alleged to have been bribed, each of whom deposed to a separate act of bribery under similar circumstances and about the same time. The same course was pursued as to each of these witnesses in respect to their pardon, and being compelled to answer as in John Pougher's case. It was then arranged that, if the two points or either of them should be disposed of in favour of the deft., a nolle prosequi was to be entered, and that for the purpose of disposing of these points the Court of Q. B. should be in the same position as the judge, and consider whether the judge ought to have told the jury to acquit. The jury returned a verdict of guilty on the third count only.

Nov. 13.—Edward James (Price and T. Jones with him) moved for a new trial on the ground, first, that the judge was wrong in compelling the witness Pougher to answer and in receiving the answers so obtained; secondly, that there was no corroborative evidence of Pougher's testimony. Suppose the judge was wrong in compelling the witness to answer, and in receiving the answers so obtained.

HILL, J.—Is it a question of improperly admitting evidence? The evidence is proper; the evidence is admissible according to all the rules of law; but there is a privilege in the witness (it may or may not be so) which only appertains to him and does not appertain to the party. Suppose that the witness was perfectly willing, the party could not object, and say, "You are not to answer because you will criminate yourself." He might say, "No; the interests of truth and justice are paramount, and I will give the evidence." The judge might say, "No; I will not allow you that privilege." That is something about which the witness can complain, but the party cannot. The question has arisen in a case where an attorney is asked to disclose that which his professional duty would prevent his disclosing. He is willing to waive it, and the client is willing to waive it. The party in the suit cannot interpose and say he will not have it.

JAMES.—This is a case peculiar in its circumstances. The learned judge, if it had not been thoroughly consented to by the Crown that the deft. was to have the benefit, although there may have been no case in point on this doubtful question, would not have compelled the witness to answer the questions, and the deft. could not have been convicted. In Rex v. Reading, 7 St. Tr. 296, it was held that the witness was privileged from answering questions respecting the commission of an offence, although he had received a pardon. And by the 12 & 13 Will. 3, c. 2, it is provided that no pardon under the Great Seal shall be pleadable to an impeachment by the Commons in Parliament. In this case the prosecution was instituted in pursuance of a resolution of the House of Commons. Secondly, there was no corroborative evidence of Pougher's testimony, and the judge ought to have directed the jury not to act upon it. There exists a course of practice in the administration of the criminal law of this country, that a man cannot be found guilty on the simple evidence of an accessory, and it is put upon the principle that if you allow a man who comes forward and states he is guilty of a crime to give evidence against another, you enable a guilty person to come forward and charge an innocent person, and upon his simple statement to convict him. A practice has arisen and been in force for a considerable time, that a man cannot be convicted upon the evidence of an accessory, except there is some corroboration of it. In this case there was no corroboration of any of the witnesses within the true spirit of this rule. At the trial the judge should have adopted the ordinary course, and have told or directed the jury that, as there was no corroborative evidence, they ought not to act upon the evidence of the witness.

COCKBURN, C.J.—If he told them the practice was generally not to act on the evidence of an accomplice without being confirmed, but if the evidence made out to their minds that he was speaking the truth, they ought to believe him. I think his direction was right. I protest against its being the duty of the judge to direct the jury to acquit because the evidence of an accomplice is uncorroborated.

WIGHTMAN, J.—The law does not of necessity require any corroboration.

JAMES.—The subject is discussed in 1 Phillips on Evidence, and the various cases commented upon, and at page 101 it is said: "On a review of the cases above cited, the result that may be deduced from them seems to be, that, on the trial of a prisoner against whom an accomplice appears as a witness, there should be (in order to warrant a judge in advising a jury to give credit to such a witness, and to warrant the jury in convicting) some confirmatory evidence that is proof independent of the evidence of the accomplice, from which it may be reasonably inferred that the prisoner was concerned with the accomplice in the commission of the crime."

COCKBURN, C.J.—It is stated very well in Taylor on Evidence, 796: "The degree of credit which ought to be given to the testimony of an accomplice is a matter exclusively within the province of the jury. It has sometimes been said they ought not to believe him unless his evidence is corroborated by other evidence, and without doubt great caution in weighing such testimony is dictated by prudence and reason. But no positive rule of law exists upon the subject, and the jury may, if they please, act upon the evidence of an accomplice, even in a capital case, without any confirmation of his statement. It is true that judges in their discretion will advise a jury not to convict a prisoner upon the testimony of an accomplice alone, and without corroboration, and the practice of giving such advice is now so general that its omission would be deemed a neglect of duty on the part of the judge. Considering too the respect which is always paid by the jury to this advice from the bench, it may be regarded as the settled course of practice not to convict a prisoner, except under very special circumstances, upon the sole and uncorroborated testimony of an accomplice. The judges do not, in such cases, withdraw the cause from the jury by positive directions to acquit, but only advise them not to give credit to the testimony." I think that is a fair exposition of what the present practice is. We think that he ought not to have told the jury to acquit if the witness was uncorroborated.

The COURT, after consulting Martin, B., granted a rule nisi on both grounds.

The Solicitor-General (Sir W. Atherton), Monk and Cleasby showed cause against the rule, and Edward James, Price and T. Jones supported it (Feb. 12 and 13, 1861, at the sittings after Hilary Term). The Court discharged the rule so far as related to the want of corroboration of the witness Pougher, and directed that the other point should be argued in the following Easter Term by one counsel on each side.

CROMPTON, J.—This rule was moved for on one ground that there was no corroboration of the witness Pougher. It may be a question whether Pougher was an accomplice of the deft.'s; but, treating him as an accomplice, the question is, was the judge warranted in the direction he gave to the jury? The law is laid down correctly in Reg. v. Stubbs, 1 Dears. C. C. 555, by Jervis, C.J.: "It is not a rule of law that an accomplice must be confirmed in order to render a conviction valid, and it is the duty of the judge to tell the jury that they may, if they please, act on the unconfirmed testimony of an accomplice. It is a rule of practice, and that only, and it is usual in practice, for the judge to advise the jury not to convict on the testimony of an accomplice alone, and juries generally attend to the direction of the judge, and require confirmation." To my mind, there was fully sufficient corroboration to warrant the verdict of the jury. It is not necessary that the corroboration should be as to the very facts stated by the witness. What corroboration is sufficient may depend on a variety of circumstances.

The rest of the Court concurred.

April 25.—Cleasby, for the Crown, argued the point reserved against the rule, and Edward James supported the rule.

TOWNSEND v. READ.

[C. B.]

COCKBURN, C. J.—This case comes before us under peculiar circumstances. On the trial of the deft. on an information by the Attorney-General for bribery, a witness who was called to prove the fact of his having received a bribe from the deft., objected to give evidence, on the ground that the effect of the evidence he was called upon to give would be to criminate himself. Thereupon the counsel for the Crown handed in a pardon under the Great Seal to the witness, who accepted it. The witness, however, still objected to give evidence, and the learned judge who presided at the trial, entertaining a doubt as to whether the witness could be properly compelled to answer, notwithstanding the pardon, an arrangement was come to between the counsel on both sides, with the sanction of the judge, that the witness should be directed to answer, but that the opinion of this court should be taken as to whether the privilege of the witness remained, notwithstanding the pardon, the counsel for the Crown undertaking, in the event of the court holding in the affirmative, to enter a nolle prosequi if the deft. should be convicted. We think it necessary to protest against a repetition on any future occasion of a proceeding which we believe to be wholly unprecedented, it appearing to us inconvenient and unbecoming that this court should be called upon to pronounce a judgment which it is without authority to enforce. It is perhaps to be regretted that under such circumstances a rule nisi should have been granted. Probably, had the rule nisi for a new trial been moved for on this ground alone, we should have refused the rule; but the rule having been moved for on other grounds as well as on this, it was somewhat providently allowed on this ground also. Now, however, the matter having been discussed on a rule granted by us, we think it best to pronounce our opinion on the point submitted to us, but we are anxious to protect ourselves against the present proceeding being drawn into a precedent or adopted on any future occasion. Upon the first argument we held that the pardon took away the privilege of the witness, so far as regarded any risk of prosecution at the suit of the Crown; but it was objected that a pardon was no protection against an impeachment by the Commons in Parliament, and on this point the case was argued before us in the last term. The question on which our opinion is now required is, whether the enactment of the third section of the Act of Settlement, the 12 & 13 Will. 3, c. 2, "that no pardon under the Great Seal shall be pleadable to an impeachment by the Commons in Parliament," is a sufficient reason for holding that the privilege of the witness still existed in this case, on the ground that the witness, though protected by the pardon against every other form of prosecution, might possibly be subject to parliamentary impeachment. In support of this proposition it was urged on behalf of the deft. that bribery at the election of members to serve in Parliament being a matter in which the House of Commons would be likely to take a peculiar interest, as immediately affecting its own privileges, it was not impossible that if other remedies proved ineffectual, proceedings by impeachment might be resorted to. It was also contended that a bare possibility of legal peril was sufficient to entitle a witness to protection; nay, further, that the witness was the sole judge as to whether his evidence would bring him into danger of the law, and that the statement of his belief to that effect, if not manifestly made mala fide, would be received as conclusive. With the latter of these propositions we are altogether unable to concur. Upon review of the authorities, we are clearly of opinion that the view of the law propounded by Lord Wensleydale in Osborne v. The London Dock Company, 10 Ex. 701, and acted upon by Sturt, V.C. in Sidebottom v. Adkins, 3 Jur. N.S. 631 is the correct one, and that to entitle a party called as a witness to the privilege of silence, the court must see, from the circumstances of the case and the nature of the evidence which the witness is called to give, that there is reasonable ground to apprehend danger to the witness from his being compelled to answer. Indeed, we quite agree that if the fact of the witness being in danger be once made to appear, great latitude should be allowed to him in judging for himself of the effect of any particular question, there being no doubt, as observed by Alderson, B. in Osborne v. The London Dock Company, that a question which might appear at first sight a very innocent one, might, by affording a link in a chain of evidence, become the means of bringing home an offence to the party answering. Subject to this reservation, a judge is, in our opinion, bound to insist on a witness answering, unless he is satisfied that the answer will tend to put the witness in peril. Further than this, we are of opinion that the danger to be apprehended must be real and appreciable with reference to the ordinary operation of law in the ordinary course of things, not a danger of an imaginary and unsubstantial character, having reference to some extraordinary and barely possible contingency, so improbable that no reasonable man would suffer it to influence his conduct. We think that a merely remote and naked possibility out of the ordinary course of the law, and such as no reasonable man would be affected by, should not be suffered to obstruct the administration of justice. The object of the law is to afford to a party called upon to give evidence in a proceeding inter alios, protection against being brought by means of his own evidence within the penalties of the law. But it would be to convert a salutary protection into a means of abuse if it were to be held that a mere imaginary possibility of danger, however remote and improbable, was sufficient to justify the withholding of evidence essential to the ends of justice. Now, in the present case, no one seriously supposes that the witness runs the slightest risk of an impeachment by the House of Commons. No instance of such a proceeding in the, unhappily, too numerous cases of bribery which have engaged the attention of the House of Commons has ever occurred, or, so far as we are aware, has ever been thought of. To suppose that such a proceeding would be applied to the case of this witness would be simply ridiculous, more especially as the proceeding by information was undertaken by the Attorney-General by the direction of the House itself, and it would therefore be contrary to all justice to treat the pardon provided in the interest of the prosecution to insure the evidence of the witness as a nullity, and to subject him to a proceeding by impeachment. It appears to us, therefore, that the witness in this case was not in a rational point of view in any the slightest real danger from the evidence he was called upon to give when protected by the pardon from all ordinary legal proceedings, and that it was therefore the duty of the presiding judge to compel him to answer. It follows that, in our opinion, the law officers of the Crown are not bound to enter a nolle prosequi in favour of the deft. Rule discharged.

Surveyor's accounts—Allowance of law expenses by justices sitting at special sessions—5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 50, s. 111.

By sect. 111 of 5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 50, it is enacted that if the inhabitants of any parish shall agree at a vestry to defend any indictment, &c., or to defend any appeal, it shall and may be lawful for the sur-surveyor of such parish to charge in his account the reasonable expenses incurred in defending such appeal after the same shall have been agreed to by such inhabitants at a vestry "and" allowed by two justices of the peace within the division where such highway shall be, which expenses, when so agreed to "or" allowed, shall be paid, &c. :

Held, that when such expenses had been agreed to by the inhabitants at a vestry, it was not necessary, under sect. 111, that they should also be allowed by two justices, and that the word "and" before "allowed" in the early part of the section should be read "or."

This was a case stated by the justices of Wilts, which was sent back by an order of this court, made on May 11th (vide 4 L. T. Rep. N. S. 447), to be amended.

Case, as originally stated for the opinion of the court :—

The resp. had been for many years past appointed, under 5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 50, as a salaried surveyor of highways for the parish of Swindon, in the county of Wilts.

On the 25th March 1859 the resp. was, by the inhabitants of the said parish, again elected, and he was duly appointed as such surveyor. On the 29th March 1860 the resp., as such surveyor, made up and signed his accounts for the past year, and laid them before the parishioners in vestry assembled; and afterwards, on the same day, it being a special sessions for the purposes of the highways for the petty division of Swindon, in which the said parish of Swindon is situate, the said resp. laid the same accounts before us; and thereat, at the time of the verification of such accounts, the app., being a person chargeable to the highway of the said parish, made his complaint to us against the surveyor, and we heard such complaint, and we examined the resp. upon oath, and such complaint on the said special session was by us adjourned from time to time unto this day.

The app. objected to sundry items in the resp.'s account, and amongst them were the sums of 15*l.* and 105*l.* 12*s.* 2*d.* We, acting under 5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 50, s. 44, heard the complaint of the app., and examined the resp. on oath. Upon such examination we disallowed the said sum of 15*l.*, but as regarded the sum of 105*l.* 12*s.* 2*d.*, it appeared to have been incurred by the resp., as such surveyor, in law proceedings under sanction of the inhabitants of the parish of Swindon in vestry assembled; and the bill of the solicitor for the resp., by which the said sum of 105*l.* 12*s.* 2*d.* was incurred, was duly taxed by the clerk of the peace of the county of Wilts at that sum. The app. contended before us, that under 5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 50, s. 111, the resp. was only entitled to have charged that sum of 105*l.* 12*s.* 2*d.* in his account, after the same should have been agreed to by the inhabitants at vestry, and allowed by two justices of the peace within the division. We, having duly considered the whole of the circumstances, saw no reason for disallowing that sum, and we made no order respecting it. The accounts were verified and signed, and we signed at the foot of such account the following verification:—"The within and foregoing account was verified before the Rev. Giles Daubeney, clerk, and John Samuel Willes Johnson, Esq., two of her Majesty's justices of the peace for the county of Wilts, at a special sessions for the highways in and for the division of Swindon, at Swindon in the said county, holden on the 29th day of March last, and thence continued by adjournment from time to time until this day. And we, the said above-mentioned justices, present at the special sessions, and also the same and majority of justices now present at the adjournment thereof, and complaint having been then and now at the time of such verification made to us by James Coplestone Townsend, an inhabitant of Swindon, against such account, and having heard such complaint and examined William Read the surveyor on oath, and having taken the whole of such complaint and objections to such account made by the said James Coplestone Townsend, to order that the sum of 15*l.* for law expenses of Henry Kinneir, a solicitor, as per bill, be disallowed, and be struck out of such account, leaving a balance of 107*l.* 13*s.* 2*d.* due to the said surveyor. Dated 24th May 1860." The app. contended that we were wrong in point of law, inasmuch that the said sum of 105*l.* 12*s.* 2*d.* having been objected to by him as an illegal payment made by the resp. out of the highway-rates of the parish as such surveyor, we should upon the verification of such accounts have made an order that that specific sum should have been allowed, as the app. alleged that he might then have claimed a right of appeal against such allowance, as an order made by justices. Whereupon the app. asks the opinion of the Court of C. P.: First, whether under the circumstances stated, the sum of 105*l.* 12*s.* 2*d.* ought to have been allowed or disallowed by us; secondly, whether (if the court should be of opinion that the sum of 105*l.* 12*s.* 2*d.* ought to have been allowed) the aforesaid verification of such surveyor's account by us made is a good and sufficient order and allowance for that purpose.

We, the undersigned, two justices of the county of Wilts, and who granted a case on the 24th May 1860 for the opinion of this court, made on the 11th day of May now instant, ordered to be remitted to us to be amended, by stating, first, the nature of the law proceedings for which the sum objected to was incurred; secondly, the objections taken by the app. As to the first point, we state as to the nature of the law proceedings: It appears to us that the whole of such bill of costs was incurred in respect of proceedings arising out of matters of appeal to the quarter sessions of Wilts, made by Messrs. Barnes, Freeman and Woolford, inhabitants of the parish of Swindon, consequent on their having been assessed to a highway-rate of the parish of Swindon, dated the 9th day of June 1858; and the charges are arranged in such bill under separate headings therein; and, as to one part thereof, they appear to commence with the first item of the date of the 30th Oct. 1858, as the resp.'s costs of appeal from the quarter sessions against a highway rate, such appeal appearing to have been on a case stated from the quarter sessions for the Court of Q. B.; other parts of the bill appear to relate as to costs of appeal by Messrs. Freeman, Woolford and Barnes, to quarter sessions of Wilts; and the remaining portion of the bill "as to proceedings taken before justices in petty sessions at Swindon, and as to enforcing the payment of costs in the above appeals." We also state that, as in the said case, it was found a by us that the sum of 105*l.* 12*s.* 2*d.* appeared to have been incurred by the resp. as such surveyor in law proceedings, under the sanction of the inhabitants of the parish of Swindon, which was and is referred to:—"Parish of Swindon.—Notice is hereby given, that a vestry will be held in the vestry-room of this parish on Thursday, the 23rd day of Sept. inst., at ten o'clock in the forenoon, for the purpose of taking into consideration the notices of appeal against the highway-rate given by William Amos Barnes, Henry Edwards Freeman and William Woolford, and the steps which should be taken thereon. Dated this 18th day of Sept. 1858. James Wise, overseer. (Signed) William Read, surveyor." In pursuance of such notice a vestry was held in the vestry-room of this parish on Thursday, the 23d Sept. 1858. It was proposed by Mr. George Reynolds, seconded by Mr. Charles Hurt, and carried unanimously—"That the appeals by William Amos Barnes, Henry Edwards Freeman and William Woolford, against the rate made for the repairs of the highways of this parish, bearing date the 9th day of June now last past, which appeals were entered at the general quarter sessions of the peace of our Lady the Queen, held at Warminster on Tuesday, the 29th day of June last, at which sessions it was ordered that the hearing and determination of the said appeals be adjourned until the next general quarter sessions of the peace to be holden in and for the county of Wilts, be defended by the parish." N.B. Mr. Townsend, being professionally concerned for the apps., declined to take any part in the above resolution. Proposed by Mr. J. C. Townsend, seconded by Mr. Hurt, and unanimously carried—"That Mr. Henry Kinneir, solicitor, be instructed by Mr. Read, the surveyor of the highways, to conduct the defence of the appeals mentioned in the last resolution." We also state that it appeared to us that a vestry of the inhabitants of the said parish of Swindon was held on the 29th March 1860, for the purpose of passing the accounts for the past year of the surveyor of the said parish of Swindon, under the 5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 50; and previously to such accounts being made up, balanced and laid before the vestry to be examined and allowed, such bill of 105*l.* 12*s.* 2*d.* was inserted by the surveyor in his account; and at such vestry it was paid by the resp., as such surveyor, to Mr. Henry Kinneir, his solicitor, to whom the bill was due, and at such vestry the surveyor's accounts were produced, examined and allowed. [The case, after stating some facts as to the taxation of the bill, continued.] We also state that we found that the costs incurred in the said bill had been incurred after the inhabitants of the parish had agreed to defend such appeals against the highway-rate, as appears by the extracts of the minutes in the vestry books, which we have above set forth. We also state that such bill of costs did not appear to us to have been allowed by two justices, previous to the same having been charged in the surveyor's account when laid before the vestry and paid by the surveyor. As to the second point, we state the objections taken by the app. to be as follows:—"First, that the said resp. had charged in his account a bill of costs or law expenses, amounting to the sum of 105*l.* 12*s.* 2*d.*, incurred in or about defending certain appeals against the highway-rates for the parish of Swindon, at a vestry convened for the purpose of considering the same, as required by the 111th section of 5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 50. Secondly, that the said resp. had charged in his account such bill of costs or expenses before the same had been allowed by two justices of the peace, as required by the same section of the said Act." The third objection referred to the taxation of the bill of costs, but as nothing turned upon it, it is unnecessary to insert it.

Phipson, for the resp., cited Reg. v. The Justices of the West Riding of Yorkshire, 1 Q. B. 624; Reg. v. Justices of Leicestershire, 8 E. & B. 557, and contended that the allowance by the justices sitting in petty sessions, under sect. 44 was a sufficient allowance by two justices under sect. 111.

Martin, for the app., cited Reg. v. Goodenough, 2 A. & E. 463, and contended that, by the 111th section, it was necessary that the expenses should be allowed by the vestry and also by two justices, before they could be charged in the surveyor's account, and that the account should afterwards be laid before the justices sitting in petty sessions under sect. 44.

Cur. adv. vult.

July 8.—WILLIAMS, J. now delivered the judgment of the court.—Upon the argument of this case before my brothers Willes, Byles and myself, only one point was submitted for our consideration, namely, whether the justices sitting in petty sessions ought to have disallowed the item in the surveyor's account of 105*l.* 12*s.* 2*d.*, with respect to law expenses. The question turns upon the 111th section of the General Highway Act, 5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 50, by which it is enacted that: "If the inhabitants of any parish shall agree at a vestry to defend any indictment found against any such parish, or to appeal against any order made by or proceeding of any justice of the peace in the execution of any powers given by this Act, or to defend any appeal, it shall and may be lawful for the surveyor of such parish to charge in his account the reasonable expenses incurred in defending such prosecution, or prosecuting or defending such appeal after the same shall have been agreed to by such inhabitants at a vestry or public meeting as aforesaid, and allowed by two justices of the peace within the division where such highway shall be, which expenses, when so agreed to or allowed shall be paid by such parish out of the fines, forfeitures, payments and rates, authorised to be collected and raised by virtue of this Act; provided, nevertheless, that if the money so collected and raised is not sufficient to defray the expenses of repairing the highways in the said parish, as well as of defending such prosecution, or prosecuting or defending such appeal as aforesaid, the said surveyor is hereby authorised to make, collect and levy an additional rate in the same manner as the rate by this Act is authorised to be made for the repair of the highway." The app.'s contention before us was, that by reason of this enactment the surveyor could not charge his law expenses in his account until after the same had been agreed to by the inhabitants in vestry, and been allowed by two justices of the peace. It was urged in the argument that in the Act it is said that the surveyor may charge his expenses in the account after they have been agreed to at vestry, and allowed by two justices of the peace, and afterwards it proceeds to enact that the expenses, when so agreed to or allowed, shall be paid by such parish, &c., and it was suggested that the word "or" was plainly put by mistake for "and." In our opinion, the inaccuracy is rather in putting "and" for "or" in the earlier part of the section. We are led to this conclusion, not only by considering this construction the more reasonable, but also by referring to the language of the 65th section of 13 Geo. 3, c. 78 (the earlier General Highway Act), for which the present section is substituted, and which is in these words:—"And be it further enacted, that if the inhabitants of any parish, township, or place, shall agree at a vestry or public meeting to prosecute any person by indictment for not repairing any highway within such parish, township, or place, which they apprehend such person was obliged by law to repair, or for committing any nuisance upon any highways, or shall agree at such vestry meeting to defend any indictment or presentment preferred against any such parish, township, or place, it shall and may be lawful for the surveyor of such parish, township, or place, to charge in his account the reasonable expenses incurred in carrying on or defending such respective prosecutions, after the same shall have been agreed to by such inhabitants at a vestry or public meeting, or allowed by a justice of the peace within the limit where such highway shall be; which expenses, when so agreed to or allowed, shall be paid by such parish, township, or place out of the fines, forfeitures, compositions, payments and assessments authorised to be collected and raised by virtue of this Act." In the case before us, therefore, we think the surveyor was entitled to charge the expenses in question after they had been either agreed to at vestry, or allowed by two justices; and we further think it appears to have been sufficiently agreed to at vestry, having regard to what is stated in the case, to have been incurred at the vestry held on the 29th March 1860; consequently we are of opinion, upon this ground, that the sum in question was properly allowed in the surveyor's account. Therefore it becomes unnecessary to consider whether the resp. was also right in contending that the allowance by the justices was a sufficient allowance by two justices within the meaning of the 111th section.

Judgment for the resp.

COURT OF ARCHES.

Saturday, Nov. 2.

(Before Dr. LUSHINGTON.)

The office of Judge promoted by BURDER v. HEATH.

Articles of religion—Repugnant doctrines—Obligations of the clergy.

The obligations of the clergy are twofold: first, to declare assent and consent to the Book of Common Prayer; second, to subscribe the Thirty-nine Articles of Religion.

The court will not take into consideration the internal convictions or animus with which the Articles are subscribed; it will only examine the doctrines impeached, and see if they violate the plain grammatical intent and meaning of the Book of Common Prayer or the Articles of Religion.

The construction which the court will put upon those documents is a judicial construction.

If the Article admits of several meanings, without any violation of the ordinary rules of construction or the plain grammatical sense, the court will hold that such opinion might be lawfully avowed and maintained.

If the doctrine in question had been held without offence by eminent divines of the Church, then, though it might be difficult to be reconciled with the plain meaning of the Articles, blame will not be imputed to those who hold it.

This court will not question doctrines that have been allowed or tolerated in the Church.

In construing sermons, the court will not be bound by the strict rules which are applied to the construction of the Articles and Book of Common Prayer, but it will allow of a greater latitude of interpretation, and will permit it to be shown that the preacher did not intend to contravene the statute of Elizabeth, or to promulgate doctrines inconsistent with the Book of Common Prayer.

The court will not for this purpose assume that anything was done or intended to be done by the authority of the Legislature or of the Church, which it did not find within the four corners of the Articles and the Book of Common Prayer; and, on the other hand, it will not assume that anything therein found was not intended to have its full effect and operation.

There are many matters of doctrine dehors both the Articles and the Book of Common Prayer, as to which entire freedom of opinion is allowed. But it is settled law, admitting of no discussion, that the Articles and the Book of Common Prayer must be taken by all who have subscribed them to contain the doctrines of the Church of England, and that these are, so far as there set forth, accordant with Scripture.

In the construction of the statute 13 Eliz. the word "advisedly" means "deliberately," as contrasted with "inadvertently," or "intentionally," that is to say, with an express and avowed purpose.

The intention will be gathered from examination of the acts complained of.

What doctrines are held to be in contravention of the Articles and Book of Common Prayer.

The statute leaves a locus penitentiae to the deft., who may retract before sentence passed.

This case was argued in June last, and his Lordship took time to consider his decision. The questions involved in it, and the form in which they were raised, are fully stated in the judgment.

Dr. LUSHINGTON said:—Early in the year 1860 a suit was instituted in this court by the direction of the Bishop of Winchester, against the Rev. D. L. Heath, a clergyman beneficed in that diocese. The object of that suit was to prefer certain charges against Mr. Heath for having printed and published several sermons, called "Sermons on Important Subjects," parts of which were alleged to contain doctrines repugnant to the Articles of Religion, in violation of the statute of Elizabeth and in derogation of the Book of Common Prayer. I must presently enter minutely into the consideration of the articles which contain these charges, but this general description will suffice for my immediate purpose—namely, to make some general observations as to the principles which I believe ought to guide the court in the consideration and decision of cases of this description. The court is fully aware of the deep responsibility which attaches to it in the exercise of this jurisdiction. Questions may arise most important to the Established Church. The abstruse nature of the subject-matter itself, the doctrines of the Church of England, may necessarily introduce considerations of great difficulty. A miscarriage by this court, even if corrected by the court above, would be a serious evil. Again, in weighing the importance of such cases, the court must never forget that the character and interests of the party proceeded against are most deeply involved. It may be meet, in the first instance, briefly to recapitulate the obligations which the clergy of the United Church are by law to undertake. They are twofold: they must declare their assent and consent to the Book of Common Prayer, and they must subscribe the Thirty-nine Articles of Religion. In the course of the argument addressed to the court on the part of Mr. Heath much was said as to the animus with which a subscription to the Articles might be made, and the authority of Dr. Paley was cited upon this subject. I disclaim entering into any examination of this argument, for I think that it does not belong to the court to discuss it. I have nothing to do with the internal convictions of any persons subscribing the Articles; neither I nor any other court can know what are the opinions of individuals when they affix their subscriptions—that is a matter to be governed by their own consciences. It may be quite right and fitting that learned divines should discuss the limits within which a person can conscientiously subscribe, but these are not questions for a court of justice. Disquisitions on this subject afford no assistance to the court, and I cannot consent to import into this case or any other similar case the words of learned divines so far as they relate to the quo animo with which the subscription may be affixed. The province of a court of justice, when compelled to perform the duty, is to examine the doctrines impeached, and to see that they do not violate the plain intent and meaning of the Book of Common Prayer or the Articles of Religion. I cannot disguise from myself that in discharging the duty now imposed on me there are difficulties which are not to be found in the ordinary course of justice. Such cases as the present are of very rare occurrence, and though the general principles which ought to guide the court may to a certain extent be extracted from the few preceding cases, yet there are not, and there cannot be, any institutional writers to whose authority, as in ordinary legal questions, the court could with confidence appeal; nor are there any decided cases as to the actual construction which ought to be put upon the Articles. True it is that there are a multitude of the most learned works by the most eminent divines as to the meaning of those Articles. But the court cannot venture to make much use of such assistance, and for this reason, that such works naturally and properly constantly refer to the Holy Scriptures. The court, however, ought not to venture into so wide a field of investigation, except so far as may be absolutely necessary to the discharge of its proper duty—viz., the ascertainment of the plain grammatical meaning of the Book of Common Prayer and the Articles. The construction which the court must put upon the Book of Common Prayer and the Articles is a judicial construction. I should not presume to adopt any authority, however high, even though in my own most fallible opinion supported by scriptural quotations, unless such authority concurred with the plain grammatical meaning. With great anxiety, then, I have sought to ascertain what are the principles which should govern the court and guide its judgment in all cases in which charges of false doctrine are preferred, or similar questions demand solution. It is a satisfaction to my mind that the principles generally applicable to all this class of cases have to a very considerable extent been enunciated by the court of the highest authority in these matters—I refer to the decision of the Privy Council in the Gorham case. The judgment therein delivered, being a decision of the Superior Court, is legally binding on me, so far as it declares principles applicable to the trial of the present cause. It is true that I was one of the judges in that memorable case; but the judgment stands upon the authority of Lord Langdale, Lord Campbell, Lord Wensleydale, and Lord Kingsdown, approved by the two Archbishops of the realm. I think that the leading principles there laid down stand also, and most firmly stand, upon the stable basis of sound reason and justice. These principles must govern the present case, and would do so even if the particular decision had been erroneous. In the Gorham case the proceedings were civil and concerned only civil rights, but the rule of construction of the Articles of Religion, the Book of Common Prayer, and the doctrines impugned, must be equally applicable to the present proceeding. In both cases there is the same issue, at least substantially; in both cases the question is, whether the doctrines impugned be or be not contrary and repugnant to the Articles of Religion and the Book of Common Prayer. The following passage occurs in Mr. Moore's report of the judgment of Lord Langdale in the Gorham case, p. 462:—"This question must be decided by the Articles and the Liturgy, and we must apply to the construction of those books the same rules which have been long established, and are by law applicable to the construction of all written instruments. We must endeavour to attain for ourselves the true meaning of the language employed, assisted only by the consideration of such external or historical facts as we may find necessary to enable us to understand the subject-matter to which the instruments relate, and the meaning of the words employed. In our endeavour to ascertain the true meaning and effect of the articles, formularies and rubrics, we must by no means intentionally swerve from the old established rules of construction, or depart from the principles which have received the sanction and approbation of the most learned persons in times past, as being, on the whole, the best calculated to determine the true meaning of the documents to be examined. If these principles were not adhered to, all the rights, both spiritual and temporal, of her Majesty's subjects would be endangered." These were the principles by which he purposed to abide, remembering, however, that this was a criminal proceeding, that the offence charged must be clearly proved, and that if doubt existed the accused was entitled to the benefit of it. His Lordship then stated the various steps which had been taken in the suit since its commencement in 1860, and added that the case was fully argued towards the end of last June. He was always, he continued, most anxious to avoid unnecessary delay in the adjudication of the causes in the courts in which he had the honour to preside, but a press of business always prevailed at that period of the year, and the subject-matter of this suit was in itself so important and so difficult, the possible consequences of error so serious, not only to Mr. Heath personally, but also it might be to the interests of the Church, that he deemed it his duty to take such time for deliberation as he could only appropriate to the task during the long vacation. In considering how the principles laid down by the Privy Council were applicable to this case, he apprehended that the course to be followed was, first, to endeavour to ascertain the plain grammatical sense of the Article of Religion said to be contravened, and if that Article admitted of several meanings without any violation of the ordinary rules of construction or the plain grammatical sense, then the court ought to hold that any such opinion might be lawfully avowed and maintained. If, indeed, any controversy arose whether any given meaning was within the plain grammatical construction, the court must form the best judgment it could, with this assistance—that, if the doctrine in question had been held without offence by eminent divines of the Church, then, though, perhaps, difficult to be reconciled with the plain meaning of the Articles of Religion, still a judge in his position ought not to impute blame to those who held it. That which had been allowed or tolerated in the Church ought not to be questioned by that court. In construing Mr. Heath's sermons, however, the court was not absolutely bound down by the same strict rules which applied to the construction of the Articles or the Book of Common Prayer, and therefore it might be that a greater latitude of interpretation should be allowed, and the fullest possible means should be permitted for showing that Mr. Heath did not intend to contravene the statute of Elizabeth or promulgate doctrines inconsistent with the Book of Common Prayer. This was the course he was bound to follow, but there were also things to be avoided. The court must never assume for the purposes of this case that anything was done, or intended to be done, by the authority of the Legislature or of the Church of England, which it did not find within the four corners of the Articles of Religion and the Book of Common Prayer; and, on the other hand, it must never assume that anything therein found was not intended to have its full effect and operation. It was contrary to all probability, as well as irreconcilable with the ordinary rules of construction in so solemn a proceeding as the establishment of the Articles of Religion or Book of Common Prayer, to presume that anything was inserted to be inoperative or rejected. For caution's sake, he would say that he fully recognised the position of the Judicial Committee, that there were many matters of doctrine dehors both the Articles of Religion and the Book of Common Prayer, as to which entire freedom of opinion was allowed. It must, however, be assumed as a matter admitting of no doubt, and respecting which the court could hear no discussion, that the Thirty-nine Articles and the Book of Common Prayer being established by the highest authority in this realm, must be taken by all who subscribed thereto to contain the doctrines of the Church of England, and, so far as therein set forth, to be accordant to Scripture; these were nearly the words which were used in the Bath case, and to which he adhered. His Lordship then read the terms of the 13th Elizabeth, and the construction which he had put upon the word "advisedly" in that statute giving judgment in the Bath case. One meaning of the word was "deliberately," as contrasted with inadvertently. Another meaning was "intentionally," with an express and avowed purpose. But there was great difficulty in putting the second construction on the word, for it was hardly possible that a clergyman who had signed the Articles would preach or publish anything with the avowed intention of contradicting them. The question of intention was of the last importance, but the court could only arrive at a conclusion upon that question by an examination of the acts complained of; for in all the transactions of life a man must be judged by the consequences of his acts, and he must be taken to intend that which was the effect of what he had deliberately done. He must apply these same principles to the present case, and hold that the printing and publishing a set of sermons was an act done "advisedly." With these observations he proceeded to examine each of the four accusing articles. The sixth article alleged that certain passages in Mr. Heath's sermons contained doctrines contrary and repugnant to the eleventh Article of Religion. He must compare the passages with that Article. He felt this to be an arduous duty, and he should take especial care not to travel beyond the necessity which the law imposed upon him; but he must, in some part of this judgment, to a certain and limited extent, express a judicial construction of the eleventh Article; for how could he compare the passages in the sermons without so doing? The judicial construction was the plain grammatical sense of the Article. It was no part of his province, and he distinctly disclaimed any attempt, to affix any meaning to this Article by any reference of his own to the Holy Scriptures; but he apprehended that, in case of doubt and absolute necessity, he should be justified in having recourse to the opinions of learned divines of our Church. The first difficulty he had to encounter was that, in ascertaining the plain grammatical meaning of the Article, he had to affix a meaning to words which had not by any commanding authority had any precise meaning affixed to them, and which words might, if Bishop Burnet were right, have been used in the New Testament in different senses. He was then, by the necessity of the case, coerced to give his own construction of the eleventh Article of Religion. First, he held, with Bishop Burnet, that by justification was meant being received into the favour of God; secondly, that the merit of our Saviour was the great cause of that reception; thirdly—and what on the present occasion was perhaps most important—that the person so to be received must have faith in the redemption of mankind through Jesus Christ. He did not enter into the consideration how far a very extended meaning might be given to the expression "by faith;" it sufficed for the present purpose to say, "faith in the redemption through Jesus Christ," and that it must be faith in the person to be justified. As to the latter part of the interpretation, he thought he was confirmed by the grammatical construction; the words which followed were, "and not for our own works or deserving;" the necessary inference was that "our own faith" was contemplated as well as "our own works." The thirteenth Article supported this construction, for there faith in Jesus Christ appeared to him clearly to denote faith in Jesus Christ in the person to be justified. If it were necessary to construe the remaining part, he should say that the words "we are justified by faith only" might mean that faith was indispensable, and without it there could be no justification. The essence of this Article was merits in the Redeemer, faith in the person to be justified. His Lordship then referred to the voluminous extracts from Mr. Heath's sermons set out in the articles, and said that the charges against them, compressed, were, that Mr. Heath affirmed that justification meant the doing strict justice to all both good and bad, and that justification by faith meant justification by the faith of our Saviour in his own Gospel, or our Saviour's trust in the future. He had duly considered these extracts, and he was of opinion that the doctrines maintained by Mr. Heath in the extracts from pages 22 and 23 did not contain the legal and correct explanation of the meaning of the word "justification." He thought there was a misuse of words, and that an erroneous meaning, not permitted by law, had been attached to the word "justification," as used in the eleventh Article. He thought that every clergyman of the Established Church was bound to bear in mind the Articles of Religion in every sermon which he preached and published. He thought that if in such sermons he maintained a doctrine contrariant and repugnant to the Articles, it was no excuse for him to allege that he did not bear in mind the Articles, and had no intention of contravening them. But, although he deemed this position undoubtedly true, he was also of opinion that it ought not to be pressed with extreme rigidity. But in the passage to which he had referred it was possible that Mr. Heath might have meant, there being no reference to redemption by our Saviour, that the justification of which he was then speaking was simply that the Supreme Being would put all things to rights according to His wisdom. Much as he reprobated the passage as mischievous in every point of view, he should be very reluctant to conclude, if it were isolated, that such single passage was adequate proof of the charge laid in the sixth article. But there were other passages which he could not reconcile with any possible construction to be put on the eleventh Article. That Article expressly declared that justification sprang from the merit of our Saviour, and in no respect whatsoever represented justification to mean the doing strict justice to all, though it might be, and he believed it to be, true that in the scheme of redemption mercy and justice might be so combined that no violation of justice would take place. In other passages Mr. Heath introduced a new ingredient—namely, the personal faith of our Saviour, of which no mention was made in the Article, and which placed justification on a different ground. The Article declared justification to be by the merit of our Saviour, and by the faith of the person to be justified. To place justification upon the personal belief of the Saviour was, he thought, in opposition to the Article itself; for any essential addition to the Article could not be consistent with the Article, which purported to describe all that constituted justification. He could not consider it a harmless innovation, for it discarded the conditions of the eleventh Article, and substituted another instead; and this erroneous doctrine was again repeated in stronger terms. Mr. Heath said: "When I talk of justification by faith, I mean justification by our Saviour's trust in the future. The Saviour still trusts in our Father as He always did; He still has faith, and His faith still works by love; He still believes He can put the world right, and I believe so too." He was under the painful necessity of saying that he could not reconcile these doctrines with the plain grammatical sense of the eleventh Article. He thought that they were contrariant and repugnant thereto, and he must pronounce accordingly. His Lordship next examined the seventh article, wherein it was alleged that the passages extracted were repugnant to the second and thirty-first Articles of Religion. The plain meaning of the conclusion of the second article was, that through the suffering and death of our Saviour His Father was reconciled to us. He was well aware that very much discussion had arisen as to the meaning of the word "reconciled." The ordinary meaning of the word "reconciled," when speaking of two persons, he took to be the removal of some hostile or angry feeling which subsisted between them. When speaking of the Deity we must be careful not to attribute to Him the feelings which belonged to man. The best construction that he felt himself at liberty to put upon this word "reconciled" was the removal of that obstacle which, from the sin of man, existed to his reception into the favour of God, and that being reconciled he would be so received into that favour. Upon a consideration of the second and of the thirty-first Articles, he could not but think that whoever alleged that the death of our Saviour was not the means to reconcile His Father to us, or who denied that the death of Christ was a perfect propitiation for the sins of the world, must necessarily contravene those two Articles. The question therefore was, whether Mr. Heath had avowed such denial. He need not say that he considered this question—namely, how it was effected—to be one of the mysteries which it had pleased Providence to leave incapable of being explained by man, and he was relieved by thinking that it was his duty merely to ascertain whether the doctrine therein contained had been denied or not. He was in no respect called upon to offer any explanation. His Lordship referred to passages in the sermons which, he said, appeared to him to deny that God was propitiated by the sufferings and death of our Saviour, and not only to deny that doctrine, but to allege that His blood was shed for another purpose. His Lordship next referred to the eighth article, charging Mr. Heath with having advisedly maintained doctrines repugnant to the Apostles' Creed, which declared our belief in the forgiveness of sins, and to that part of the Nicene Creed which declared our belief in one baptism for the remission of sins. It was also charged that these doctrines were repugnant to the eighth, twenty-seventh, and sixteenth Articles of Religion. After reading those portions of the Creeds and the Articles which referred to these points, his Lordship said that the result of them was that forgiveness of sins was avowed and acknowledged as a part of the doctrines of the Church,—forgiveness of sins through the merits of the Saviour by faith and repentance; and the question was whether this doctrine had been denied by Mr. Heath. The first passage bearing upon the question was at p. 161: "For myself I feel beaten to the very ground at the enormity of the task of persuading all England to reject totally the forgiveness of sins as having anything at all to do with the Gospel." If this passage stood alone, if it were not altogether qualified, and a construction put upon it by other parts of the sermon adverse to its primâ facie meaning, he did not see how it was possible that any interpretation of its meaning should not convey the doctrine that Mr. Heath denied the forgiveness of sins, nor could he entertain any doubt that a denial of the forgiveness of sins was contrariant and repugnant to the Creeds and Articles. His task, therefore, was narrowed to this—whether he could find in this sermon any satisfactory explanation of the passage he had read. He could find none. The remaining charge was that contained in the tenth article, which charged that certain passages were repugnant to the second Article of Religion, that other passages were repugnant to the Creed of St. Athanasius, to the Apostles' Creed, and to the Nicene Creed, and also complained of a violation of the thirty-first, the sixth and the eleventh Articles. In considering the question whether Mr. Heath had contravened a meaning, so far as he knew, disputed by none, he confessed that he had had great difficulty in believing that Mr. Heath did really mean to express the opinions which his words conveyed, such opinions appearing to him to be entirely contrary to those which any clergyman ought to declare; but he was not able to discover any clue whereby he could venture to say that those opinions were qualified, and to be understood in a different sense from that which primâ facie belonged to the words used. At page 117 of the sermons was the following passage: "The more I study my Bible for myself the more astounding I find it—how many of the most fundamental ideas and phrases of modern theology have been foisted in without sanction from that all-sufficing record of our religion. One after another, no less than about twenty ideas or phrases, such as guilty of sin, paying a penalty, going to heaven, going to hell, immortality of the soul, satisfaction, imputed righteousness, appropriating the work of Christ, necessary to salvation, and many others, have vanished from my system, because, as a minister of Christ, studying these matters professionally, I see them to be phrases and ideas not only absent from Scripture, but darkening and confusing the clearest of the otherwise most intelligible and comforting statements of Holy Writ." The effect of this passage was—first, that guilt of sin had vanished from Mr. Heath's system, because such a phrase and idea were absent from Scripture and darkened the most intelligible and comforting statements of Holy Writ. Now, what said the second Article? That our Saviour died to reconcile us to the Father, and to be a sacrifice not only for original guilt, but also for the actual sins of men. He really could not comprehend how any intelligible meaning could be affixed to this Article, if guilt of sin was to be removed from all Christian doctrine. He could not conceive the idea of actual sin without there being guilt of sin. He should not dwell upon the other expressions which were alleged to be repugnant to the Creeds. He viewed the whole of the passage with astonishment and regret. He thought the words used contained a doctrine, if it was to be so called, utterly irreconcilable with the Creeds. The thirty-first Article was next to be considered. Mr. Heath dismissed from his system the immortality of the soul, satisfaction, imputed righteousness, as darkening and confusing the clearest and the most intelligible and comforting statements of Holy Writ. The thirty-first Article said that the offering of Christ was a perfect satisfaction for all the sins of the world. To deny satisfaction altogether, whatever might be its meaning, as Mr. Heath had done, could not be taken in any other sense than a denial of the truth of the Article itself. The next charge was that Mr. Heath had maintained that the phrase "necessary to salvation," &c. was not only not a scriptural phrase, but a phrase which darkened and confused Holy Writ. Passing by the Creed of St. Athanasius, he would refer to the very words with which the sixth Article commenced: "Holy Scripture containeth all things necessary to salvation." What did Mr. Heath mean by the omission of words as contrary to Scripture, which words contained the very essence of the Article itself? It is with great regret, his Lordship continued, that I have felt myself compelled by a sense of duty to declare that I have no other alternative but to pronounce a judgment condemning Mr. Heath as guilty of the charges preferred against him—namely, preaching doctrine contrariant and repugnant to the Articles of Religion cited in these proceedings. The defence has been maintained with great zeal and learning, and many ingenious arguments have been urged upon the court; but I must say that that which the court wanted from the beginning has never been supplied—namely, some kind of exposition of the doctrines preached by Mr. Heath which could by any possibility, however remote, be reconciled with the plain grammatical meaning of the Articles charged to be contravened. I would with pleasure have accepted in excuse for Mr. Heath any explanation of his doctrines which by any reasonable effort of the understanding could be reconciled with the doctrines of the Church. There has been a complete failure in that respect, not from any want of learning, diligence, or ability of counsel, but because it was not possible rationally to affix any innocent meaning to those doctrines which Mr. Heath has so unfortunately promulgated. I trust I may confidently affirm that I have come to the consideration of this painful case with no disposition to press the clergy of this realm to any narrow construction of the doctrines of the Articles of Religion, but to allow every possible interpretation which would not violate their essence and spirit; to go further would be to abandon the duty of the office I hold, and to do that which the Legislature alone could do—to release the clergy of the Church of England from the obligations contained in the Articles, and to repeal by judge-made law the provisions which Parliament has thought fit to enact by its authority. Before concluding, I think it right to explain why I do not advert to the many authorities which the zeal and learning of counsel have produced. My reason is this, that in my judgment not one of these authorities does that which was required in this case—namely, show that some divine of eminence has held without reproach from ecclesiastical authority doctrines in substance the same as those Mr. Heath has promulgated. Whatever opinions may have been held in the vast field of polemical divinity, I find none which can support Mr. Heath, or justify him. In the Gorham case the Judicial Committee had the advantage of being able to quote in support of their judgment, and in justification of Mr. Gorham, passages from the writings of divines of the highest authority. I cannot conclude this judgment without observing that I am well aware of the fallibility of my own opinion, and especially in so peculiar a case as the present; but I have endeavoured, first, to make clear the principles which I intended should govern me; and, secondly, to show plainly how I applied those principles to the case before me. If I have erred in either particular, the judgment of a Superior Court will correct me. It may be, however, that many will think that, though legally right, this judgment recognises too severe restrictions on the clergy, and shuts the door against inquiry and disquisition, which might tend to elucidate the truth. Now, even if this were so, it is not for a court of justice to open a door which the Legislature has shut. It is contrary to all sound principle for a court to seek, as has been formerly done by some judges, ingenious subterfuges to evade or weaken the law, and that upon a notion of its own power to discover what is best and most convenient. Such a course is, I think, not only contrary to principle, but would be most injurious in its effect, for all such attempts to wrest the law according to supposed consequences invariably tend to postpone a remedy if there be a real evil. If there be bonds which press heavily on the clergy—as to which I give no opinion—I repeat that the Legislature imposed them, and the Legislature alone can loose them. I pronounce against Mr. Heath.

BURDER v. HEATH.

BURDER v. HEATH.

Bullar asked his Lordship to allow the deft. time to consider what course he should take after the judgment that had been pronounced. Under the statute retraction was open to Mr. Heath.

His Lordship said he would allow ample time for consideration, and the cause was accordingly postponed for that purpose.

REG. v. JOHN WARRELL.

Answers of the prisoner elicited by the police, even after due caution, ought to be received in evidence with great jealousy.

John Warrell was indicted for stealing twenty-one sovereigns, the property of William Farrelly, and in the second count for receiving same.

Wall, Q.C. and Curtis for the Crown; Lover for prisoner.

The money charged to have been stolen was kept, with other sovereigns, in the house of Farrelly at Thomastown, and prisoner, who had been on a visit with him, left the house on the 23rd Feb. last. He was brought back in custody in about four hours afterwards by constable Lowry, and prosecutor then searched his desk and discovered 21*l.* in gold. Farrelly was proceeding to state what passed in conversation between him and the prisoner in the presence of the police-constable, when Lover objected to any part of the conversation being given in evidence until it was first sworn by the constable, who had been in charge, that no promise, threat, or inducement, had been held out to him.

CHRISTIAN, J. was of opinion that the constable should be produced before the conversation was proved.

The Crown acquiesced in this course.

Constable Lowry, who arrested the prisoner on suspicion on the morning of the 23rd Feb., while passing through the village of Stoneyford, and having subsequently brought him before Mr. Butler, a magistrate, having given him a caution not to say anything that would criminate himself; witness asked him some questions.

Lover objected to any answer being given in evidence, even after this caution. The man was in custody, and only for safe custody, and it was the duty of the constable to bring the accused before a magistrate, an educated gentleman who no doubt discharged his duty under the provisions of the 14 & 15 Vict. c. 93, s. 14, by taking his examination in writing after a proper caution. Counsel cited Levinge's Justice of the peace, 55-6: "Constables cannot be too cautious in abstaining from investigating prisoners in their custody. Doherty, C.J. expressed his unqualified disapprobation of the practice of persons, without any lawful authority, interrogating prisoners on the subject of their charge, and declared he would not permit admissions so obtained from prisoners to be given in evidence against them: (Reg. v. Hughes, 1 Cran. & Dix C. C. 15.) And it has been held by Lefroy, C.J., that answers given to a constable upon questions put by him, though he had given the prisoner a previous caution, are inadmissible in evidence: (Reg. v. Grey, Trim Summer Assizes 1855.)"

Wall and Curtis submitted that if once a due and proper caution was given, the statement or answer of the accused were clearly admissible.

CHRISTIAN, J., without ruling the point, observed that there was a difference in the value of testimony voluntarily given and that elicited in answer to questions. He objected to the police questioning prisoners while in their custody on a criminal charge, and he thought the counsel for the Crown ought not to press this particular evidence. The Crown did not insist upon the reception of the evidence, without, however, being understood to assent to the validity of the objection.

SHIPTON v. GALE.

Volunteers' exemption from tolls.

Judgment was given in this case before the sitting magistrates. Mr. D. Burges, sen., read the judgment, which was as follows:—The point which is raised in this information depends on the construction of the Act of the 24 & 25 Vict. c. 128, which was passed in the last session, for the purpose, as stated in the preamble, of removing doubts which had arisen, how far the exemption from tolls granted to officers and soldiers of the regular army by the General Turnpike Acts of the 3 Geo. 4, c. 126, and the 4 Geo. 4, c. 49, extended to officers and soldiers serving in volunteer corps, and for the more fully defining the exemption of volunteers from toll. The facts of the case are as follows:—On the 10th Sept. last, the complainant, a member of a volunteer corps, and three comrades, all being in uniform, were conveyed through the White Ladies' turnpike-gate, to a place appointed for exercise, in a carriage bonâ fide hired by the volunteers, but which at the same time was also employed in conveying to the same place, for the purpose of seeing the exercise, another person, the friend of the parties, but not being a volunteer. The complainant under these circumstances claimed to be exempt from the toll, but the claim was disallowed by the defendant, who was the collector at the gate. For the purposes of the present inquiry, it will be sufficient to refer to the Act of the 3 Geo. 4, c. 126, s. 82, which deals (firstly) with regular soldiers, and (secondly) with volunteers. As regards regular soldiers, it exempts from toll:—(A) Horses on march or duty. (B) Carts and carriages employed, or having been employed, only in conveying arms or baggage. (C) Carts, &c. employed, or having been employed only, in conveying sick, wounded, or disabled soldiers. (D) Waggon, &c. employed, or having been employed, in conveying ordnance and other stores. As regards volunteers, the 3 Geo. 4 exempts from toll:—(E) Carriages conveying volunteer infantry. (F) Horses furnished by or for any person belonging to any corps of yeomanry, or volunteer cavalry, or infantry, and ridden by him on any public duty. Several questions have been raised and submitted to the Superior Courts, how far the above-mentioned exemptions in favour of the regular army applied to volunteers, and for the purpose of solving such doubts, the first clause of sect. 82 of the late statute provides that all such exemptions shall extend to volunteers:—first, as regards horses used or ridden on march or duty; and it then enacts, secondly, as regards carriages, that no toll shall be taken for any cart, carriage, &c., whether public or private, or for any horse drawing the same, employed only in carrying or conveying, or returning empty from carrying or conveying, having been employed only in carrying or conveying any volunteer on march or duty, such volunteer being in the uniform of his corps. This is in fact a new enactment, and as respects the use of the word "only" it assimilates the exemptions for carriages conveying volunteers to those contained in clauses B and C in favour of regular soldiers, while at the same time it renders the exemption for horses identical in both services. Mr. Shipton argued that the word "only" means bona fide or substantially, and he contended that if a carriage was bona fide employed to convey volunteers, the conveyance therein of another person, not being a volunteer, would not render the carriage liable to toll, and he referred us, as an authority on this point, to the case of Stephenson v. Taylor, reported in the Law Journal, new series, vol. 80, p. 145. Mr. Patrick, on the other hand, submitted to us, that "only," in the usual acceptation of the word, means exclusively, and he contended that the case cited by Mr. Shipton, being a decision under the old statute (clause E), which does not contain the word only, cannot be relied on as an authority in this inquiry, which depends entirely on the late Act, with reference especially to the words therein used—"employed only or having been employed only in carrying volunteers."

PEDLEY v. DAVIS AND SHIPSTON.

In Stephenson v. Taylor, Cockburn, C.J., said that any carriage bona fide employed in conveying volunteer infantry to a place of exercise, or bringing them back from it, was entitled to the exemption, viz. under sect. 82 of the 3 Geo. 4, and he thought that the carriage, to enjoy that immunity from toll, must be employed, he would not say exclusively but substantially, for the conveyance of volunteers, and that if the carriage was bona fide hired and used for the conveyance of volunteers, the accidental circumstance of some one else riding in it, who was not obliged to pay hire for the use of his seat in the vehicle, would not deprive the carriage of its exemption from toll. We have quoted this judgment at some length, for the purpose of showing that there is no foundation for Mr. Shipton's argument, that the Lord Chief Justice considered that the word "only" meant bona fide or "substantially," the word "only" not being then under consideration; and it being, therefore, unnecessary for the Lord Chief Justice to comment upon or interpret its meaning. In the same case, Mr. Justice Crompton observed that all the words of the Act of Parliament were to have weight given them; and this is a general principle, which applies as much to the new as to the old Act. We think that the word "only" used in the new Act means exclusively, and as the carriage referred to in this complaint was employed—that is, was occupied, or was being used in conveying four volunteers to a place of exercise, and also in conveying one gentleman not being a volunteer to the same place, we do not see how this can be called an employment in conveying volunteers only. To hold that it is so would be to ignore the word "only" altogether, and to construe the sentence as if the word were not in it—a proceeding which is not consistent with the mode in which Acts of Parliament are interpreted, as defined by Crompton, J., in his observations in Stephenson v. Taylor. This view of the case is further illustrated by the meaning which is attached to the word "only" in the earlier part of sect. 82 of the 3rd Geo. 4, where it is expressly provided that carriages having been employed only in carrying dung, &c., be exempt, unless laden with some other things not exempted from toll; in which case they will become liable. We think for these reasons that the exemption claimed cannot be allowed, and we give our judgment for the defendant.

Mr. Shipton thanked their worships for the time and attention which they had paid to the subject, and intimated that he intended taking advantage of the three days allowed by the Act of Parliament, for the purpose of considering whether he should appeal against their decision or otherwise.

COURT OF COMMON BENCH.

PEDLEY v. DAVIS AND SHIPSTON.

Abbey Lands Act—Liability of justice of the peace to action of trespass for issuing distress-warrant—Protection of officer acting under such warrant.

By sect. 13 of 7 & 8 Geo. 4, c. 108, it is enacted that owners of abbey lands shall have power to make a rate upon the owners of such lands; and sect. 15 of the same Act empowers a justice of the peace, in cases of refusal to pay, to summon, and in due course issue a distress-warrant against the person so refusing to pay. The plt. refused to pay a rate levied under this Act, whereupon the def. D. (a justice of the peace) issued a warrant of distress, which was executed by the def. S. The plt. then brought an action of trespass against the defts., and the jury found that the land upon which the rate was levied was not abbey land:

Held, that, as the land was found not to be abbey land, such action would lie as against the justice, but that it would not as against the officer, as he was protected by sect. 6, 24 Geo. 2, c. 44.

This cause, which was one of trespass, was tried before Erle, C. J., at the Kent spring assizes, when the verdict was for the plt., leave being reserved to move to set it aside and enter a verdict for the defts. The action was for seizing certain goods and chattels of the plt. for rates under a local Act called the Abbey Lands Act. The def. Davis was the justice who signed the warrant of distress and Shipston the constable who executed it; and the question for the consideration of this court was, whether (the jury having found that the land was not abbey land) the def. was protected as a justice, and the def. Shipston as an officer acting in execution of a warrant.

June 8.—ERLE, C.J. now delivered the judgment of the court.—In this case the plt. had been rated as an owner of abbey lands, and the deft. Davis issued a distress-warrant to enforce payment of that rate, and the deft. Shipston levied under that warrant, and the jury has found that the land was not abbey land, and so the question is raised whether the deft. Davis is protected, as justice, or the deft. Shipston as an officer acting in execution of a warrant. With respect to the case of the justice, the 7 & 8 Geo. 4, c. 108, s. 13, enables the owners of abbey lands to make a rate upon the owners of abbey lands; and sect. 15 enacts that if any owner of any land in respect of which a rate has been imposed by virtue of this Act. shall refuse to pay, a justice, on proof of demand, may summon, and in due course issue a distress-warrant. If these were all the relevant facts, it would be clear that the justice had acted without jurisdiction, and would be liable in trespass. The ownership of abbey lands is as essential to give jurisdiction to make the rate in question, as occupation of lands within the parish is for a poor-rate; and it is clear that trespass lay before the 11 & 12 Vict. c. 44, s. 4, for levying a poor-rate when the complainant had no lands within the parish: (see Nicholls v. Walker and another, Croke, Charles, 394; Milward v. Caffin, 2 W.B.L. 1330; Newbold v. Coltman, 6 Ex. 195.) The last case bears a strong analogy to the present. There the statute provided that in every case in which a contribution from overseers, required by a board of guardians, shall be in arrear, the justices may summon, and in due course issue a warrant if they think fit. And the question considered was, whether the jurisdiction of the justices extended to inquire into the validity of the order of the board of guardians, and of the appointment of overseers, or was confined to enforcing payment of sums assumed to be legally due. And the decision is, that the existence of a legal obligation to pay the sum claimed is a necessary preliminary condition to the magistrates having any jurisdiction at all, and therefore they have no jurisdiction to decide on the validity of the order; but if the order is legally made, and the party is in arrear, they may issue a warrant or not as the circumstances shall in their discretion seem to require. This reasoning is directly applicable to the 15th section, above recited, relating to rates on abbey lands, under which the justice is directed to begin by inquiring whether the rated owner has refused to pay, not whether the rate is valid. This case answers many of the arguments relied on for the deft. here. If the question is not within the jurisdiction of the magistrates, his adjudication thereon is not conclusive for him in an action. If he has a discretion to grant or refuse a distress-warrant, he may consider whether there is reasonable ground to doubt the validity of the rate; and if he does so doubt, he may exercise his discretion in refusing a distress-warrant, and then the parties may proceed by rule or by indemnity to the justice, if they wish to try the validity of the rate at the usual risk of costs; but if the justice refuse to issue a distress-warrant, because he doubts the validity of the rate, he does not therefore adjudicate thereon as on a matter within his jurisdiction for adjudication. This case further decides, that in the case of a warrant so issued without jurisdiction, the justice is not within the operation of the 11 & 12 Vict. c. 44, s. 1, relating to actions on the case, but is within sect. 2, relating to actions of trespass for acting where there is no jurisdiction, and is not within sect. 4, relating to poor-rates and the exercise of discretionary power. The distinction between Newbold v. Coltman and the present case, if any, arises from sect. 36 of 7 & 8 Geo. 4 enacting that if the app. on any appeal against a rate shall claim to be exempt because the lands are not abbey lands, and he shall have paid a former rate, the burden of the proof of the exemption shall be borne by him, followed by sect. 42, making the decision of the quarter sessions upon appeal final and conclusive. It was contended that the Court of Appeal had by this section jurisdiction to try the claim of exemption on the ground that the lands are not abbey lands; and if so, that it was a legal consequence that the tribunal appealed from should be construed to have by implication the same jurisdiction. But we do not collect that intention from the language of the sections. It is not probable that the Legislature would subject all lands to a liability to be rated by the owners of abbey lands, having an interest to make the contributories as numerous as possible, and to preclude the owners from the ordinary recourse to the general law. It may be that a party electing to appeal may be bound finally, and still if he elects to try the question by action he may do so. The effect of appealing is not now for us to decide, and we are clear that the language of the 15th section, creating the jurisdiction in the justice to issue the warrant, does not express any intention to give him jurisdiction to try the validity of the rate, and we therefore think that the plt. had a right to try the validity of the rate by an action of trespass. It was said that he ought to try the right by an action for money had and received, but it suffices to answer that we see many difficulties in so raising the question. It was further contended that, as the plt. might have tried this question upon appeal, he was therefore bound to appeal, and could not bring an action for a matter which was ground of appeal, and he cited Shaw v. The Churchwardens of Birmingham, 10 Q. B., but in that judgment the distinction is clearly taken between cases on the one hand where there is jurisdiction to make the rate, and the party has a ground of appeal against a rate made within jurisdiction, and cases on the other hand where there was no jurisdiction to make the rate, and so no jurisdiction to issue distress-warrant. The court says, if in the first instance the court has gone beyond its jurisdiction, the Act is void; the party grieved may, if he please, appeal, because excess of jurisdiction is as much a ground of appeal as a merely erroneous decision, and if the Court of Appeal erroneously confirm the act of the court below, it may be that the party appealing cannot object to the want of jurisdiction in any collateral proceeding. His own act may estop him personally, but he is not bound to appeal, he is not at liberty to treat the Act as void. This reasoning we think applies to the case before us, and answers the objection that the plt. was bound to appeal. Our judgment, therefore, is, that the plt. is entitled to his verdict against the deft. Davis. With respect to the deft. Shipston, we think that he is protected by 24 Geo. 2, c. 24, s. 6, enacting that no action should be brought against any constable, head borough, or other officer, for anything done in obedience to a warrant without compliance with certain provisions which need not be specified, the question being whether Shipston was an officer within the meaning of this section. The plt. contended that he was the private agent of the owners of abbey lands, collecting money for them in their private capacity, and not entitled to the protection due to officers of the law acting in execution of the law. But as the statute requires the warrant to be directed to the collector, and requires the collector to execute the same, he comes within the principle of the protection created by the statute. He is acting in execution of the law, he is bound to obey the commands in the warrant, and although he might resign his office and avoid receiving a warrant, he is not the less acting under legal compulsion if he is in office, and receives the warrant. We consider that the decisions extending the protection of the statute to churchwardens and overseers executing a warrant of distress for poor-rate, according to Nutting v. Faulkner, Buller's Nisi Prius, 24, and Harper v. Carr, 7 T. R. 270, authorises us to hold that the collector executing a warrant of distress in this case is protected. The result is, that the rule is made absolute as to the deft. Shipston, and discharged as to the deft. Davis.

Rule absolute as to deft. Shipston, and discharged as to deft. Davis.

MERSEY DOCKS AND HARBOUR BOARD v. JONES AND OTHERS (Churchwardens and Overseers of the Poor of the Parish of Liverpool).

Poor-rates—Liverpool Docks not subject to—Acquiescence by Legislature in the decisions of courts of law.

The trustees of certain public docks were by their local Acts empowered to take tolls from vessels entering such docks, and the proceeds were to be applied to the repair and maintenance of the docks and harbour; and if the amount so raised should be more than sufficient for such purpose, then the tolls were to be lowered. By later Acts the trustees were empowered to raise money for building additional warehouses, and to levy rates for payment of the expenses, paying interest and maintaining the buildings so erected; but such additional warehouses were to be rateable to the poor as in the case of premises of which there was a beneficial occupation.

A case, known as the Liverpool case, reported in 7 B. & C. 61, was decided in 1827, in which the parties were to all intents and purposes the same as in the present case, and the court held that the dock company were not rateable in respect of the dock dues, nor of the premises used for the purposes of the dock, no individual having any beneficial occupation of the premises:

Held in the present case (affirming the decision of the Court of C. B.), that, as the Legislature, by its declaration as to the rateability of the additional warehouses and buildings created under the authority of the later Acts, had, by implication, acquiesced in the decision in the Liverpool case, it was not competent to this court to interfere with that decision; and that therefore this particular property was exempt from poor-rates.

This was an appeal against a decision of the Court of C. B. upon a special case. By a rate made for the relief of the poor of Liverpool, on the 2nd June 1858, the p^{ts}. were assessed at 20,580*l.* 18*s.* 8*d.*, in respect of the dock estates within the parish. The rate was not appealed against, but the p^{ts}. did not pay, consequently a distress was levied for nonpayment, and the present case was stated in an action of replevin. The dock estates were originally vested in the corporation of the borough, as trustees under several statutes. Some portion of those estates was granted voluntarily by the corporation, other portions were sold by them to the trustees, and the remainder were bought by the trustees from private individuals, under certain statutory powers contained in twenty-two Acts of Parliament, from 1 Anne to 21 Vict., the material clauses of which will be found set out in the case below, reported in 8 C. B., N.S., 114-145. The question for the consideration of this court was, whether the Mersey Docks and Harbour Board were rateable to the poor for the property mentioned in the assessment, but on this point the court gave no decision, but affirmed the decision of the court below, on the ground which will be found in the judgment.

Bovill, Q.C. (Mellish, Q.C. with him) appeared for the churchwardens and overseers.—In the Birkenhead case, 2 E. & Bl. 148, where the docks were under the same trustees as here, the premises were held rateable, and many early and late cases, not distinguishable from the present, are to the same effect, and the principles laid down in that case should be affirmed. [CROMPTON, J.—If you are right with reference to the Birkenhead case, what do you say to the Liverpool case? BLACKBURN, J.—Assuming the decision in that case to be erroneous, nevertheless it has not been overruled, but has been acted upon for many years.] The Liverpool Docks have never been rated, and communis error facit jus. [CROMPTON, J.—Where legislation has taken place with reference to an assumed state of the law, it is dangerous to disturb it.] No reason can be assigned why these, of all others, should be exempt. The Liverpool case proceeded upon that of Salter's Load Shute, 4 T. R. 730; but in R. v. Tempie, 2 E. & B. 168, Lord Campbell questions the propriety of the construction put upon the statute. He cited the West Derby, 6 E. & B. 711; the Lea, 19 J. P. 310; the Chirton, 28 L. J. 140, M.C.; the St. Luke's Hospital, 2 Bur. 1053; the Exminster, 12 A. & E. 2; Longwood, 13 Q. B. 116; Harrogate, 15 Q. B. 1012; Manchester, 17 Q. B. 859; Badcock, 6 Q. B. 787.

Sir F. Kelly (Parker with him) contra.—It is not necessary to overrule any case in order to support the judgment given in this; but this judgment could not be reversed without upsetting the Liverpool case, and other decisions founded thereon. Under the statute of Elizabeth it was an essential condition for the imposition of this rate that there should be a beneficial occupation; but from the time of Anne till now it has been held that no individual had any beneficial occupation, but that the docks were for public purposes. By the decision in the Liverpool case, tried in 1827, these premises were exempted, and that decision has been recognised by the local Acts referred to in the case, 4 & 5 Vict. c. 30, s. 71; 9 & 10 Vict. c. 109, s. 34; 11 Vict. c. 10, s. 4; 18 & 19 Vict. c. 64, s. 31. Previous decisions ought to be adhered to, and the case of Crease v. Sawle, 2 Q. B. 885, is an authority on that point. [BLACKBURN, J.—It is clear that when the Legislature passed these Acts it never intended to upset the Liverpool case.] He was stopped.

CROMPTON, J.—If it were necessary to decide this case upon an examination of the Liverpool case decided in 1827 and the cases since that time, I should have wished to have heard further argument; but those decisions have been acquiesced in, the Legislature has acted upon them, and people have been induced to advance their property upon faith in them and the recognition of them by the Legislature, and I think that previous decisions upon which the Legislature has acted ought to be adhered to; perhaps those decisions are right, but in any case I agree with the observations made by Tindal, C. J., in Crease v. Sawle, when speaking of the importance of abiding by previous decisions with respect to the rateability of property, and I am disposed to act upon them. I also think that it is very desirable to preserve uniformity of decision if possible: (R. v. Chirton.) In the present case, however, I do not propose to deal with any other property than that now before us. Although from the time of Queen Anne this property had not been rated, an attempt to impose a rate upon it was made in 1808. But in 1827 the case came directly before the Court of Q. B. at about the same time as R. v. The Trustees of the River Weaver Navigation, 7 B. & C. 70, and that court then decided that this property was not rateable. Legislation, with respect to this property, acquiescing in that decision, has since taken place; and at the present time many millions are advanced on the faith of that acquiescence. We find that by 4 & 5 Vict. c. 30, s. 52, the trustees are empowered to build warehouses on the quays of one of the docks, and to borrow largely on the property; and by the 71st section, warehouses are expressly made subject to all parochial and other rates. That section is strong to show, by implication, that the docks themselves were not regarded by the Legislature as property which was beneficially occupied so as to be subject to the rate. It would be a strange construction of that statute, and one which persons who have advanced their money upon faith in its provisions would be entitled to complain of, that when it expressly provides that the new works are to be rated, the old works were not exempt. In 9 & 10 Vict. c. 109, and through the whole course of this legislation, there is a provision running in effect—"Mind the newly constructed warehouses are to be rated;" and, to my mind, the implication raised thereby is, that the docks were not to be rated. Where a decision has been thus acquiesced in by the Legislature, it is not competent to a superior court or to a court of error to interfere with it. If it be found to be attended with any hardship, that must be left to the Legislature to remedy. I confine my judgment in this case entirely to this particular property.

The rest of the Court concurred.

Judgment affirmed.

Re THE REV. J. M. BARLOW.

Mandamus—Disqualified churchwarden—Quo warranto.

Where by the custom of the parish one churchwarden was elected annually by the parishioners, and the other annually by the rector, and the latter appointed as his churchwarden a person who was not a parishioner, nor an inhabitant of or occupier of property in the parish:

Held, that a mandamus to the rector to appoint a churchwarden is the proper process by which to question the validity of the appointment:

Seemle, that though a quo warranto will lie for usurping an office, whether created by charter or an Act of Parliament, provided the office be of a public nature and a substantive one, yet the office of churchwarden does not come within that rule.

This was a rule obtained by Prideaux, calling upon the Rev. John Mount Barlow to show cause why a mandamus should not issue commanding him to nominate a churchwarden for the parish of Ewhurst, of which he is the rector. It appeared that by custom the parishioners at Easter nominated one churchwarden, and the rector the other, and that at Easter last the parishioners having nominated their churchwarden, the rector nominated as his a Mr. Steere, who was afterwards sworn into office. This gentleman, however, though upon the rate-book as rated for some property in the parish, was not a resident in or occupier of any house or land in the parish, and the ground upon which the rule was obtained was that his nomination was void.

Cleasby, Q.C. showed cause, and contended that whether or not Mr. Steere was ineligible to be nominated as churchwarden, the present proceeding by mandamus was erroneous, for that the proper proceeding should be by quo warranto. Moreover, that the rector cannot be compelled to appoint a churchwarden, for that if he neglects his right in this respect the parishioners may themselves appoint both churchwardens: (The Churchwardens of Northampton, 1 Carth. 118; Darley v. The Queen (in error), 3 Cl. & Fin. 520.)

Prideaux, contra, argued that the proceeding by mandamus is the proper one, and that the rector can be compelled to appoint: (R. v. Shepherd, 4 T. R. 381; R. v. Dawberry, 2 Stra. 1196; R. v. The Governors of St. Martin's-in-the-Fields, 20 L. J. 423, Q. B.; R. v. The Mayor of Cambridge, 4 Burr. 2008; Reg. v. Birmingham, 7 A. & E. 254.)

Cur. adv. vult.

July 9.—HILL, J.—The object of the present application was to question the validity of the rector's appointment on the ground that the person appointed was not legally qualified. Cause was shown against the rule that a mandamus ought not to be granted, because it was contended that if the rector's nomination was void, the parishioners had the power to nominate a second churchwarden, and in support of that proposition, the Churchwardens of Northampton case was relied on; and further, it was argued that a quo warranto would lie, and therefore that a mandamus ought not to be granted. It is well settled that, where there is a remedy equally convenient, beneficial and effectual, a mandamus will not be granted. This is not a rule of law, but a rule regulating the discretion of the court in granting writs of mandamus; and unless the court can see clearly that there is another remedy equally convenient, beneficial and effectual, the writ of mandamus will be granted, provided the circumstances are such, in other respects, as to warrant the granting of the writ. With respect to the first ground relied on in showing cause against the rule, the authority cited fails to establish the proposition for which it was referred to. It merely shows that a mandamus will be granted to swear in two churchwardens, chosen by the parishioners, where the vicar for the time being was under a deprivation. It has been decided that the archdeacon, or other ordinary, has only a ministerial duty to perform in swearing in a churchwarden, and cannot object to do so on the ground of disqualification in the party claiming to be sworn. Reg. v. Rice, 1 Ld. Raym. 138, and further, the case cited from Carthew, does not show that if there be an incumbent capable of nominating a churchwarden, that the parishioners in such a case have a right to nominate a second, where the incumbent, according to custom, ought to nominate one, and claims to exercise the right by nominating any individual alleged to be disqualified. As to the second ground, that a quo warranto would lie, the authorities show that if such be the case a mandamus will not be granted. It was admitted that, according to the older cases, a quo warranto was held not to lie in respect of the office of churchwarden. But it was argued that all those decisions were prior to Darley v. The Queen, and that, according to the principle laid down in the H. of L. in that case, a quo warranto would lie for usurping the office of churchwarden. The rule established by Darley v. The Queen, as stated by Coleridge, J., in Reg. v. The Guardians of St. Martin's, is difficult of application; but as I understand the rule it is, that a proceeding by quo warranto will lie for usurping an office, whether created by charter alone or under the authority of an Act of Parliament, provided the office be of a public nature and a substantive office. In my opinion, the office of churchwarden does not come within that rule. It is not necessary that I should go so far in expressing my opinion. It is sufficient if I am enabled to say, in the language of Littleale, J., in Reg. v. Birmingham, "I do not see my way so clearly to another remedy as to say here that a mandamus ought not to go." The rule, therefore, will be made absolute.

Rule absolute.

REG. v. KIRBY.

Quo warranto—Parish vestries—Election of vestry-clerk—Right to vote in respect of property to which voter is assessed as executor—Entry on rate-book—58 Geo. 3, c. 69, s. 3—13 & 14 Vict. c. 57, s. 6.

An inhabitant of a parish assessed and charged in the last rate made for the relief of the poor is entitled to add property for which he is so assessed and charged in the said rate as "executor of A.," to property to which he is assessed and charged in his own individual capacity for the purpose of making up his qualification as a voter under 58 Geo. 3, c. 69, s. 3, and it is immaterial that his name is not entered as being one of the executors in the rate-book.

Lush, Q.C. (Field with him) showed cause against a rule calling upon Mr. Kirby to show cause why a quo warranto should not issue directing him to show cause by what authority he exercises the office of vestry clerk of Bicester, Oxfordshire, it being alleged that he was not properly elected. There were several votes stated to have been improperly received and rejected, but the only one on which any legal point arose was that of William Palmer, who claimed to be entitled to two votes. The 58 Geo. 3, c. 69, s. 3, regulating the manner of voting in vestries enacts, "That in all such vestries every inhabitant present who shall by the last rate which shall have been made for the relief of the poor have been assessed and charged upon or in respect of any annual rent, profit, or value not amounting to 50*l.*, shall have and be entitled to give one vote and no more; and every inhabitant there present who shall in such last rate have been assessed or charged upon, or in respect of any annual rent or rents, profit, or value, amounting to 50*l.* or upwards (whether in one or in more than one sum or charge), shall have and be entitled to give one vote for every 25*l.* of annual rent, profit, and value upon or in respect of which he shall have been assessed or charged in such last rate, so nevertheless that no inhabitant shall be entitled to give more than six votes; and in cases where two or more of the inhabitants present shall be jointly rated, each of them shall be entitled to vote according to the proportion and amount which shall be borne by him of the joint charge; and where only one of the persons jointly rated shall attend he shall be entitled to vote according to and in respect of the whole of the joint charge." Wm. Palmer was rated on the last poor-rate as follows:

William Palmer, value	21	15	0

Making in all, 61*l.* 5*s.* William Palmer was one of Finch's executors, and supposing the other executor to be present, he would still be assessed to property to the annual value of 55*l.* 5*s.*, and it was now contended that being so assessed, he was entitled to two votes.

Huddleston, Q.C. (R. Sawyer with him) contra.—He is not an occupier within the meaning of the Act to that property to which he is assessed as executor. He is not an assessed inhabitant as to that property. It is necessary by the Act that he be assessed and charged in the rate, and as to the 12*l.* he is not assessed and charged; the rate merely states "Finch's executors, seven cottages." [BLACKBURN, J.—Can it not be shown who Finch's executors are? COCKBURN, C.J.—Suppose a firm assessed in the usual names, Child and Co., for instance; could not the present partners vote, although, perhaps, there might be no one of the original name in existence?] He cannot join the qualification he holds in his representative character to that which he possesses in his individual character. [WIGHTMAN, J.—What is the object of giving one vote to one man and several to another?] It depends upon the interest the man has in the parish, but then that interest must be in his own right. [WIGHTMAN, J.—As executor he is individually liable to poor-rates.] Palmer does not swear he was assessed and charged; he merely says he was rated. [BLACKBURN, J.—That is the same thing.]

COCKBURN, C.J.—This rule should be discharged. The question turns only on Palmer's case, and whether he is entitled to one or two votes. It is clear he is entitled to one in his individual capacity; then was he entitled to the second? Since the property to which he was assessed and charged in his individual capacity was not sufficient to give him two votes, he proposed to add to it other property to which he was assessed and charged as executor, and the question is, whether the one property can be added to the other to make up the amount requisite. It is clear on the statute, and is admitted, that properties can be added together, and that the aggregate amount makes up the qualification. Then what is there to prevent an executor so doing? There is nothing in the Act. I see nothing which should exclude executors, or any reason why we should try to put a forced construction on the Act to exclude them. An executor is the legal owner, and I see no reason why he should not exercise the right of voting if he be properly assessed. I think this case is within the spirit of the Act, and that Mr. Palmer was entitled to two votes.

WIGHTMAN, J. concurred.

BLACKBURN, J.—I am of the same opinion [his Lordship read the section of the Act and stated the facts of the case]. If Palmer had been assessed to 49*l.* 5*s.* only, viz., in 27*l.* 10*s.* and 21*l.* 15*s.* for the property he held in his own individual capacity, it is clear he could not have been entitled to two votes; but then comes the additional 12*l.* assessed to Finch's executors, and the question is, whether he can add that amount, or even half of that amount, as one of two persons jointly rated, to the 49*l.* 5*s.*, so as to give him a valid qualification for two votes. Now, although his name does not appear on the rate, it clearly is open for him to show that he is one of Finch's executors, and when he has done that he may add the qualification thus obtained to his own individual qualification, so as to entitle him to two votes. It seems to me to be exactly as if the rate-book said, "A. B. and W. Palmer, Finch's executors." If the other executor were present Palmer would be entitled to vote only in respect of one-half, but that would be sufficient to settle the present question. Looking at the Act, I think it clear, as has been observed by the L. C. J., that this case comes within its spirit. Rule discharged with costs.

PEASE AND OTHERS v. CHAYTOR AND ANOTHER.

Justices—Action against for acting without jurisdiction—Church-rate—Validity of rate disputed.

The declaration alleged that the plts. were summoned for nonpayment of church-rates, and at the hearing before the defts. (two justices) they the plts. in good faith disputing and intending to dispute the validity of the rate, gave to the defts. notice that they disputed the validity of the rate, and required the defts. to forbear from and not to give judgment on the matter; that there was not evidence given to or before the defts. that the plts. did not, in fact or in good faith, dispute the validity of the rate, yet that the defts., not acting bona fide in the belief that they were acting in conformity with law, but wilfully disregarding such notice and their duty, and contrary to law, assuming to act as justices in the said matter when they knew that they had not jurisdiction to proceed further, nevertheless proceeded to and did give judgment, and made an order for a distress-warrant to levy the rate; that the plts.' goods were seized, and the plts. obliged to obtain a certiorari to quash the order, and to incur certain expenses:

Held, on demurrer, that the declaration sufficiently alleged that the defts. were acting without jurisdiction, and that the 11 & 12 Vict. c. 44, s. 2, was applicable to the case, and that it was not necessary to allege that the defts. acted maliciously, and without reasonable and probable cause.

Declaration.—That the defts. were two of her Majesty's justices of the peace for the county of Durham, and the plts. were lessees and occupiers of a colliery and premises in the chapelry of St. Helen's Auckland, in the said county, in and by the name or style of "Joseph Pease and others, or company, owners of St. Helen's colliery," and were rated to a church-rate for the said chapelry in the sum of 8*l.*, the validity of which said rate was at the time of the making of the said rate, and from thence hitherto has been, and still is disputed by the plts., and the plts. were after the making of the said rate, by virtue of a summons or warrant under the hand and seal of Henry Stobart, Esq., one of her Majesty's justices of the peace in and for the said county, convened and summoned to appear on the 23rd Dec. 1858, before her said Majesty's justices of the peace acting in and for the said county, at the justice-room in Bishop Auckland, and in the said county of Durham, to answer a certain complaint that the plts. had refused to pay unto David Vitty, churchwarden of the said chapelry, the sum of 8*l.* 5*s.* 4*d.*, being the amount of the said sum of 8*l.*, together with a certain other sum of 5*s.* 4*d.* to which the plts. had also been rated in like manner as aforesaid, to the said church-rate, the validity of which they disputed as aforesaid. And the plts. by their agent in that behalf duly attended before the said justices in and for the said county, pursuant to the said summons, and at the place and time therein mentioned the hearing of the said complaint mentioned in the said summons was thereupon in due form of law adjourned to the 6th Jan. 1859, and upon the same 6th Jan. the plts. again, in pursuance of the said adjournment, duly attended by their said agent at Bishop Auckland aforesaid, before the defts., then and there being and acting as two of her said Majesty's justices of the peace in and for the said county of Durham. And the matters of the said complaint were then entered into and heard by the defts. so being and acting as such justices. And the plts. say that at the time of the hearing of the matter of the said complaint they (the plts.) in good faith, truth and sincerity disputing and intending to dispute the validity of the said rate, upon the hearing of the said complaint by their said agent, gave to the defts., then being and acting as such justices as aforesaid, notice that they the plts. disputed the validity of the said rate, and required the defts., as such justices as aforesaid, to forbear from and not to give judgment in respect of the matters of the said complaint. And the plts. further say, that upon the said hearing of the said complaint by the defts. as such justices aforesaid, there was not evidence given to or before the defts. that they the plts. did not in fact or in good faith dispute the validity of the said rate, or that they did not in good faith give such notice to the defts. as aforesaid. Yet that the defts. afterwards, and not acting bona fide in the belief that they were acting as such justices aforesaid, or that they were acting in conformity with law, but wilfully, wrongfully and of set purpose disregarding the said notice and the duty of the defts. as such justices as aforesaid, and knowingly and wilfully disregarding and disobeying the statute in such case made and provided, and wrongfully and oppressively and contrary to law assuming to act as such justices as aforesaid, in the matters of the said complaint, when they knew they had not jurisdiction to proceed further thereupon, or to make or give any other direction or judgment upon the matters of the said complaint; and, notwithstanding such disputing by the now plts., and such notice thereof to them the defts. given as aforesaid, proceeded to give and did give judgment in respect of the matters of the said complaint, and did then make a certain order in writing under the hands and seals of them the defts. for the payment by the plts. of the said sum of 8*l.*, together with a sum of money for costs, in which order the plts. were described by the name or style of "Joseph Pease and others, owners of the St. Helen's Colliery," and which said order by the defts. so made as aforesaid was as follows:—

"Order for payment of church rates."

"Durham to wit,—Whereas information and complaint have been made unto Henry Stobart, Esq., one of her Majesty's justices of the peace in and for the said county, by David Vitty, one of the churchwardens of the chapelry of St. Helen's Auckland, in the said county, that J. Pease and Co., owners of St. Helen's Colliery, in the county aforesaid, have refused and still do refuse to pay to him, the said David Vitty, as such churchwarden as aforesaid, the sum of 8*l.*, being the sum duly rated and assessed in the churchwarden's rate, made the 28th April 1858, and which is now justly due from the said J. Pease and Co. unto him, the said David Vitty, as such churchwarden. And whereas by summons under the hand and seal of the said H. Stobart, so being such justice as aforesaid, the said J. Pease and Co. have been duly summoned to appear before us, George Pearson Wilkinson, clerk, and Henry Chaytor, Esq., two of her Majesty's justices of the peace in and for the said county, being the county where the church is situated, in respect whereof the said rates have been made, and being neither of us patron of the said church, nor in any way interested in any of the rights, dues, or other payments belonging to the said church; we, the said justices, therefore having considered the premises, and having also duly examined into the merits and truth of the said complaint upon oath, do find that there is justly due the aforesaid sum of 8*l.* from the said J. Pease and Co. to the said David Vitty, as such churchwarden as aforesaid, and do order and direct the said J. Pease and Co. to pay or cause to be paid the same unto the said David Vitty, together with the further sum of 9*s.* for such costs and charges concerning the premises as upon the merits of the case do appear to us to be just and reasonable. Given under our hands and seals at Bishop Auckland, in the said county, the 6th Jan. 1859."

And which said order was afterwards removed into the court of our Lady the Queen, before the Queen herself here, by virtue of our said Lady the Queen's writ of certiorari, issuing out of the said court, and under the seal thereof, and which same order was afterwards, and before the commencement of this suit, quashed by the judgment and consideration of the said court here; and the plts. further say that, after the making of the said order by the defts. so made unlawfully and without jurisdiction, and before the removal thereof into the said court here, the defts. having notice of the premises, and that the said order was null and void, and of no force or effect in law, and that they, the defts., as such justices, had no jurisdiction, power, or authority to act further in the matters of the said complaint, and no jurisdiction, power, or authority, by distress and sale of the goods of the plts. or otherwise howsoever, to levy the said sums of money by the said order of the defts. so wrongfully and unlawfully ordered to be paid by the plts.; yet, nevertheless, the defts. further wilfully, wrongfully and unlawfully assuming to act as such justices, and for the purpose of unlawfully and wrongfully levying the amount of the said sums of money in and by the said order so unlawfully and wrongfully ordered to be made by distress and sale of the goods of the plts., by their warrant under the hands and seals of them, the defts., and directed to the constable of West Auckland and all other peace-officers in the said county of Durham, did unlawfully and wrongfully command the said constable and peace-officers in her said Majesty's name forthwith to make distress of the goods and chattels of the plts., who were described as J. Pease and Co., and which said warrant of the defts. was and is in these words:

"To the constable of West Auckland and to all other peace officers in the county of Durham.

"Durham to wit.—Whereas, on the 16th Dec. last past, complaint was made to H. Stobart, Esq., one of her Majesty's justices of the peace in and for the said county of Durham, by David Vitty, one of the churchwardens of the chapelry of St. Helen's Auckland, in the said county, for that J. Pease and Co., owners of the St. Helen's Colliery, in the said county, being persons commonly called Quakers, had refused and neglected within six calendar months then last past, on demand duly made, and still did refuse and neglect to pay unto the said David Vitty, as one of the churchwardens of the chapelry of St. Helen's Auckland aforesaid, the sum of 8*l.*, being the sum duly rated and assessed upon the said J. Pease and Co. in the churchwardens' rate for the same chapelry made the 28th April last, and justly due from them J. Pease and others unto the said D. Vitty, as such churchwarden, and whereof the validity or the liability of the said J. Pease and Co. to pay the said rate had not been questioned in any Ecclesiastical Court, and afterwards, to wit, on the 3rd of Dec. last, at the justice-room in Bishop Auckland in the said county, the said parties appeared before the justices then and there present, and the hearing of the said case was adjourned to the 6th Jan. last, and on the 6th Jan. last, at the justice-room in Bishop Auckland aforesaid, the parties appeared before us, George Pearson Wilkinson, clerk, and Henry Chaytor, Esq., two of her Majesty's justices of the peace of and acting in and for the said county, being the county where the church is situated in respect whereof the said rates have been made, and being neither of us patron of the said church, nor in any way interested in any of the rights, dues, or other payments belonging to the said church, to be further dealt with according to law; and thereupon having considered the matter of the said complaint, and having also duly examined into the merits and truth of the said complaint upon oath, it appeared to us, the said justices, that there were justly due the aforesaid sum of 8*l.* from the said J. Pease and Co. to the said D. Vitty as such churchwarden; and we adjudged the said J. Pease to pay to the said D. Vitty, as such churchwarden, the sum of 8*l.*, and also to pay to the said D. Vitty, as such churchwarden, the sum of 9*s.* for his costs in that behalf; and we thereby ordered that if the several sums should not be paid, the same should be levied by distress and sale of the goods and chattels of the said J. Pease and others. And whereas the said J. Pease and others have not paid the said several sums of 8*l.* 9*s.*, or any part thereof, but therein have made default. These are therefore to command you, in her Majesty's name, forthwith to make distress of the goods and chattels of the said J. Pease and Co., and if within the space of four days after the making of such distress the said last-mentioned sums, together with the reasonable charges of taking and keeping the said distress, shall not be paid, that then you do sell the said goods and chattels so by you distrained, and do pay the money arising from such sale unto William Trotter, the clerk of the justices of the peace for the north-west division of Darlington Ward, in the said county, that he may pay and apply the same as by law directed, and may render the overplus (if any), on demand, to the said J. Pease, and if no such distress can be found, then that you certify the same unto us, to the end that such proceedings may be had therein as to the law doth appertain.

"Given under our hands and seals, 3rd Feb. 1859, at Bishop Auckland aforesaid.

(Signed)

"HENRY CHAYTOR.

"G. P. WILKINSON."

And by virtue of which said warrant of the defts. so wrongfully and unlawfully made and issued and delivered to the said constable and peace officers, divers of the cattle, goods and chattels of the plts. were unlawfully and wrongfully seized, taken and distrained, whereby the now plts. were obliged to apply and did apply to her said Majesty's said court here for and obtain a writ of certiorari, which issued out of and under the seal of the said court here, to remove the said order, with all things touching the same, unto the said court here, and after the said order had been and was by virtue of the same writ removed and brought into the said court here, were also obliged to apply and did apply to the said court here for and obtained a rule and order of the said court here to quash the said order of the defts., and were also obliged to cause the said order of the defts. to be and the same was accordingly quashed by the said court, and certain cattle, goods and chattels of the plts. having been seized under and by virtue of the said warrant of distress, the plts. were put to and incurred great expenses, costs and charges in and about and for the purpose of making the said applications to the said court of her said Majesty here, in and about the preparing, obtaining, issuing and serving the said rules, and in and about the quashing of the said order of the defts. and in and about the proceedings necessarily incident thereto and to the matters aforesaid. And the plts. were otherwise injured, vexed, harassed and oppressed, and suffered great damage by reason of the premises in this count mentioned.

Demurrer to the declaration.

There were demurrers to the defts.' pleas, but these were abandoned by the plts.; and there was also a second count in the declaration, to which there was a demurrer, but the count was substantially the same as the first count, the difference being that the cause of action arose upon another rate that was due.

Hindmarch in support of the declaration.—It appears that the point relied upon by the defts. is, that the count should have alleged that the defts. acted maliciously. It is submitted on behalf of the plts. that that is unnecessary, inasmuch as the declaration sufficiently shows that the defts. acted without jurisdiction. The jurisdiction to enforce the payment of church-rates under a certain amount is given to magistrates by the 53 Geo. 3, c. 127, s. 7; and that enactment contains this proviso, "that if the validity of such rate, or the liability of the person from whom it is demanded to pay the same, be disputed, and the party disputing the same give notice thereof to the justices, the justices shall forbear giving judgment thereupon." The averments in the declaration meet the case provided for in the proviso; and it was the duty therefore of the defts. to have held their hands, as their jurisdiction then ceased. Having, however, assumed to go on, they have rendered themselves liable to an action, and the remaining question is, whether the case falls within the 1st or 2nd sections of the 11 & 12 Vict. c. 44 (an Act to protect justices of the peace from vexatious actions for acts done by them in execution of their office). Sect. 1 enacts, "That every action hereafter to be brought against any justice of the peace for any act done by him in the execution of his duty as such justice with respect to any matter within his jurisdiction as such justice, shall be an action on the case as for a tort; and in the declaration it shall be expressly alleged that such act was done maliciously and without reasonable and probable cause, and if at the trial of any such action, upon the general issue being pleaded, the plt. shall fail to prove such allegation, he shall be nonsuit, or a verdict shall be given for the defts." The 2nd section enacts, "That for any act done by a justice of the peace in a matter of which by law he has not jurisdiction, or in which he shall have exceeded his jurisdiction, any person injured thereby, or by any act done under any conviction or order made, or warrant issued by such justice in any such matter, may maintain an action against such justice in the same form and in the same case as he might have done before, the passing of this Act, without making any allegation in his declaration that the act complained of was done maliciously and without reasonable and probable cause." The case of Somerville v. Mirehouse, 3 L. T. Rep. N.S. 294, will be relied upon for the defts.; but that is distinguishable; that was the case of an erroneous decision by magistrates upon a matter within their general jurisdiction; but this is a proceeding where they had no jurisdiction at all. [COCKBURN, C.J.—Would the magistrates here not have had to decide whether a bonâ fide dispute as to the validity of the rate existed?] The declaration meets that case. It avers that at the hearing there was no evidence that the plts. did not, in fact or in good faith, dispute the validity of the rate, or give notice thereof, yet, &c. &c. The demurrer admits all these averments; and if it was intended to rely on this, that the magistrates found that the rate was not bonâ fide disputed, that is matter of defence which should be pleaded to this declaration: (Barton v. Bricknell, 13 Q. B. 393; Leary v. Patrick, 15 Q.B. 266. If any point should be taken about the plts. being Quakers, the case of Backhouse v. The Churchwardens of Bishop Wearmouth, 9 C. B., N. S., 315, shows that they are entitled to the protection of the proviso in 53 Geo. 3, c. 127, s. 7.

PEASE AND OTHERS v. CHAYTOR AND ANOTHER.

Heath for the defts.—It appears, on the face of the warrant, that the plts. were Quakers, and therefore the 7 & 8 Will. 3, c. 34, s. 4, governs the summary proceedings against them before the magistrates; and if so, the magistrates had jurisdiction. [By the COURT.—The 53 Geo. 3, c. 127, s. 7, is an Act applicable to all her Majesty's subjects, and therefore to Quakers among others; and not the less so because the 7 & 8 Will. 3, c. 34, s. 4, was especially applicable to them. This was decided in Backhouse v. The Churchwardens of Bishop Wearmouth. We are bound by that decision.] The following cases were then cited:—Tozer v. Child, 7 E. & B. 377; The Marshalsea case, 10 Co. Rep. 68; Garnett v. Ferrand, 6 B. & C. 611; Hamond v. Howell, 1 Mod. 134; Ackerley v. Parkinson, 3 M. & S. 411; Theobald v. Crickmore, 1 B. & Ald. 227.

Hindmarsh in reply.

COCKBURN, C. J.—I am of opinion that the declaration is good. The question turns on the true construction of the 53 Geo. 3, c. 127, s. 7, which must be looked at with reference to the facts disclosed in the declaration. We must take it as admitted on the record, that upon the information against the plts. for nonpayment of these church-rates coming on to be heard, the plts. bonâ fide disputed the validity of the rate, and their liability to pay it, and gave the necessary notice thereof to the magistrates, and that the magistrates were satisfied that that notice was bonâ fide given, and that there was a bonâ fide dispute as to the validity of the rate, but that they nevertheless proceeded in defiance of these facts to deliberate upon and to determine the case. Now the jurisdiction, as regards magistrates, to act in case of nonpayment of church-rates, is given for the first time by the 53 Geo. 3, c. 127, and in the same section which gives the jurisdiction (sect. 7), there immediately follows the enactment giving the jurisdiction this proviso, "that if the validity of such rate, or the liability of the person from whom it is demanded to pay the same, be disputed, and the party disputing the same shall give notice thereof to the justices, the justices shall forbear giving judgment thereupon." The effect of the enactment, coupled with the proviso, is to give jurisdiction to the magistrates to enforce the payment of rates except in cases where the validity of the rate, or liability of the person summoned to pay the same, is disputed. I admit that the question whether the validity of the church-rate is bonâ fide disputed, and whether notice of the intention to dispute it has been properly given to the magistrates, is a question which it is competent to the magistrates to decide at the hearing of the information; but if it is intended to rely on this, that the magistrates decided that there was not a bonâ fide dispute as to the validity of the rate, or that proper notice was not given, that is matter in the nature of a plea to this declaration. In this case the magistrates had these facts before them, and they had no cause to believe that the validity of the rate was not bonâ fide disputed, or that due notice thereof had not been given to them, and therefore there being a valid plea to the jurisdiction of the magistrates, they were ousted of their jurisdiction, and they had but one course to pursue, viz. to forbear from giving judgment upon the case. From that moment the parties were in the same position as if the 53 Geo. 3, c. 127, s. 7, which gave them their jurisdiction in the first instance, had not passed; notwithstanding which they proceeded to give judgment and make an order, and issue their warrant for levying the rate by distress, under which the plts.' goods were seized. Upon these facts, therefore, I am of opinion that the plts. are entitled to our judgment upon this demurrer.

WIGHTMAN, J.—I am of the same opinion. The plts. in the declaration complain that the magistrates, without any jurisdiction so to do, have issued a warrant of distress, under which the plts.' goods have been seized. The question is, whether the magistrates had jurisdiction so to do, or whether this is a case in which there is some irregularity merely in the proceedings, and it is necessary therefore in the declaration to aver that the magistrates acted maliciously and without reasonable and probable cause. It appears to me, upon the facts stated in the declaration, that they issued their warrant without jurisdiction when they found that the validity of the rate was bonâ fide disputed, and notice was given to them that the parties bonâ fide intended to dispute it, and that they ought then to have held their hands and forbore giving judgment in the case. It appears clear upon the declaration that the plts. intended bonâ fide to dispute the validity of the rate, and gave notice of their intention so to do, and that no attempt was made to impugn their good faith; and that the defts., knowing all this, and although they had no jurisdiction in the matter, nevertheless proceeded to give judgment and issue their warrant of distress. I think, therefore, that the declaration may be supported, although it does not allege that the defts. acted maliciously, and without reasonable and probable cause.

BLACKBURN, J.—I am of the same opinion. The jurisdiction is given to the magistrates by the 53 Geo. 3, c. 127, s. 7. It appears quite sufficiently upon the declaration that there really existed a bonâ fide dispute as to the validity of the rate, and that notice thereof was properly given to the magistrates at the hearing. The magistrates should therefore have forbore to give judgment in the case. It might have been that the magistrates erroneously decided that a bonâ fide dispute as to the validity of the rate did not exist, and in such a case their proceeding to give judgment would have been wrong, and their judgment void, and their acting in the matter would have brought them within 11 & 12 Vict. c. 44, s. 1. The 11 & 12 Vict. c. 44, ss. 1, 2, has been said on several occasions to be one that it is very difficult to construe. Upon this declaration I agree with my learned brothers that we must construe the language as asserting that the magistrates did not wrongly determine that there was no bona fide intention to dispute the validity of the rate, but that knowing that there was a bona fide intention to dispute it, they chose to go on and give judgment in the case, and that therefore they have rendered themselves liable, within sect. 2 of 11 & 12 Vict. c. 44, for acting without jurisdiction.

REG. v. R. J. ELRINGTON AND H. H. ELRINGTON.

Indictment—Aggravated assault—Previous dismissal by justices and certificate granted—Demurrer.

A certificate of justices of the dismissal of an information for a common assault may be pleaded in bar to an indictment founded upon the same assault, though the assault in such indictment is alleged as having caused grievous bodily harm.

An information was laid against the defts. before justices for a common assault. Upon the hearing it was dismissed, and the justices granted their certificate of such dismissal pursuant to sect. 27 of the 9 Geo. 4, c. 31. The prosecutor then preferred an indictment against the defts. upon the same facts, and inserted therein three counts: the first for an assault, doing grievous bodily harm; second, for an assault, causing actual bodily harm; and, third, for a common assault. To this indictment the defts. pleaded the former information for the assault, its dismissal, and the certificate of justices; to which pleas the prosecutor demurred:

Held, that the certificate granted by the justices was a bar to the indictment.

This was a demurrer to certain pleas to an indictment.

It appeared that on the 6th Sept. 1860 an information was laid before certain justices acting for the division of Brentford, Middlesex, by Edward Hamilton Finney, against the two defts., for a common assault. Upon the hearing of such information upon the 10th of the same month, the justices dismissed it as not proved, and thereupon they gave the defts. a certificate thereof, pursuant to sect. 27 of 9 Geo. 4, c. 31. Subsequently, on the 23rd of the same month, the prosecutor preferred an indictment at the Middlesex sessions against the two defts., in respect of the same transaction. The indictment, however, contained three counts: first, for assaulting and doing grievous bodily harm; secondly, for assaulting and doing actual bodily harm; thirdly, for a common assault. This indictment the prosecutor afterwards removed into this court by certiorari. Each of the defts. pleaded to each count the former hearing and dismissal of the information for the assault, and the granting of the certificate, and that the assaults mentioned in the indictment are one and the same as that adjudicated upon by the said justices, and in respect of which the said certificate was granted. The prosecutor demurred to the pleas to the first and second counts of the indictment. The ground of demurrer was, that the offence stated in the two first counts of the indictment was not the same offence as that stated in the pleas and the certificates.

By sect. 28 of the 9 Geo. 4, c. 31, it is enacted that "if any person against whom any such complaint shall have been preferred for any common assault or battery shall have obtained such certificate as aforesaid, . . . in every such case he shall be released from all further or other proceedings, civil or criminal, for the same cause."

Kibton (Collins with him) now appeared in support of the demurrer, and contended that a certificate granted upon a dismissal of an information for a common assault is no bar under the statute to an indictment for an assault inflicting grievous bodily harm: (Re Thompson, 9 W. Rep. 203.) [BLACKBURN, J.—The case of Reg. v. Walker, 2 Moo. & Rob. 446, is a strong authority against you. There it was held that a plea of autrefois convict of an assault before justices, under the 9 Geo. 4, c. 31, is a bar to an indictment for feloniously stabbing in the same transaction.] That was merely the decision of a single judge upon circuit. [BLACKBURN, J.—It was the decision of an eminent judge, Coltman, J., and the facts in that case were stronger than those in the present case. COCKBURN, C. J.—The inconvenience of such a prosecution is palpable: a man is punished for a common assault by the magistrates, and yet you say you may afterwards indict upon the same facts for an aggravated assault, so that he would not only be twice tried, but twice punished.] But the judge in such a case would take notice of his first punishment and deal with him accordingly. The summary powers of the justices are confined by the statute to common assaults. [COCKBURN, C. J.—May it not have been the intention of the Legislature to give the justices a discretion to deal with such a case as they might think proper? Suppose the party had been tried upon an indictment for a common assault and acquitted or convicted, and should be afterwards indicted for an aggravated assault; could he be convicted, the facts being the same?] It is not certain that it would be a bar. But an indictment differs from an information, for in an indictment the prosecutor shapes his charge as he likes, but upon an information it is the justices who, in fact, shape the charge, for they deal with it as they like. [COCKBURN, C. J.—The case of Reg. v. Stanton, 5 Cox Crim. Cas. 324, is a very strong authority against you. There it was held that a conviction for an assault under the statute, followed by payment of the fine or endurance of the imprisonment, may be pleaded in bar of an indictment for felony in respect of the same assault charging an assault and wounding with intent to murder. There the learned judge felt so strongly upon the point, that although the prior summary conviction was not pleaded, yet, as it came to his knowledge in the course of the trial, he acted upon it and imposed no actual punishment.] That case does not appear to have been argued. Many instances may be suggested in which great injustice would be done by preventing a prosecutor from preferring an indictment for an aggravated assault. The justices may choose to treat such an assault as a merely common assault, impose a nominal fine, or dismiss the charge, and so a great offender might escape.

Robinson and Poland, contra, were not called upon.

COCKBURN, C. J.—I am of opinion that there must be judgment for the defts. We cannot speculate upon hypothetical cases when we are dealing with a demurrer. Upon the facts as stated it appears that there was an information before justices for a common assault. Upon the hearing of that information it was dismissed by them, and they granted their certificate under the statute. The prosecutor then prefers an indictment in respect of the very same transaction, and the defts. then plead the former information and certificate as a bar. Now the Act of Parliament expressly enacts that when the justices dismiss an information for a common assault they may grant a certificate, which is to be a bar to all further or other proceedings, civil or criminal, for the same cause. Then how was it in this case? Here the magistrates did hear the information, and they dismissed it and gave a certificate. There is then an indictment preferred, and not only is there a count for a common assault, but in respect of the very same transaction two other counts are added, merely varying the character of the assault. Now upon this very question we have two decided cases, Reg. v. Walker, and Reg. v. Stanton, in both of which the learned judges held that the former proceeding upon the information before the justices was a bar to an indictment founded upon the same assault. I think those decisions were correct. There may possibly be some inconvenience occasionally arising out of this state of the law, as referred to by Mr. Ribton; but it is a fundamental rule of law that out of the same facts a series of charges shall not be preferred. The words of the statute are express, and this case clearly comes within them.

BLACKBURN, J.—I am of the same opinion. The statute gives the justices a power to decide upon a charge of a common assault, and it authorises them to give a certificate, which is to be a bar to all further proceedings, civil or criminal, for the same cause. Mr. Ribton suggests a possible case—that when a party complains of one thing, the justices may adjudicate upon another; but here the party went before the justices and made a complaint of a common assault. In such a case the statute gives the magistrates three alternatives—they may convict the party, or they may dismiss the complaint, or they may commit for trial. Now it seems to me, that the assault and battery, though stated in the two first counts with aggravation, are the same assault and battery upon which the justices adjudicated. Reg. v. Walker is certainly precisely in point. It would be extremely inconvenient if, when the justices have adjudicated, their decision could in fact be reviewed by the sessions upon another charge upon the same facts.

FITZGERALD v. CHAMPNEYS.

Injunction—Church Building Acts—District parishes—Rights of incumbents to publish banns and celebrate marriages in—Local Act—Construction of, with reference to Public General Act—New Parishes Act 1856.

The incumbent of a district parish created such by a private Act of Parliament, will not be allowed to restrain the incumbent of the mother church from publishing banns and celebrating marriages between persons resident in the district-parish, nor from receiving ecclesiastical dues.

The provisions of a local Act governing a district-parish remain in force, where they are not specially repealed by the Public Church Building Acts.

The general Acts 7 & 8 Vict. c. 37, the 7 & 8 Vict. c. 94, and the 19 & 20 Vict. c. 104 (Lord Blandford's Act), considered in connection with a private local Act, 56 Geo. 3, c. xxxix. for the building, &c., of a district-church.

This was a bill filed by the incumbent of Camden-down Chapel, describing himself as "the incumbent of the new parish of Camden-town," against the vicar of the parish of St. Pancras, to have it declared that the district described in an order in council of the 26th Dec. 1851 as the district chapelry of Camden-town became on the avoidance of the vicarage of St. Pancras by the last incumbent thereof a new parish; and that the plt., as incumbent of such new parish, was solely entitled to publish banns of matrimony, and to solemnise marriages between persons usually resident in such parish; that the plt., as such incumbent, was entitled to receive for his own use and benefit the fees payable in respect of such marriages; and solely entitled to collect and receive all Easter offerings and other ecclesiastical dues payable and paid by persons residing within the boundaries of such new parish; for an account and payment to plt. of such, lately received by the vicar of the mother church; and for an injunction to restrain him from publishing such banns of matrimony and solemnising such marriages and receiving the Easter offerings and ecclesiastical dues in future.

The case made by the bill, the facts of which were not disputed, was the following:—

By a local Act of Parliament, passed in 1816 (56 Geo. 3, c. xxxix.) "for the building a new parish church and parochial chapel in the parish of St. Pancras, and for other purposes relating thereto," and which was declared to have the effect of a public Act, certain trustees were enabled to purchase land for the purpose of erecting there a new parish church and a parochial chapel. By the 42nd section it was enacted that such new church, when erected and consecrated, should from thenceforth be called and known by the name, and should, to all intents and purposes, be the parish church of the parish of St. Pancras, and that Divine service, the solemnisation of matrimony, burial of the dead, and all other matters and things whatever which were or of right had been used to be celebrated, solemnised, administered, had, done, or performed in the parish church, should and might from and immediately after the consecration of the said new church be celebrated, solemnised, administered, had, done and performed in such and the like manner, in the said new church, and vaults and catacombs to be built under the same. By the 43rd section the then vicar of St. Pancras was to be the minister of the said new church, and after death or avoidance the person to be nominated and appointed minister was to be entitled to receive the oblations, &c., and other ecclesiastical dues. By 45th section the church was to be called Camden Chapel, and the usual divine service, and the other ecclesiastical duties performed as the vicar of the parish for the time being should think fit to direct and appoint, except only the solemnisation of matrimony and publication of banns of marriage as after mentioned. There were other sections as to the appointment of assistant ministers, &c., and performance of the duties by the ministers.

The trustees, under the powers conferred by this Act, purchased certain lands, and built the church and chapel, which were duly consecrated and called Camden Chapel.

In the year 1851 an order in council, on the representation of the then vicar, dated 26th Dec in that year, was obtained and published in the Gazette, in the usual way, an assignment of a district was directed adjoining Camden Chapel, and was to be called a district parish of St. Pancras. This order was duly enrolled and registered, but the representations and order in council were not concurred in by the patron of the said parish of St. Pancras, nor by the trustees for putting the local Act into execution.

The bill then set out the provisions of the 11th, 12th, 14th, 15th and 30th sections of the 19 & 20 Vict. c. 104 (Lord Blandford's Act 1856), being an Act to extend the provisions of the 6 & 7 Vict. c. 37, for making better provision for the spiritual care of populous parishes, and further to provide for the formation and endowment of separate and distinct parishes.

These sections are severally referred to and commented upon in the V. C.'s judgment.

In 1858 the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, acting in pursuance of the New Parishes Act 1856, on the application of the plt., and with consent of the bishop, authorised the publication of banns and solemnisation of marriages, baptisms and churchings in Camden Chapel.

On the 10th July 1860 an avoidance of the incumbency of the parish of St. Pancras took place in consequence of the resignation of the then vicar (Canon Dale), and on the 27th July 1860 the deft. was duly presented, admitted, instituted and inducted to the vicarage under the last-mentioned Act of Parliament; the plt. alleged that the district chapelry of Camden-town became, upon the happening of such avoidance, and was in fact, "the new parish of Camden-town," and that he was entitled to style himself "the incumbent of such new parish," and he submitted that he had the sole right of publishing banns and solemnising marriages within such new parish; that the fees in respect thereof were payable to the plt. and not to the deft.; and that he had also the sole right of receiving the Easter offerings and other ecclesiastical dues within the district of such new parish.

Willcock, Q.C., J. C. Traill and W. Brandt for the plt.

Giffard, Q.C. and N. Lindley, for the deft. the vicar, contended that the provisions of the Pancras Local Act, before referred to, were not affected by the various General Church Building Acts, such provisions not having been expressly repealed by them or either of them; that the district chapelry of Camden-town had never been constituted into a new parish. They also contended that the fees, &c., which the present vicar had received were for work and labour done by him in respect of the performances of the particular ceremonies at which he had assisted.

In addition to the several Acts of Parliament, local and general, before referred to, the following cases were cited: Vaughan v. The South Metropolitan Cemetery Company, 1 Joh. & Hem. 257; S. C. 3 L. T. Rep. N. S. 727 (and printed therefrom by the parties); Jackson v. Courtney, 8 Ell. & Bl. 8; The Birkenhead Dock Company v. Laird, 4 De G. M. & G. 732; King v. Alston, 12 Q. B. Rep. 976; London and Blackwall Railway Company v. Limehouse Board of Works, 3 K. & J. 123.

The VICE-CHANCELLOR said:—The point in this case, although a very full argument has been had upon it, is really one which is brought within narrow limits. It depends simply, as it appears to me, upon the construction of the General Public Acts of the 2 & 3 Vict., with relation to the condition of populous parishes, as contrasted with the local Acts which have been passed for the parish of St. Pancras with reference to the Camden Chapel, as one of such. Now the local Act was an Act of a very precise character, which recited that there was the old parish church, which was in a condition making it expedient that it should no longer continue to be the parish church, but that a new one should be built. It was expedient that that should be treated as a chapel. There is another chapel, called Kentish-town Chapel, in existence, and there was the one in question contemplated. Taking notice, therefore, of the intention to build a new parish church, and the intention to convert the old one into a chapel of ease, which, together with the Kentish-town and Camden-town chapels, when built, would form three chapels with this one parish church, there is a complete, elaborate, and somewhat minute arrangement, by which the vicar is put in this position—he is to be the incumbent of the parish church, he is to name and present to the licence of the bishop gentlemen who are to officiate in the several chapels, those gentlemen when licensed by the bishop are to be completely under the direction of the vicar, they are not to depend upon him for their stipend (that is provided for in another way), but they are to perform in those chapels such duties as he may assign, except the solemnising of matrimony, which it seems he has not even himself the power of delegating—that was left to the state of things as it might be under the existing law; with that exception he is to direct entirely what is to be done in those churches, they are to be under his control in that respect; in fact they are to be under his control in every respect, except that there are licensed and irremovable curates, and their salaries are provided for in a special manner by the 47th clause, which directs that for the maintenance and support for the time being respectively of such minister to the present church to be called the parish chapel, and also the minister to the said chapel so to be erected, the said trustees shall, by and out of the fees to be received and the rates directed to be made under and by virtue of this Act, yearly and every year well and truly pay, or cause to be paid, to each of such ministers or curates respectively for the time being a sum of not less than 150*l.*, nor more than 200*l.* per annum, without any deduction or abatement whatsoever. The Act is not very clear, but it is elucidated afterwards by the 1 & 2 Geo 4, as to the exact mode in which these salaries shall be paid: the expression here is "out of the fees to be received, and the rates directed to be made;" that seems rather more to apply to the pew-rents than anything else, and a direction is made by the subsequent Act that the pew-rents shall be applied in that manner. It is sufficient to say, as far as this Act is concerned, there is a complete arrangement made, by which the incumbent has to a great extent the control over those who may serve in those several chapels, and several trustees named and appointed in the Act, with provision for their succession, are to be the persons to receive the funds to be collected under that Act, certain rates which have since ceased; they were to collect all the pew-rents and certain fees which are specially mentioned, which rather had more bearing upon the burial fees to be collected for the parochial officers than any special purpose. That being the case, and these special arrangements being made, the 58 Geo. 3 is passed, which constituted that body known as the Church Building Commissioners. Those Church Building Commissioners had by that Act large general powers, making two distinct arrangements: the one was the building of churches; the other was the separation of districts for those churches which they should so build, and those districts they might separate either into district parishes for all purposes, with the consent of the bishop only, without requiring the consent of the patron and incumbent, and which were to be fixed by metes and bounds, and when so separated were to have certain jurisdictions with reference to the district parishes so separated. The 21st section of the Act of Geo 3 says: "That in any case in which the said commissioners shall be of opinion that it is not expedient to divide any populous parish or extra-parochial place into such complete, separate and distinct parishes as aforesaid, but that it is expedient to divide the same into such ecclesiastical districts as they, with the consent of the bishop, signified under his hand and seal, may deem necessary for the purpose of affording accommodation for the attending divine service according to the rites of the United Church of England and Ireland, to persons residing therein, in the churches and parochial chapels already built, or additional churches or chapels to be built therein, and as may appear to such commissioners to be convenient for the enabling the spiritual person or persons who may serve such churches or chapels to perform all ecclesiastical duties within the district to such respective churches and chapels, and for the due ecclesiastical superintendence of such district, and the preservation and improvement of the religious and moral habits and so on. They are to make the boundary, and then in any case in which the said commissioners shall be of opinion that it is not expedient any such division into such ecclesiastical districts as aforesaid should be made, the commissioners may build, or aid the building, of any additional chapels in any such parishes or extra-parochial places, to be served by curates to be respectively nominated and appointed by the respective incumbents of the churches of the respective parishes or extra-parochial places and licensed by the bishop of the diocese, such curates to be paid such salaries as shall be assigned by the said commissioners under the provisions of this Act in manner hereinafter directed. That is one of the things they have power to do. That was not the actual case of an ecclesiastical district, but a case where something short of an ecclesiastical district is to be made; they are to have certain powers of causing curates to be named, and the commissioners are the persons to provide them their salaries. Further than that, there are several other consequences which seem to me to arise on looking through the Act, from the circumstance of the district itself being alone formed. Now there is an arrangement with regard to the district chapels. It is further enacted, "that every church and chapel built or acquired under the provisions of this Act, and appropriated to any district or parish, so made under the provisions of this Act, shall be deemed a perpetual curacy and shall be considered in law as a benefice representative, so far only as the licence thereto shall operate in the same manner as institution to any such benefice, and shall render voidable other livings in like manner as institution to any such benefice, and the spiritual person serving the same shall be deemed the incumbent thereof. And all persons shall be subject to all jurisdictions and laws, ecclesiastical or common, and to all provisions, regulations, penalties and forfeitures contained in any Acts of Parliament in force." Then it is further enacted in the 27th section, which is important, "that all Acts of Parliament, laws and customs, relating to publishing banns of marriage, marriages, christenings, churchings and burials, and the registering thereof, to all ecclesiastical fees, oblations or offerings, shall apply to separate and distinct parishes and district parishes when they shall so become complete, separate and distinct parishes under the provisions of this Act after the death, resignation, or other avoidance of the existing incumbents respectively in each parish or extra-parochial place, and to the churches and chapels thereof, and to the ecclesiastical persons having cure of souls, or serving the same in like manner in every respect as if the same respectively had been anciently separate and distinct parishes and parish churches by law, to all intents and purposes." Then there are certain provisions about how banns shall be published and marriages solemnised; and then there are arrangements also with reference to the fees in case there should be such separation of the parish into a district parish. All this of course is extremely inconsistent with the arrangement which had been made by which the incumbent was to remain having the control over the several ministers of those chapels, directing what they should do, and what they should not do with regard to the ecclesiastical offices in their several chapels. Without stopping to consider a minor question of law created by the defective wording of the 58 Geo. 3, c. 45, and the 59 Geo. 3, assuming, as I would in trying the question in limine, that those words had been as large as the 2 & 3 Vict. c. 49, "any augmented church or chapel," the question would arise which was discussed in the case of The Birkenhead Railway Company v. Laird, 4 De G. M. & G., how far, where you find a special Act of Parliament creating special rights and enforcing special duties, it could be taken as repealed by a subsequent general Act which makes no reference to it. In that case it is mentioned that certain provisions were made with reference to leases by tenants in tail, which were held not to apply to a special Act of Parliament, by which certain tenants in tail were enabled to grant certain leases; that was held not in any way to affect that special Act.

[MAG. CAS.]

So I add the illustration of the Fines and Recoveries Act lately passed, in which, in the largest words, every tenant in tail is authorised to bar his entail, even including those estates tail in which the reversion is not in the Crown, which former could not be barred. Yet nobody could think of arguing, or could argue successfully, that this provision would affect the entail made by special Acts of Parliament, such as the Marlborough, the Wellington, and the Shrewsbury entail. The reason was simply this: the Legislature having had its attention directed to a special subject, having observed all the circumstances of the case, having provided for all its circumstances, does not intend, by a general enactment, afterwards to derogate from its own act, for it is the act of the Legislature by which this special Act of Parliament is made law; they are not to be supposed to derogate from that which they have carefully supervised and regulated by a general Act of Parliament applicable to all cases making no special mention of their intention to derogate from this Act. It has been argued that it is to be supposed that for all time these persons who might be connected with this particular church, this parish chapel and its neighbourhood, were to be precluded from the advantage intended to be conferred by the general Acts of the 58 & 59 Geo. 3. So far as the general Act will interfere with the special Act, of course not. So far as the two can hold together, as far as the one set of arrangements does not clash with the other set of arrangements, they will have every benefit, and they have had it, for it appears that churches were built by the Church Commissioners in this district, and as far as I am at present advised I see nothing to prevent assignment of districts to churches built by the Church Commissioners, or any church not affected by the special Act. But when you ask me whether they are intended for all time to be excluded from the benefit of general legislation, the simple answer is, not a moment longer than Parliament chose to express its intention. If Parliament thought a special arrangement was injudicious it could in the next or even the same session of Parliament alter the arrangements which they considered injudicious. It cannot be contended that any inference is to be formed from the supposed absurdity of leaving those persons under a special Act, whereas others have all the benefit of the general Act. The simple answer is that Parliament has done so. If it had been thought desirable to sweep into the general provisions of the Act the persons affected by the local Act they would have said so. There is an instance of that in Lord Blandford's Act, in one of the clauses, where it says expressly this, it is the first clause: "It shall be lawful to constitute districts under the provisions of the said Acts, notwithstanding there may be within the limits of any such districts a consecrated church or chapel, any local Act to the contrary notwithstanding." If Parliament meant the 58 & 59 Geo. 3 to apply to a case where they had given special directions, they would say it may be done notwithstanding the special directions given in any local Act. That is the only true and effective mode of dealing with places which Parliament has dealt with by special legislation. Now, no doubt the case would stand in that way, as it seems to me, as if it rested on the local Act of Geo. 3 alone; but when you come to the Acts of 1 & 2 Geo. 4, c. 24, it becomes a stronger case than any of the cases cited on the subsequent matter; because what do you find in the 1 & 2 Geo. 4, but this—that the Acts of the 58 & 59 Geo. 3, having been passed, the commissioners are minded in this very parish of St. Pancras to build certain churches, and they build two churches; but this then occurs to the Legislature, as expressed in the 1 & 2 Geo. 4, that even as regards those new churches the special clause which the Legislature has pointed out is in its mind so preferable as regards the parish of St. Pancras in particular, that they say even as regards the new churches built by the commissioners the Legislature preferred that this special course of legislation adopted at St. Pancras shall to this extent be continued: that whereas we had vested the chapel in trustees, and given them certain powers under the local Act, with certain directions as to the vicar, and so on, we will put all churches under their management there about to be built by the commissioners under the trustees in one shape, but subject to this—that, as regards the new churches built by the commissioners, we will have the whole brought under the governance of the trustees, but as regards the churches built by the commissioners, and over which they have power, and which the Legislature intended they should have power over, the regulations of the trustees as to those should be subject to the regulations of the commissioners. As to the others, the local Act is to prevail; and it is re-enacted by the 6th section of the 1 & 2 Geo. 4. By that Act provisions are made of a very remarkable nature as to the pew-rents. The pew-rents of the parish church are to be brought into a common fund—not merely the pew-rents of the chapels, but all of them are to come into one common fund, out of which certain necessary payments are directed to be made; among others, a payment is directed to be made to a lecturer to be appointed by the incumbent in his own parochial church. That is an object of some importance to him in his public duty to have the advantage of, and is an object of importance to the parishioners in respect of the benefit they may derive from it; and those funds are to be so appropriated and in a common form, and the surplus, if there is any, handed over to the other purposes, and with a provision that you shall, out of the pew-rents of each particular church, pay what may be necessary to the minister of that particular church, and subject to that the surplus is to be brought into a hotchpot and applied to general purposes. The whole scheme of that shows that Parliament drew the line of distinction which the law, as I apprehend, in construing Acts of Parliament, has inferred, namely, “We never thought in a general Act of Parliament of dealing with St. Pancras at all; on the contrary, finding an existing or general Act, and that in the parish of St. Pancras to the extent to which we can exercise it, it will be actually advantageous to apply some of the provisions of the local Act, we apply some of the provisions of the local Act to the general Act, and we leave the parish of St. Pancras untouched as to the purposes which before existed, re-enacting it in order to give the full force and sanction of parliamentary reconsideration to the whole scheme.” The next thing we find is the Act of 2 & 3 Vict. c. 49, which is the Act on which this question must no doubt turn. After providing certain arrangements for making it more possible to apply the benefit of Queen Anne’s Bounty to churches under the control of the Church Building Commissioners, it says, in large words, “any chapel, where there is any chapel, the district may be formed by the commissioners,” &c., “any law or statute to the contrary notwithstanding.” I have already reasoned on what would have been my view had I found these words in the original Act. I think they apply to 1 & 2 Geo. 4, which intervened between the first local Act and the two first Church Building Acts, and every observation that he (the V.C.) had made upon the construction of general Acts applies more strongly to that statute. He (the V.C.) could not say that the general rule of construing Acts of Parliament should be obviated because some persons, in their anxiety to protect themselves, have inserted a saving clause. Besides, it is strongly indicated by the Legislature itself in the 1 & 2 Geo. 4, that the Legislature conceived the local Act was unaffected by the 58 & 59 Geo. 3; and again, you have a strong indication as late as the 14 & 15 Vict.

c. 97, which was immediately before the order in council which established the districts of Camden-town, that the Legislature took that view which the courts of law in construing these Acts of Parliament have always attributed to them, namely, that they do not interfere with local Acts, unless specially mentioned. In the 21st section of that Act it is enacted “that, wherever, under and by virtue of any local Act now in force, any parish cannot be brought within the provisions of the Church Building Acts touching the formation thereof of a parish or district, and whenever a representation is made to the said commissioners by the patron and incumbent of such parish, &c.,” a definite form is prescribed. I have already said I do not think it necessary to hold that the circumstance of its being beneficial to St. Pancras that it should be brought under the operation of these Acts would induce me to say that therefore I must alter the ordinary construction with regard to the force of a general Act of Parliament, because, for the numerous reasons I have already given, it is so easy for Parliament to alter it whenever it thought fit. Although the parish may be capable of being brought under the Act for a hundred different purposes, if there is any one in which any obstacle remains which prevents the operation, there seems to be a mode definitely pointed out for that purpose. Upon the whole, I think therefore, that the general principle of construction is in this case fortified strongly by the 1 & 2 Geo. 4, and the view the Legislature there takes of it is fortified by the view of the 14 & 15 Vict. c. 97, by the circumstance that in Lord Blandford’s Act the very case is dealt with in the manner it ought to be dealt with in the first section; and I must hold that the order in council was ultra vires, by which it was attempted with the consent of the bishop alone to assign the district into the hands of the Church Building Commissioners, which power I do not hold them to have. I cannot conclude this case without expressing my satisfaction at the mode in which it has been brought forward, a mode highly creditable to the two gentlemen interested in the case, who obviously have wished only to have their respective rights and positions ascertained. I have done my best to assist them, and the result must be one of two things—I must either dismiss the bill or retain it for twelve months to see if the plt. would be advised to take any legal proceedings, it being a legal right on which the result was dependent.

Bill dismissed generally.

WILLIAMS (app.) v. THE CHURCHWARDENS OF LLANGEINWEN (resps.)

Poor-rate—Tithe rentcharge—Deduction of curate’s salary.

If the rector of a parish cannot, on account of the extent, populousness, &c. of such parish, perform his clerical duties without the assistance of a curate, and therefore engages one, the salary which he pays may be deducted from the gross sum of the rateable tithe rentcharge.

The app. was presented by the patron to the rectors of parishes A. and B., which from time immemorial had always been under the spiritual care of one rector, there being no parsonage-house for either parish, but a house appointed by the bishop in his licence for the rector. For all secular parochial matters the parishes, though adjoining each other, were distinct.

Q. B.]

REG. v. THE INHABITANTS OF BIRMINGHAM.

[Q. B.]

In consequence of the bishop of the diocese requiring divine service to be performed twice on Sunday in each parish church, it became necessary for the rector to engage a curate, which he did at a salary of 80l. per annum:

Held, that this salary was a proper deduction in estimating the rateable value of the rector's tithe rentcharge.

This was a case stated under the 12 & 13 Vict. c. 45, upon an appeal by the app. against an assessment to the poor-rate of the parish of Llangeinwen, in the county of Anglesea.

It appeared from the facts that in the year 1829 the app. was presented to the parishes of Llangeinwen and Llangaff by the patron, the Earl of Pembroke; that the two parishes adjoin each other, each having a definite boundary line and its own church; that each parish separately maintains its own poor, and has separate churchwardens and overseers, a distinct vestry and distinct church-rate, poor-rate and tithe apportionment; that the two parishes are in rural districts, and include an area of 6079 acres, the population of one parish being 943 and the other 139; that the two churches are about two miles distant; that there is no parsonage-house, but a house appointed by the bishop in his licence, which is two miles from one church and four and a-half miles from the other; that from time immemorial there has been a single rector, who has been presented, admitted, and instituted to and in both parishes, there being no instance of their having been held separate; that from time immemorial down to the time of the appointment of the curate herein-after mentioned, it has been the uniform custom to have a single performance of divine service only in each of the churches on Sunday; that the rector latterly, in consequence of the wish of the bishop, has held two performances of divine worship in each church; that the curate is licensed by the bishop at a stipend of 80l. per annum to perform the office of stipendiary curate in the parish of Llangeinwen; that the rector devotes all his time to the cure of souls, and performs two services in one of the churches on each Sunday.

It appeared he was assessed to the poor-rate of Llangeinwen in respect of the tithe rentcharge, without being allowed any deduction for his curate's salary, which was the ground of his appeal. The question for the opinion of the court was, whether, for the purpose of ascertaining the value of the said tithe rentcharge, the app. is entitled to have the gross sum received by him reduced by the curate's salary?

IV. Williams appeared for the resps., and argued that, as the two parishes were entirely distinct, the circumstance that they had the same rector was not to be considered, and that as the rector of each could perform the entire duty without the assistance of a curate, the deduction ought not to be allowed: (Reg. v. Goodchild, El. Bl. & El. 1.

Beavan, for the app., was not called upon.

COCKBURN, C.J.—I think that the present case cannot be distinguished from that of Reg. v. Goodchild. It seems to be laid down that if a rector cannot perform the usual celebration of divine service without the assistance of a curate, and either because his bishop could compel him to employ a curate, or because from his own sense of the religious obligation incumbent upon him he actually employs one, then in either case the salary which he pays to the curate may be deducted from the gross sum of the rateable tithe rentcharge. It is true that if he employs a curate on account of his own personal absence or infirmity, he cannot make this deduction, but if the extent and population of the parish make it necessary for him to employ a curate he can do so. Now the principle in the Hackney case (Reg. v. Goodchild) seems to be equally applicable to this case, where, owing to the distance of the two churches, in both of which divine service was necessarily performed contemporaneously, it was impossible for one rector to be present at both. In such a case it was impossible for one person to do the duty at both places, and therefore the salary of the curate is a proper deduction in estimating the rateable value of this tithe rentcharge.

REG. v. THE INHABITANTS OF BIRMINGHAM.

Poor-law—Renting a tenement—Amount of rent paid—Hearsay evidence—Declaration of deceased tenant.

Upon an appeal against an order of removal the resps., in proof of a derivative settlement by renting a tenement, tendered evidence of the amount of rent paid by the ancestor, that he, whilst in the occupation of the said tenement, said to his son that he occupied the same as tenant at a rent of 20l. per year:

Held, that the evidence was admissible to prove that fact.

This was a case stated by the sessions for Birmingham upon an appeal against an order of removal, whereby Sarah, the wife of William Day (absent from her), and their four children were ordered to be removed from the parish of Birmingham to the parish of Kingswood, as their place of legal settlement. The court of quarter sessions quashed the said order, subject to the opinion of this court.

The case stated that the resps. proved that John Lockyer Day, deceased, the father of the said William Day, had occupied a tenement from the year 1829 until his death in 1847, in the said parish of Kingswood, the rent for which was settled in account with the landlords, and was found by the court to have been paid by the said John Lockyer Day. To prove the amount of that rent evidence was tendered by the resps., and objected to by the app.'s counsel, that the said John Lockyer Day, whilst in occupation of the said tenement, said to his son Thomas Day, that he (the said John Lockyer Day) occupied the same as tenant at a rent of 20l. per year.

If the court should be of opinion that evidence of the declaration of the said John Lockyer Day was admissible for the purpose of proving the amount of the rent and the nature of the occupation, then the order of quarter sessions is to be quashed, and the order of removal confirmed; otherwise the order of quarter sessions is to be confirmed, and the order of removal quashed.

O'Brien and Cockle now appeared in support of the order of quarter sessions, and contended that the evidence was inadmissible. This was a derivative settlement by the renting of a tenement by the ancestor of the pauper's husband, and although a declaration against a party's interest, as an admission that he is tenant and not the owner of property, is receivable, no such admission is receivable for any other purpose, the declaration of the payment of a certain amount of rent not being a declaration necessarily against his interest, as it may in fact be a declaration in favour of his interest: (Chambers v. Bernasconi, 1 Cr. M. & R. 347; Peacable v. Watson, 4 Taunt. 16; Davies v. Pearce, 2 T. R. 53; Papendic v. Bridgwater, 5 El. & Bl. 166; Doe dem. Baggally v. Jones, 1 Camp. 367; Human v. Pettett, 5 B. & Ald. 223; Doe dem. Welsh v. Langfield, 16 M. & W. 514.)

Spooner and M. Smith, contra, argued that the whole admission as to his holding of the premises was admissible: (Lord Ellenborough's judgment in Roe dem. Brune v. Rawlings, 7 East, 290; Higham v. Ridgway, 10 East, 109; Percival v. Nanson, 7 Ex. 1; The Sussex Peetage case, 11 Cl. & Fin. 113; Cowne

v. Garment, 1 Bing. N. C. 918; Gleadon v. Atkin, 1 Cr. & Mee. 410.)

COCKBURN, C.J.—I am of opinion that this evidence was admissible and ought to have been received. It is well-established that the declaration of a deceased person that he holds premises as tenant is admissible to rebut the presumption of law that he has the ownership in fee. The question here is, whether the declaration of the amount of rent which he pays, made at the same time as his declaration of tenancy, is admissible, or whether the evidence must be confined alone to his declaration as to his tenancy? It has been held again and again that the declaration may be received not only for the purpose of proving a fact adverse to the interest of the party, but also collateral facts. Now that being settled, I cannot see why the same effect should not be given to a declaration as to the pecuniary as to the proprietary interest of a party. I quite admit that, as regards the effect of the evidence, there is a great difference between an oral declaration and a written entry made in the ordinary course of business; but that goes rather to the weight of the evidence than to its admissibility. There are, however, the same legal incidents in an oral as in a written admission, and the same consequences should follow. As soon as it is established that the declaration is receivable, it is receivable not only as a declaration against the interest of the party who makes it, but for all other purposes not in themselves inconsistent.

REGISTRATION APPEALS.

Nov. 11 and 15.

LUCKETT (app.) v. VOLLER (resp.)

LUCKETT (app.) v. GOLLOP (resp.)

LUCKETT (app.) v. GILDER (resp.)

Election law—Practice—Notice of appeal.

The revising barrister decided a case on the 11th Oct., and it was appealed against. On the 6th Nov., being within the first four days of Michaelmas Term, the app. lodged the case signed by the revising barrister with the master of the court, in compliance with the requirement of sect. 62 of 6 Vict. c. 18, and gave notice of appeal to the resp. The court fixed the 11th Nov. as the first day for hearing registration appeals:

Held, that there having been sufficient time between the date of the decision of the revising barrister and the first day fixed by the court for taking appeals, to enable app. to comply with the requirements of the statute, that ten clear days' notice of appeal should be given to the resp., the court would not postpone the day for hearing the appeal, under the proviso to the 64th section, giving the court a discretion to postpone the hearing of an appeal in such case as to the court may seem meet.

Adey v. Hill, 4 C. B. 38; 8 L. T. Rep. 189, followed.

Fawcett moved herein for an order of the court that the hearing of these appeals should be postponed until the 19th inst., which was one of the four days fixed by the court for taking appeals from the decisions of revising barristers. The 62nd section of the Registration Act, 6 Vict. c. 18, requires that every app. who intends to prosecute his appeal shall, within the first four days of Michaelmas Term next after the decision to which such appeal relates, transmit to the masters of the Court of C. B. the statement in writing so signed by the revising barrister, and shall also therewith give or send a notice, signed by him, stating therein his intention to prosecute the said appeal, and the app. shall also give or send a notice, signed by him, to the resp. in the said appeal, stating his intention duly to prosecute such appeal in the said court. Sect. 64 enacts that no appeal shall in any case, &c., be heard or entertained by the said court unless notice shall have been given by the app. to the master of the court at the time and in the manner hereinbefore mentioned; and no appeal shall be heard in the said court in any case where the resp. shall not appear, unless the app. shall prove that the notice of his intention to prosecute such appeal was given or sent to the said resp. ten days at least before the day appointed for the hearing of such appeal, provided always that if it shall appear to the said court that there has not been reasonable time to give or send such notice in any case, it shall be lawful for the said court to postpone the hearing of the appeal in such case as to the court shall seem meet. It is under the proviso to this section that this application is made. The app. here lodged the case stated by the revising barrister with the Masters, and gave the requisite notice of appeal to the resp. on the 6th Nov., that is to say, within the four first days of term; but inasmuch as the 64th section requires that ten clear days' notice of appeal be given to the resp. before the day appointed for hearing of such appeal, and the court fixed the 11th Nov. to take registration appeals, the requirement could not be complied with. It is contended that the words of the 62nd section, "within the first four days of Michaelmas Term," refer not only to lodging the appeal and giving notice to the master, but also to the sending the notice of appeal to the resp. If this be so, the act of the court in fixing so early a day for taking these appeals precludes the possibility of giving ten clear days' notice; and this being so, the court will exercise the discretion given to it by the proviso to the 64th section, and postpone the hearing of these appeals until the 19th instant, when the ten days' clear notice will be complete: (Pring v. Estcourt, 4 C. B. 73.) [ERLE, C. J.—There are two or three cases against you; and amongst them is Adey v. Hill, 4 C. B. 38. You sent notice to the master, and to the resp., within the first four days of term, complying with what you ought to do under sect. 62.] Yes. The days for taking registration appeals have this year been appointed a week or ten days earlier than usual, and this fact has created the difficulty.

ERLE, C. J.—We are bound to refuse this application, because the case of Adey v. Hill contains an elaborate judgment by the Lord Chief Justice against you. We cannot postpone the hearing on the ground urged.

Nov. 15.—Fawcett renewed his application in this case, urging as ground therefor, that the revising barristers are required by sect. 32 to hold their courts for the revision of the lists of voters between the 15th Sept. and the last day of October inclusive, and this being so, if the court will not exercise the discretion given it under the proviso to the 64th section, then it might happen that when a revising barrister holds his court on the last day of October, and the court fixes so early a day as the 9th Nov. for hearing appeals, the provisions of the statute as to giving notice of appeal could not possibly be complied with: (Norton v. The Town Clerk of Salisbury, 4 C. B. 32.) [ERLE, C. J.—You are aware that this has been decided?] Yes, but the court is prayed to reconsider the point; for, on looking closely at the 62nd section, it will be seen that it is within the first four days of term that the app. must give notice of appeal to the resp. Then again, when, as in the present instance, the court fixes four days, at wide intervals, for hearing registration appeals, to what day does the ten days' notice apply—whether to the first, second, third, or fourth day?

Ex.]

EASTON v. ALCE.

[Ex.]

ERLE, C. J.—In this case I am not at liberty to grant your application. The point has been raised more than once, and has received the deliberate judgment of the court, the decision being that app. must give to the resp. ten clear days' notice that he intends to appeal before the first day fixed by the court for taking registration appeals. This as a general rule. No doubt the proviso to 64th section creates some difficulty, and there may be circumstances which form a reasonable ground for indulgence. Here, however, the revising barrister gave his decision so long back as the 11th Oct., but the attorney, inexperienced perhaps in such matters, does not give the notice required by the statute until the 6th Nov. We cannot, therefore, accede to this application.

WILLIAMS and BYLES, JJ., concurred, adding that Adey v. Hill, and the other cases, had been rightly decided, and must be followed. Order refused.

EASTON v. ALCE.

Rye Harbour Improvement Act, 1 Will. 4, c. 135, s. 2—Appointment of commissioners under—Qualification by rating—Action for penalty for acting without being duly qualified—Meaning of the words "rated to the relief of the poor by one or more rates to the amount of 10l."

The Rye Harbour Improvement Act, 1 Will. 4, c. 35, s. 2 (local), provides for the appointment, as commissioners, of "twelve inhabitant householders rated to the relief of the poor of the said parish, by one or more rate or rates, to the amount of 10l. per annum," and by a subsequent section a penalty of 50l. is inflicted on any person acting without being duly qualified. An action having been brought for the penalty against the deft. as an unqualified commissioner, a special case, for the opinion of the Court of Ex. on the construction of the above words of the 2nd section of the Act, was stated by order of the learned judge (Cockburn, C. J.): Held, that a reasonable construction must be put on the words of the Act of Parliament, and that the words in question mean that a person, to be qualified, must be rated to the annual value of 10l., and not to such an amount as would render him liable to pay rates to the amount of 10l. a-year.

Per Pollock, C. B.—To rest the qualification, not on the value of the property but, on the accidental payments, a man may have made, would be absurd and inconvenient, and contrary to the numerous Acts which have been passed in reference to qualifications. An Act of Parliament should be clear and beyond all doubt, to warrant the court in inflicting a penalty under it.

This was a special case stated by order of Cockburn, C. J., for the opinion of the court upon the construction to be put on sect. 2 of 1 Will. 4. c. 135, a local Act, for authorising the appointment of commissioners of the harbour of Rye, in the county of Sussex. The section in question provides for the appointment of certain ex officio commissioners, and also for the appointment, as commissioners, of "twelve inhabitant householders resident in the town of Rye, rated to the relief or maintenance of the poor of the said parish, by one or more rate or rates, to the amount of 10l. per annum." By sect. 6 it is enacted that "if any person not being so qualified as thereinbefore is mentioned, shall act as a commissioner, every such person so offending shall, for every such offence, forfeit and pay the sum of 50l. to any person who shall sue for the same, to be recovered, together with the full costs of suit, in any of her Majesty's courts of record in England, by action of debt or on the case," &c.

The deft. was duly nominated and elected at a vestry meeting. He is an inhabitant householder, resident in the town, and is rated on a gross rental of 25l., the rateable value of his house being 15l. The question for the court to decide is, whether the meaning of sect. 2 is, that a commissioner must pay a poor-rate or rates in one year to the amount of 10l., or must he be merely rated to that amount?

Hance for the plt., who was suing for the penalty.—The deft. was not duly qualified. What is the construction to be put on "rated to the amount," &c., and "by one or more rate or rates?" It is contended a person is not qualified unless he be rated on such an amount as would render him liable to pay rates to the amount of 10l. a-year. [WILDE, B.—The assessment is one thing, the rate is another. In some parishes the assessment is much higher than in others; you contend that he must be rated on such an assessment as would amount, when paid, to 10l.?] Yes. [POLLOCK, C. B.—Then, if there were no poor to be relieved and no rate made in any year, every commissioner would be disqualified; and again, in a year of great distress the rates might be raised to 20s. in the pound; and so every one who paid the rate would be qualified.] Such is, it is submitted, the construction of the Act; the words "by one or more rate or rates" must have been introduced for some purpose; again, the words are not "rated at," but "rated to" the amount.

Lush, Q. C. for the deft.—The word rate means assessment, and the words "one or more rate or rates" may be read as "one or more ratings;" that is a clear and sensible interpretation and consistent with the ordinary course and practice in such matters; and a sufficient answer to plt.'s claim. [POLLOCK, C. B.—A man may be rated on his dwelling-house; he may be rated also on a counting-house, and on various other tenements, and that would be "one or more rate or rates."] If it be not, as is contended on the deft.'s part, no man could be sure whether, on his election as commissioner, he were or not liable to this penalty. [WILDE, B.—If the language of the Act is used correctly and strictly, you are wrong; but if in a general and popular sense, e. g. rate for assessment, you are right.] Look at the policy of the Act. (He was here stopped by the court.)

POLLOCK, C. B.—To rest the qualification not on the value of the property, but on the accidental payments a man may have made, would be absurd and inconvenient, and if Mr. Hance's construction is right, this Act would stand alone amongst the numberless Acts of Parliament which have been passed in reference to qualifications. But in order to warrant us in inflicting this penalty, the Act of Parliament should be clear and beyond all doubt. We do not think it is so; and no matter what it means, provided it does not mean enough for that purpose. Our judgment will therefore be for the defts.

BRAMWELL, B.—I am of the same opinion. Leave out the words "one or more" for a moment, then it stands that a person to be qualified must be "rated to the amount of 10l. per annum." What is the meaning of "per annum?" Yearly. It cannot mean in the year, but has reference to the character of the holding, as of a house. It means he must be rated to an annual value of 10l.

CHANNELL, B. concurred.

WILDE, B.—A reasonable construction must be put on the words of the Act of Parliament. An exact and strict construction of them would probably be in favour of the plt. A reasonable construction is in favour of the deft.

REG. v. WILLIAM WEBSTER.

Friendly society—Larceny by member—Ownership of property—Trustees—Bailee.

II. a member of a friendly society, was in possession of a shop where goods were sold for the benefit of the society. Each member partook of the profit, and was subject to the loss arising from the shop. H. had the sole management, and was answerable for the safety of all the property and money coming to his possession in the course of the management. The prisoner, also a member of the society, assisted in the shop without salary, and was indicted for stealing some marked money which H. had placed in the till. The money was laid in the indictment as belonging to H.:

Held, that the money was properly laid in the indictment as belonging to H., and that the prisoner, although a member, could be convicted of larceny.

Case reserved for the opinion of this court by the chairman of the West Riding Sessions, held at Sheffield.

William Webster was indicted at the West Riding of Yorkshire spring intermediate sessions, held at Sheffield, on the 22nd May 1861, for stealing, on the 11th of May, at Ecclesfield, three sovereigns and one half sovereign, the property of Samuel Fox and others.

It was proved on the trial that James Holt was in possession of a shop, where goods were sold for the benefit of a society called the "Stockbridge Band of Hope Co-operative Industrial Society."

Each member of the society partook of the profit and was subject to the loss arising from the shop. Holt (being himself a member) had the sole management, and was answerable for the safety of all the property and money coming to his possession in the course of such management. The prisoner, also a member of the society, assisted in the shop without salary. On the occasion of the alleged larceny, Holt had marked some sovereigns and half-sovereigns, and placed them in the till. The prisoner was suspected of taking some of them, and when charged with this, he admitted that he had taken the coins which formed the subject of this charge, and produced them from his pocket.

The prosecution failing to prove that this was a friendly society duly enrolled, elected to amend the indictment by substituting the name of James Holt for that of Samuel Fox and others, and the same was amended accordingly.

The counsel for the prisoner put in a copy of the rules of the society, with the name of John Tidd Pratt printed at the end thereof, and proved that this copy had been examined with the original copy, signed and sealed by the registrar of friendly societies, but which was not produced. He also put in a conveyance of the shop and premises to Samuel Fox and others as trustees.

No other evidence of the trusteeship was given.

The counsel for the prosecution objected that in order to prove the society to be a friendly society under the 18 & 19 Vict. c. 63 it was necessary to produce the original copy signed by the registrar, or to account for its absence sufficiently to justify the admission of secondary evidence.

I overruled this objection, and admitted this evidence as proof that the society was duly enrolled.

It was contended for the prisoner that Fox and others were the trustees; that this was a friendly society, and that the property should be laid in Fox and others, and not in Holt, and that the prisoner could not therefore be convicted on the indictment as amended; that as to any special property Holt might have in the money taken, he was joint owner of it with the prisoner, and as partner with him was equally in possession of it, and could not therefore be convicted.

The Court overruled these last-mentioned objections, and the prisoner was convicted and sentenced to be imprisoned in the house of correction at Wakefield for nine calendar months, subject to the opinion of the Court of Criminal Appeal whether under the circumstances the conviction was right.

The prisoner was admitted to bail to await the decision of the Court of Criminal Appeal.

A copy of the rules of the society accompanies this case, and is to be taken as incorporated therewith.

WILSON OVEREND, Chairman.

T. Campbell Foster for the prisoner.—It is contended that the indictment as amended was not proved, and that the property ought to have been laid as in Fox and others, the trustees of the friendly society. The prosecutor having failed to prove that the property was rightly laid in Fox and others, and the court having amended the indictment by substituting Holt's name instead of Fox and others, the prisoner produced the proper evidence to show that Fox and others were the trustees of the society, and then objected to the indictment as amended, on the ground that by the 18 & 19 Vict. c. 63, s. 18, the property of the friendly society was vested in the trustees. Sect. 19 empowers the trustees to bring or defend, or cause to be brought or defended, any action, suit, or prosecution in any court of law or equity, touching or concerning the property, right or claim to property of the society, and such trustees shall and may, in all cases concerning the real or personal property of such society, sue and be sued, plead and be impleaded in their proper names as trustees of such society without other description.

MARTIN, B.—What evidence was there to show that Holt was not in possession of these sovereigns as of his own lawful property?

WIGHTMAN, J.—Again, he was a partner, and had the personal possession of these moneys.

T. Campbell Foster.—It is submitted that the only possession Holt had, was that of a servant to the friendly society. If he had taken and appropriated any of the moneys received by him, he might have been indicted for embezzlement, and therefore he was a servant, and his possession was that of the society his masters.

WIGHTMAN, J.—He was not a servant; he was an owner, and had the sovereigns in his personal possession.

MARTIN, B.—He had the sole management of the shop, and was answerable for the safety of all the property and money coming to his possession in the course of such management.

T. Campbell Foster.—Then the prisoner being also a member of the society, was a partner, and could not be convicted of stealing his own property.

WILLIAMS, J.—There is the well-known case of a man, when the hundred was liable, being convicted of stealing his own money from his own servant: (Foster, 123, 124.)

WIGHTMAN, J.—These sovereigns were not part of the goods in the shop, but money for which Holt had to account. He cannot be treated as a servant, because it would then follow that he was one of the persons appointing himself.

MARTIN, B.—Holt had got the sovereigns in his own pocket, as it were, and suppose that while walking in the street some one had picked his pocket of them, could not the thief have been indicted for stealing his money?

T. Campbell Foster.—The prisoner was assisting in the shop as a partner without salary.

WIGHTMAN, J.—No. Holt had the sole management of the shop.

WILLIAMS, J.—How does this case differ from Reg. v. Bramley, R. & R. 478, where a member of a benefisociety entered the room of a person with whom a box containing the funds of the society was deposited, and took and carried it away, and it was held to be larceny, and the property to be well laid in the bailee?

POLLOCK, C. B.—No doubt a man who has pawned his watch with a pawnbroker may be indicted for stealing it from the pawnbroker. The present case finds that Holt was in possession of the shop, and had the sole management, and was answerable for the safety of all the property and money coming to his possession in the course of such management, and therefore he may, quoad hoc, be treated as the owner of everything in it.

REG. v. THOMAS MOSELEY.

False pretences—Evidence—Person from whom property obtained.

The indictment charged the prisoner with obtaining the sum of 5s. 6d., the moneys of G. B., by false pretences from G. B. It was proved that the prisoner falsely pretending to be an agent for a loan society, and that he could procure a loan from it for G. B., claimed 5s. 6d. for his charge, G. B. sent him to his wife for it, and she gave the prisoner 5s. 6d. of her husband's money:

Held, that the evidence supported the allegation in the indictment that the prisoner obtained the money from G. B.

Case reserved for the opinion of this court by the chairman of the quarter sessions for the county of Chester.

The prisoner was tried and convicted at the last July quarter sessions for the county of Chester on a charge for obtaining money by false pretences.

The indictment charged that the prisoner Thomas Moseley unlawfully and knowingly did falsely pretend to George Birtles that he, the said Thomas Moseley, was an agent for a loan society in Manchester, and would get the sum of 10*l.* (meaning the loan of 10*l.*) for the said George Birtles, but he, the said George Birtles, must pay him, the said Thomas Moseley, the sum of 5s. 6d., by means of which said false pretences the said Thomas Moseley then unlawfully did obtain from the said George Birtles certain money, to wit, the sum of 5s. 6d. of the moneys, goods and chattels of the said George Birtles with intent thereby then to defraud.

It appeared from the evidence that the prosecutor wanted to borrow 10*l.* to purchase the discharge of his son, who was in the army. The prisoner came to him and said he could get 10*l.* for him, and that he was an agent of a loan society in Manchester. Prisoner said that the charge would be 5s. 6d., and prosecutor told him to go to his wife for it. The prisoner went to prosecutor's wife and said he came for 5s. 6d., as the man from the loan office was waiting for the money. The wife gave the prisoner 5s. 6d. of her husband's money. Evidence was given to negative prisoner being an agent to any loan society in Manchester. The prisoner did not get the loan for prosecutor.

It was objected by the prisoner's counsel that the indictment was not supported by the evidence, for that the prisoner did not obtain the 5s. 6d. from the prosecutor as laid in the indictment, but from the prosecutor's wife.

I reserved this objection for the decision of this court.

The jury found the prisoner guilty, and thereupon I postponed the sentence, but the prisoner being unable to find the bail required, he was committed to prison.

The question which I respectfully submit for the decision of the court therefore is, whether the indictment is supported by the evidence.

REG. v. ANN CHARLES.

Disorderly house—25 Geo. 2, c. 36, s. 5—Prosecuting keeper of—Jurisdiction of borough sessions.

The 25 Geo. 2, c. 36, s. 5, directs the parish constable, on receiving due notice from two inhabitants, of any person keeping a bawdy-house or other disorderly house, and upon their making oath before a justice as to the truth of the notice, and undertaking to give material evidence against such person, to enter into a recognisance to prosecute with effect such person at the next general or quarter sessions of the peace, or at the next assizes to be holden for the county:

Held, that a borough sessions had jurisdiction under this enactment.

Case stated by the recorder of Grantham for the opinion of the judges of the Court of Criminal Appeal.

Ann Charles was indicted at the quarter sessions for this borough, held on the 9th July last, for keeping a disorderly house.

The prosecution had been instituted under sect. 5 of 25 Geo. 2, c. 36, which enacts that "if any two inhabitants of any parish or place, paying scot, &c., therein, do give notice in writing to any constable (or other peace-officer of the like nature, where there is no constable) of such parish or place, of any person keeping a bawdy-house, gaming-house, or any other disorderly house in such parish or place, the constable or such officer as aforesaid so receiving such notice shall forthwith go with such inhabitants to one of her Majesty's justices of the peace of the county, city, riding, division, or liberty, in which such parish or place does lie, and shall (upon such inhabitants making oath that they do believe the contents of such notice to be true, and entering into recognisances, &c., to give or produce material evidence against such person for such offence) enter into a recognisance in the penal sum of 30*l.* to prosecute with effect such person at the next general or quarter sessions of the peace, or at the next assizes to be holden for the county in which such parish or place does lie, as to the said justices shall seem meet."

These provisions of the Act of Parliament had been duly complied with.

On the deft. being called upon to plead, it was objected, on her behalf, to the jurisdiction of the court, that the words "at the next general or quarter sessions of the peace, or at the next assizes to be holden for the county in which such parish or place does lie," meant only "at the quarter sessions or assizes for the county," and that they must be held to exclude the jurisdiction of the borough quarter sessions.

The recorder overruled the objection.

The deft. thereupon pleaded "Not guilty."

The jury found the deft. guilty.

The deft. remains in gaol for want of bail.

Should the judges be of opinion that the clause above cited does by implication or otherwise take away the jurisdiction of the borough sessions to try the offence in question, the judgment will be arrested and the prisoner discharged. Should the court be of opinion that the recorder was right in overruling the objection, then sentence will be passed at the next quarter sessions for the borough.

Recorder of the borough of Grantham.

HAMILL v. HENRY.

The Corrupt Practices Prevention Act 1854, s. 24—Qui tam action—Security for costs.The court will not, in an action brought to recover a penalty under the provisions of the Corrupt Practices Prevention Act 1854, compel the plt. to give security for costs because he is a pauper.

This was a motion to have further proceedings stayed until the plt. should give security for costs. The action was brought to recover damages under the provisions of the Corrupt Practices Prevention Act 1854. The summons and plaint contained two counts. The first alleged that after the passing of the said Act, and whilst the same was in force, an election for a member to serve in Parliament for the borough of Newry was duly held at Newry in the month of May 1859, and the plt., who was then an elector for said borough, voted for F. M., a candidate at said election, and one P. Q. was also then a candidate, and was afterwards at said election duly returned as a member to serve in Parliament, and after said election, to wit in the month of April 1860, the deft. practised intimidation upon the plt. on account of the plt. having voted at said election, contrary to the statute, &c. The second count differed from the first by alleging that the deft. threatened the infliction of injuries upon the plt. on account of his having voted at said election, &c. The affidavit of the deft. filed in support of the motion stated, that he had a good defence on the merits, and had not the slightest doubt that he would get a verdict in the action; that neither directly nor indirectly had he practised intimidation, nor threatened the infliction of any injury, on account of the plt. having voted at the election; that the plt., who was a labourer, was a poor man, and not able to pay the costs of the action; that he believed the action was really brought by persons who had taken an active part in the election, and the plt. was merely a nominal party, and, under the circumstances, injustice would be done unless security for costs were given. The plt. made an affidavit to oppose the motion, in which he stated that it was untrue that the action was brought at the instigation of any other person, or that he was merely a nominal party; that he had a small shop, and was reduced in his circumstances, principally by the conduct of the deft.; that he had been an elector of the borough for over thirty years, and at the last election voted for F. M.; that the deft. was the brother-in-law of P. Q.; that the plt. was tenant of two denominations of land within the borough, containing about four acres, under the trustees of the Kilmorney estates, whose agent the deft. was; that previous to the election he was canvassed by the deft. for the said P. Q.; that he refused to give any promise to vote, whereupon deft. said he had twelve men on his list, and that he knew what to do with them after the election, and that such conversation occurred a few days before the election; that the election being in May 1859, on the 24th April 1860 he was served with a notice to quit; that in Nov. 1860 possession was demanded, and two ejectments served; that he had been a tenant from 1833, and having paid his rent up to 1860, he instructed his attorney to get the address of the trustees of the estate, they being resident abroad, and leaving the management of the property to the deft.; that the practice of the estate was to let a half-year's rent lie with the tenants; that the ejectment was heard in December last, when the deft.

was examined before the assistant-barrister, and was asked where the trustees resided, but refused to tell; that he believed that it was in consequence of his having voted for F. M. that notice to quit was served; that the deft. had driven many of the tenants from the estate in consequence of their political opinions; that the action was brought on his own account; and he believed, from the circumstance of the deft. having refused to give the residence of the trustees of the estate, that the ejectments were brought by the deft. upon his own authority alone; and that the present action was brought for the purpose of recovering the penalty given by the Act, and no other. The plt.'s attorney also made an affidavit, in which he stated that he had been retained by the plt. alone, and that no other person was responsible to him for the costs of the action. The deft., by affidavit in reply, denied that any such conversation as that relied upon by the plt. had taken place, and deposed that he did not know that the plt. had voted at the election until the writ was issued in the present action; he also denied several other statements contained in the affidavit of the plt.

Macdonagh, Q.C. and W. B. Kaye were in support of the motion, and relied on the 24th section of the 17 & 18 Vict. c. 102. The 10th and 13th sections were also referred to, and the following cases:—Tenant v. Brown and others, 5 B. & C. 208; Rice v. Dublin and Wicklow Railway Company, 8 Ir. C. L. Rep. 155; M'Lester v. Quinn, 10 Ir. C. L. Rep. 358.

Heron, Q.C., contra, was not called on.

MONAHAN, C.J.—His Lordship having referred to the pleadings and affidavits which had been filed, said, that the judgment which that court had pronounced in the case of M'Lester v. Quinn, was relied upon in support of the present motion. The distinguishing feature in that case, he added, did not exist in the present. There it was a conceded fact that the action was not bonâ fide the action of the plt., that it was not brought in the hope or for the purpose of recovering a single sixpence in damages, but with the view of obtaining information for the advantage of third persons, and that the plt. was only a nominal party put forward by others. All these facts were uncontradicted, neither the plt. nor his attorney having made any affidavit. The affidavit of the deft. in this case is substantially an affidavit of merits, the facts of which are controverted, and the court has not now either the means or the inclination to inquire into their truth. The plt. who brings this action at his own risk, is a pauper, and on that circumstance the present application is founded. We cannot decide this case upon that ground. We think this Act of Parliament, "The Corrupt Practices Prevention Act," should receive a liberal construction, and that it was not the intention of the Legislature that the sections referred to in support of the motion should be applied to a case like the present, in which the only fact relied on is the poverty of the plt.

CHRISTIAN, J.—Although, in the case of M'Lester v. Quinn, I laid more stress upon the 24th section of the statute than the other members of the court. I did not mean to say that under that enactment any more than under the common law, we would be authorised to compel a real plt. to give security for costs merely because he was a pauper. What I said then had reference, as will be seen by the report, to the particular facts of that case. These facts were admitted to be, that the person whose name was used as plt. knew nothing of the case; that the real object of the action was to fish for evidence, to be used in another place; and that the particular plt. was a pauper, and was selected for that reason. Under circumstances such as those, I considered that the express enactment of the statute relieved the case from all difficulty, and enabled the court to deal with it disembarassed of the difficulties and contradictions

REG. v. THE RECORDER OF LIVERPOOL.

Appeal—Notice of—Resps. having a community of interest—Service upon one only—Recognisance—Mandamus.

A. B. was adjudged, by justices acting under the Mersey Dock Acts Consolidation Act 1848, s. 95, to pay 50*l.* to William Boylan, for and on behalf of the owners of a certain vessel, for an injury caused to such vessel by the said A. B. The said A. B. thereupon appealed, and gave notice of appeal to all the part owners of the said vessel at different times between the 23rd Sept. and the 5th Oct. On the 25th Sept. he entered into the recognisance as required by the Act. At the hearing the appeal was dismissed because the recognisance was not entered into within three days after all the notices had been served. By sect. 335 of the foregoing Act, a power of appeal is given, such app. first giving ten days' notice in writing of his intention to bring such appeal, and of the cause thereof, to the person who is intended to be or may be affected by such appeal, and within three days after such notice given entering into a recognisance to try such appeal, &c. :

Held, that service on one of the joint owners was good service for all, and that the recognisance therefore was properly entered into.

This was a rule calling upon the Recorder of Liverpool to show cause why a mandamus should not issue commanding him to enter continuances and hear the appeal of William Jevons against a summary conviction of justices.

It appeared that on the 30th July last a complaint was heard before certain justices of Liverpool, at the instance of William Boylan, the master of a schooner, Lord Byron, for and on behalf of the owners thereof, against William Jevons, the person having the charge and management of a steam-vessel, Cognac, for negligently and carelessly causing certain damage to be done to the said Lord Byron to the amount of 50*l.*, and upon such hearing the said William Jevons was ordered to pay the said William Boylan, for and on behalf of the owners of the said vessel, the Lord Byron, the sum of 50*l.*, the amount of the damage of which complaint was made. Notice of appeal was then given, and on the coming on of the same for trial at the Liverpool quarter sessions, the app. was required to prove his notice and the due entering into his recognisance. He thereupon proved that notice of appeal was served upon William Humber and William Hill, two of the registered owners of the Lord Byron, on the 24th Sept. last; also upon John Preston, another registered owner, upon the 25th Sept.; also upon several other registered owners on the 26th Sept.; upon the representative of a deceased registered owner upon the 3rd Oct.; and upon one other registered owner upon the 5th Oct. It was also proved that the recognisance was duly entered into on the 25th Sept. The affidavits were conflicting as to when notice of appeal was given to William Boylan, there being no evidence as to the actual day of service; but it appeared from the affidavit of the attorney for the said William Boylan that subsequently to the entering into the recognisance by the app. he accepted service of the notice of the appeal on behalf of the said William Boylan. Each notice was directed to all the resps.

Upon the hearing it was objected on the part of the resps. that the notice or notices of appeal were not sufficient, and that the recognisance did not appear to have been entered into within the time required by the statute. The Recorder being of opinion that the recognisance was not entered into in proper time, refused to hear the appeal.

By the Mersey Docks and Harbour Act, 21 & 22 Vict. (local), sect. 95, it is enacted that if the master of any vessel shall wilfully, negligently, or carelessly do or cause to be done, any damage to any vessel in any dock, or on the water of the river Mersey or elsewhere, within the port of Liverpool, the amount of such damage, where the claim shall not exceed the sum of 50*l.*, may be ascertained, sued for and recovered from the master or owner of such first-mentioned vessel in a summary way before any justice in the same manner as any penalty is made recoverable. By sect. 335 it is enacted that "if any person shall think himself aggrieved by the order or judgment of any justice under the provisions of this Act, such person may, within four months next after the cause of complaint shall have arisen, appeal to the general quarter sessions for the county or place in which the cause of appeal shall have arisen, such app. first giving ten days' notice in writing of his intention to bring such appeal, and of the cause thereof, to the person who is intended to be or may be affected by such appeal, and within three days after such notice given, entering into a recognisance before some justice with two sufficient sureties in the penalty of 5*l.* conditioned to try such appeal and abide the order of, and to pay such costs as shall be awarded by, the justices at such quarter sessions upon the hearing of such appeal," &c.

Lushington now showed cause and contended that under the appeal clause the recognisance ought to have been entered into within three days after the giving of the last notice of appeal; that, as the recognisance was, in fact, entered into on the 25th Sept., and some of the notices of appeal were not served until October, there was no recognisance within the meaning of the section, and especially as there is no time specified when the notice was served upon William Boylan, the master of the schooner, it could not be taken that there was any recognisance as to that notice, even supposing it should be held that service of notice of appeal upon him was good as to all the other resps. [CROMPTON, J.—The recorder decided that the recognisance must be entered into after all the notices of appeal have been served.] One notice was not sufficient, as there were many owners of the vessel, who were all interested in the appeal; there would have been no difficulty in the app. entering into several recognisances.

Aspinall and L. Temple, contra, were not called upon.

CROMPTON, J.—I think that service upon one part owner was legal service upon all. It is analogous to a service of a declaration in ejectment upon one of two joint tenants. It is certainly an objection not to be favoured. The question here is, really, whether service upon one joint owner was not a good service upon the whole? If it was, then the recognisance was well entered into after the first notice was served. If such a service is not good the greatest possible inconvenience may arise, for some of the part owners may be abroad. Upon Mr. Lushington's construction the right of appeal would in many cases be useless. As regards overseers, it is quite clear that a service upon one is a service upon all, and I really can't see that you need serve every one who has a community of interest. All the analogies are against you. I must suppose the Legislature meant to give a practical appeal, and they may very well have intended in this case that a service Administering a noxious drug—Cantharides—Intent.

The prisoner, unknown to the prosecutrix, put into her tea cantharides, with the intent, as found by the jury, to excite her sexual passion and desire, in order that he might have connection with her. She drank the tea, and suffered much pain and was very ill in consequence:

Held, that the prisoner might properly be convicted of a misdemeanor under the 23 Vict. c. 8, s. 2, which enacts that "whosoever shall unlawfully and maliciously administer to, or cause to be administered to or taken by any other person, any poison or other destructive or noxious thing, with intent to injure, aggrieve, or annoy such person, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor."

Case reserved by Martin, B., at the Liverpool summer assizes 1861, for the opinion of this Court.

The indictment was tried before me at the last Liverpool assizes.

The prisoner lodged with the prosecutrix, and, unknown to her, put into a cup of tea which she was about to drink, a quantity of cantharides; she drank the contents of the cup and suffered much pain and was very ill in consequence.

Cantharides taken internally in large quantities is poisonous; but it is administered by medical men as a stimulant to the kidneys and bladder. It is also administered and taken to procure abortion and to excite the sexual passion and desire.

The jury found that the prisoner administered the cantharides to and caused it to be taken by the prosecutrix, with the intent to excite her sexual passion and desire, in order that he might obtain connection with her.

I postponed the judgment and offered to let the prisoner at liberty on bail, but I believe none was obtained, and that the prisoner is in custody.

I request the opinion of the Court of Criminal Appeal, whether the intent above stated was an intent to injure, or to aggrieve, or to annoy, within the meaning of the statute 23 Vict. c. 8.

SAMUEL MARTIN.

The 23 Vict. c. 8 (an Act to amend the law relating to the unlawful administering of poison), s. 2, enacts, that "whosoever shall unlawfully and maliciously administer to, or cause to be administered to or taken by any other person, any poison or other destructive or noxious thing, with intent to injure, aggrieve, or annoy such person, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and being convicted thereof shall be liable to be sentenced to imprisonment for any period not exceeding three years, with or without hard labour, at the discretion of the court, and the costs and the expenses of the prosecution of any such misdemeanor may be allowed by the court as in cases of felony.

Embezzlement—Secretary of a friendly society—Felonious intent—Evidence.

Upon the trial of an indictment charging the prisoner with embezzling three distinct sums of money, it appeared that on investigation of the books of a friendly society, kept by the secretary (the prisoner), it was discovered that he had not entered in the books subscriptions received by him in small sums of 1s., 2s. and 3s. at a time, amounting to more than 100l. The prisoner, on being called upon for an explanation, admitted that he had received the money, and was willing to repay the amount, and said that the law could not touch him. The books of the society kept by the prisoner were tendered generally in evidence on the part of the prosecution, whereupon it was objected on behalf of the prisoner, that the evidence should have been confined to the three particular entries referring to the three charges in the indictment. It was further contended for the prisoner that it was a breach of trust only, and that the prisoner on these facts could not be convicted of embezzlement. The objections were overruled, and the jury found the prisoner guilty:

Held, that upon these facts the jury might properly convict.

Case reserved for the opinion of this Court by the chairman at a court of quarter sessions, held at Hexham.

On the 3rd July 1861 William Proud was charged, as appears by the indictment, with embezzlement, of which indictment the following is a copy:—

"Northumberland to wit.—The jurors for our Lady the Queen, upon their oath present, that William Proud, on the eighteenth day of August, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and sixty, being then employed as clerk and servant to William Civil, John Armstrong and Francis Armstrong, did by virtue of his said employment then, and whilst he was so employed as aforesaid, receive and take into his possession certain money to a large amount, to wit, to the amount of ninepence, for and in the name and on the account of the said William Civil, John Armstrong and Francis Armstrong, his masters, and the said money then fraudulently and feloniously did embezzle, and so the jurors aforesaid upon their oath aforesaid, do say that the said William Proud, in manner and form aforesaid, the said money, the property of the said William Civil, John Armstrong and Francis Armstrong, his masters, from the said William Civil, John Armstrong and Francis Armstrong, did steal, take and carry away, against the form of the statute in such case made and provided, and against the peace of our Lady the Queen, her crown and dignity.

"Second count.—And the jurors aforesaid, upon their oath aforesaid, do further present, that the said William Proud afterwards, and within six calendar months from the time of the committing of the said offence in the first count of this indictment charged and stated, to wit, on the 1st day of September in the year aforesaid, being then still employed as such clerk aforesaid by the said William Civil, John Armstrong and Francis Armstrong, did by virtue of such last-mentioned employment then, and whilst he was so employed as last aforesaid, receive and take into his possession certain other money to a large amount, to wit, to the amount of ninepence, for and in the name and on account of his said last-mentioned masters, and the said last-mentioned money then and within the said six calendar months aforesaid fraudulently and feloniously did embezzle; and so the jurors aforesaid, upon their oath aforesaid, do say that the said William Proud, in manner and form aforesaid, the said last-mentioned money, the property of his said masters, from the said William Civil, John Armstrong and Francis Armstrong feloniously did steal, take and carry away, against the form of the statute in such case made and provided, and against the peace of our Lady the Queen, her crown and dignity.

REG. v. JANE ROBSON.

[C. CAS. R.]

"Third count.—And the jurors aforesaid, upon their oath aforesaid, do further present, that the said William Proud afterwards, and within six calendar months from the time of the committing of the said offence in the first count of this indictment charged and stated, to wit, on the 1st day of September in the year aforesaid, being then still employed as such servant as aforesaid to the said William Civil, John Armstrong, and Francis Armstrong, did by virtue of such last-mentioned employment then, and whilst he was so employed as last aforesaid, receive and take into his possession certain other money to a large amount, to wit, to the amount of ninepence, for and in the name and on account of the said William Civil, John Armstrong and Francis Armstrong, and the said last-mentioned money then and within the said six calendar months last aforesaid fraudulently and feloniously did embezzle; and so the jurors aforesaid, upon their oath aforesaid, do say that the said William Proud, in manner and form aforesaid, the said money, the property of the said William Civil, John Armstrong and Francis Armstrong, his masters, from the said William Civil, John Armstrong and Francis Armstrong, feloniously did steal, take and carry away, against the form of the statute in such case made and provided, and against the peace of our Lady the Queen, her crown and dignity."

The prisoner for fifteen years had been a member of and secretary to a properly certified Friendly Society at Hexham, the rules of which, as far as they are material to the present case, were as follows:—

"Appointment of Treasurer and Trustees."

"At the first meeting of this lodge after these rules are registered, there shall be elected by a majority of the members then present, three trustees and a treasurer, who shall continue in office during the pleasure of the lodge.

"Board of Management."

"That this lodge shall consist of an unlimited number of members. The business thereof shall be conducted by a board of management, consisting of the following, viz., Noble Grand, or N. G., Vice-Grand, or V. G., Grand Master, or G. M., Secretary, Warden, right and left supporters to N. G. and V. G., guardian and treasurer; that five shall form a quorum, and the meetings shall be held every other Saturday, at eight in the evening, and continue open until ten, when it shall be closed for the evening; that every member of the lodge shall have an equal voice in all the property and concerns thereof; and when at any time or in any case the votes may be equal, the president at the time shall have the casting vote.

"Duty of Treasurer."

"The treasurer shall take charge of the funds of the lodge, and pay all demands when ordered to do so by the lodge, or by the N. G., V. G., and secretary for the time being; he shall balance his accounts at each auditing of the lodge books, or when required by the board of management, and supply the lodge officers with a duplicate thereof, he shall also give up all books, documents, moneys and property of the lodge in his possession when required so to do by a resolution of the lodge, and he shall, before taking upon himself the duties of his office, give security to the trustees, by himself and two bondsmen, pursuant to the Friendly Societies Act, 13 & 14 Vict. c. 115, s. 11, the amount to be determined on at a summoned meeting of the members, and bound to be in the form set forth, at the end of the Friendly Societies Act.

"Duty of Secretary."

"He shall attend all meetings of the lodge, take minutes of the proceedings thereof, and keep a correct account of the receipts and expenditure of the lodge, prepare all summonses in due time, attend the auditors to point out and explain anything they may require respecting the accounts when required by the officers, or a majority of the lodge. He shall prepare all documents for the district and board of directors, and make the annual and other returns to the registrar, as required by the Friendly Societies Act, 13 & 14 Vict. c. 115, and for his services he shall receive from the incidental expense funds of the lodge such sum as may be agreed upon on his acceptance of office."

The prisoner was appointed secretary by the society, and, as such, received a salary of 1*l.* per annum. No treasurer had ever been appointed, and the prisoner for the whole fifteen years had always at the weekly meetings of the society received all moneys due from the members, giving receipts for the same, and punctually made all payments due from the society, placing the balance in the society's box with the books at the lodge room. The prisoner always gave correct receipts to the members for their weekly payments, but made false entries in the contribution and cash-book kept by him as secretary.

In the course of last spring, suspicions having arisen, the prisoner was called upon to deliver up his books and the balance in hand; and it was then discovered, by comparing the receipts received by the members from the prisoner with the books kept by him, that he had not entered in the books a large number of subscriptions received by him in small sums of one, two, and three shillings at a time, amounting in the whole to more than 100*l.*

The prisoner was called upon for an explanation, and at once admitted he had received the money, and was willing to repay the amount by instalments, and said that the law could not touch him.

The counsel for the defence contended that it no doubt was a breach of trust, but that upon these facts the prisoner could not be convicted of embezzlement.

In the course of the case the books of the society, kept by the prisoner, were tendered generally in evidence by the prosecution; and, on behalf of the prisoner, it was objected that the evidence must be confined to the three particular entries referring to the three charges in the indictment.

The Court, however, overruled the objection, and left the case to the jury, who found the prisoner guilty.

The Court thereupon passed sentence, but respited execution of the judgment on such conviction until the objection was considered and decided, and took a recognisance of bail from the prisoner to render himself in execution, pursuant to the statute 11 & 12 Vict. c. 78.

The opinion of the Court of Criminal Appeal is asked whether, on the above facts, the conviction can be sustained. (Signed) THOS. ANDERSON, Chairman of the said Court of Quarter Sessions.

No counsel appeared on behalf either of the prosecution or the prisoner.

By the COURT :

Conviction affirmed.

Saturday, Nov. 16.

(Before POLLOCK, C.B., WIGHTMAN and WILLIAMS, JJ., MARTIN and BRAMWELL, BB.)

REG. v. JANE ROBSON.

Bailees—Larceny—Married woman—20 & 21 Vict. c. 54, s. 4.

The prisoner, a married woman, living with her husband, at the request of a lodger in her husband's house, took charge of his box containing, as the prisoner knew, money. She afterwards broke open the box, and stole the money. The husband had nothing to do with the transaction :

Held, upon a case reserved on an indictment containing counts against the prisoner as a bailee, and for larceny, that she was guilty either of one or the other.

Case reserved by Martin, B. for the opinion of this court:—

The indictment was tried before me at the last Durham assizes. It contained two counts: the first against the prisoner as bailee under the statute 20 & 21 Vict. c. 54, s. 4; the second, for larceny.

The prisoner was a married woman, living with her husband. They took in lodgers, but she exclusively attended to them, made the contracts with them and received the payments from them. Her husband did not in any way interfere in regard to them.

The prosecutor lodged with them; he had in his bedroom a box in which he kept his clothes; he kept in this box a smaller box, in which he had placed 45*l*. The smaller box was locked, and the key placed in a drawer within the larger one. He was about to go to another part of the country to work, he thereupon locked up the larger box, gave the key to the prisoner, who knew that the smaller box containing the 45*l*. was within it, and requested her to take care of all, that is to say, the larger box and the smaller one, and the money for him, which she promised to do, and took the whole under her charge, and into her possession, so far as she could by law.

Her husband had nothing whatever to do with the transaction. During the prosecutor's absence, and whilst she was in possession and charge of the property as above mentioned, she fraudulently stole the money, and took and converted it to her own use. Her husband did not know of her doing so, and was innocent in the matter.

I postponed the judgment, and permitted her to be discharged upon her husband's recognisance for her appearance when called upon:

I request the opinion of the Court of Criminal Appeal:

First, whether the prisoner, under the circumstances above mentioned, was a bailee within the meaning of the statute 20 & 21 Vict. c. 54, s. 4? and Secondly, whether she was guilty of larceny?

SAMUEL MARTIN.

T. Campbell Foster, for the prisoner.—This conviction cannot be sustained. First, as to the count against the prisoner as bailee. No doubt, if the husband had committed the offence, he would have been criminally liable under the Fraudulent Trustees Act as a bailee.

MARTIN, B.—This would have amounted to a breaking of bulk.

Foster.—I am now upon the count treating the prisoner as bailee, and I contend the prisoner could not be convicted upon it, as a bailment is founded on a contract, and a married woman is unable to enter into a contract. In point of law the husband was the bailee.

WIGHTMAN, J.—That can hardly be so. He knew nothing about the transaction, and he could not be made a bailee against his will.

MARTIN, B.—It is only necessary that a person should have the care of a chattel to make him a bailee; a contract is not essential. There is a case in the C. P. where a master purchased a railway ticket for his servant, and it was held that the servant could not sue for the loss of his own luggage, the action being founded on a breach of duty and not of contract: (Marshall v. The York, Newcastle and Berwick Railway Company, 11 C. B. 655.)

Foster.—At all events the box was in the possession of the husband, and a wife cannot be convicted of stealing the property of her husband.

WIGHTMAN, J.—She broke the box open.

Foster.—What she did is not punishable as against her husband, who was the bailor. Coggs v. Barnard, 1 Smith L. C. 82, shows that there must be a contract to support a bailment.

MARTIN, B.—Can there not be a bailment by licence?

Foster.—I submit not.

WIGHTMAN, J.—If the husband, though a bailor, had broken bulk, would he not be liable? and if so, why is not the wife liable? Suppose a lodger had gone out leaving a gold watch upon his dressing-table, and the wife, without the knowledge of her husband, had taken it, would she not be liable?

Foster.—I submit she could not be indicted.

MARTIN, B.—You fail in showing any contract with the husband at all. If an action were brought against him for the loss, he would be entitled to the verdict on non assumpsit.

Foster then referred to the cases of Marshall v. Rutton, 8 T. R. 545; and Reg. v. Cassall, 30 L. J. 175, M. C.; 8 Cox C. C. 491. Secondly, as to the count for larceny. A breaking of bulk assumes a bailment.

WIGHTMAN, J.—You can break bulk without a bailment.

WILLIAMS, J.—The reason why a carrier's wife cannot be guilty of stealing part of the things to be carried is because a bailee cannot be guilty of a trespass but a stranger can, and if you add to the trespass a felonious intent, that will make it a larceny.

Foster.—In Willis' case, 1 Moo. C. C. 375, it was held, that the wife of a member of a friendly society, who stole money belonging to the society out of a box in her husband's custody, under the lock of the stewards of the society, was not guilty of larceny. A bailee is a person with whom a specific thing is deposited, and who is bound to return it in specie.

Waddy for the prosecution.

POLLOCK, C.B.—It is enough to say that one of the questions left to us is, whether the prisoner was guilty of larceny under the circumstances. I think she was.

WIGHTMAN, J.—Either the prisoner was a bailee, and guilty on the first count of the indictment, or she was not a bailee, and then she was guilty of larceny on the second count.

MARTIN, B.—My impression is, that she was a bailee by licence, and that there need not be a specific contract of bailment to make a person a bailee within the meaning of the 20 & 21 Vict. c. 54, s. 4.

WILLIAMS, J. and CHANNELL, B. concurred.

Burial board—18 & 19 Vict. c. 128, s. 11—20 & 21 Vict. c. 81, s. 9—Construction of statutes.

*The parish of Middleswich is divided into fourteen townships, each maintaining its own poor and raising its own poor-rate, though it has four churchwardens for the whole parish, and has an ancient church and burial ground. In June 1858 a vestry of the entire parish resolved upon having a new burial-ground, and therefore a burial board was appointed. The sum of 3000*l*. having been borrowed for the purposes of the new burial-ground, it became necessary to call for 303*l*. 6*s*. 5*d*. out of the poor-rates, to pay the interest, &c., and the sum of 55*l*. 8*s*. 7*d*. was apportioned upon the township (one of the four-* teen) of Minshull Vernon. The overseers of that township having refused to pay, a mandamus issued to compel payment, to which they made a return that the approval of the Secretary of State was not obtained, as required by sect. 9 of the 20 & 21 Vict. c. 81, and that the board was not therefore legally formed:

Held, that the return was a good answer to the mandamus.

This was a demurrer to a return to a mandamus. It appeared that the parish of Middlewich, in the county of Chester, consisted of fourteen townships, each having separate overseers, and each having its own poor-rate. The common law parish of Middlewich had four churchwardens for the whole parish, and had an ancient church and burial-ground situate at Middlewich. On the 22nd June 1858 a meeting of the vestry of the whole parish was held, when it was resolved that a new burial-ground should be provided, and a burial board appointed. The board subsequently borrowed 3000*l.* of the Public Works Commissioners, and this sum was expended, with the sanction of the vestry, in the purchase and laying out of a new burial-ground. To enable the board to make the first payment in respect of interest, and in discharge of the debt, it became necessary to call for 303*l.* 6*s.* 5*d.* out of the poor-rates, of which the sum of 55*l.* 8*s.* 7*d.* was apportioned to the township of Minshull Vernon, which the defts., as overseers, were required to pay to the board out of the poor-rates; and upon their refusal the present writ of mandamus was applied for and issued. The overseers returned that Minshull Vernon is a township separately maintaining its own poor, and that the said burial board was appointed after the passing of the 20 & 21 Vict. c. 81, without the approval of the Secretary of State as required by the 9th section; that Minshull Vernon had a separate and sufficient burial-ground under the Church Building Act, 1 & 2 Will. 4, c. 38, and that long before the Burial Act of the 15 & 16 Vict. c. 85, a new church had been erected in Minshull Vernon, and a churchyard surrounding it had been inclosed, and both church and churchyard had been consecrated, and a particular district had been assigned to the said church for the visitation of the sick and other pastoral and ecclesiastical duties.

By sect. 10 of the 15 & 16 Vict. c. 85, the inhabitants of any metropolitan parish may assemble in vestry and decide upon providing a burial-ground for the said parish; and by sect. 11, in the case of their resolving to have such burial-ground, a burial board is to be appointed. By sect. 20 powers are given to the board to borrow money to be paid out of the poor-rates.

By the 16 & 17 Vict. c. 134, the foregoing Act is extended to the whole country. By the 20 & 21 Vict. c. 81, s. 9, after reciting that by the 18 & 19 Vict. c. 128, it is enacted that where the inhabitants of several parishes or places have been accustomed to meet in one vestry for purposes common to such several parishes or places the vestry of any such several parishes or places might appoint a burial board, provides that "Where any of the several parishes or places, under the circumstances provided for in the said enactment, separately maintains its own poor or has a separate burial board, it shall not be lawful for the vestry or meeting in the nature of a vestry of such several parishes or places to appoint a burial board under the said enactment without the approval of one of her Majesty's principal Secretaries of State."

Gray now appeared in support of the demurrer, and argued that, as the 10th section of the 15 & 16 Vict. c. 85 gave the parishioners an absolute right to appoint a burial board for the entire parish, there was nothing in any subsequent Act that took away that right, and that this right was not affected by the 9th section of the 20 & 21 Vict. c. 81, which has no repealing words, the 9th section referring to the places referred to in the 11th section of the 18 & 19 Vict. c. 128, of which there is not one. He referred to Reg. v. Sudbury, El. Bl. & El. 264; Viner v. The Churchwardens of Tunbridge, 28 L. J. 251, M.C.; and the following statutes: 18 & 19 Vict. c. 128, s. 11; 20 & 21 Vict. c. 81, s. 9; 23 & 24 Vict. c. 64, s. 4; 1 & 2 Will. 4, c. 38, ss. 10, 23.

Walsby (Bayliss with him) contended that, as the consent of the Secretary of State was not obtained, as provided for by the 9th section of the 20 & 21 Vict. c. 81, the burial board was illegally formed.

COCKBURN, C.J.—I don't see, Mr. Gray, how you can apportion any part of this sum upon this township, unless under the authority of the 11th section of the 18 & 19 Vict. c. 128, and in that case you come within the provisions of the 9th section of the 20 & 21 Vict. c. 81, and required the sanction of the Secretary of State. The ordinary mode of assessing the amount would be by an entire rate over the whole parish; but that you cannot do, for there are no overseers for the entire parish. You are driven then to your apportionment, and there is the difficulty. Either you are within the 9th section of the 20 & 21 Vict. c. 81, and so require the sanction of the Secretary of State, or you are not, and if not you have no power to apportion the amount. We do not say that a burial board for the entire parish may not be constituted in such a case as this, but that the objection taken is fatal to this mandamus.

WIGHTMAN and BLACKBURN, JJ. concurred.

Judgment for the defts.

REG. v. THE BURIAL BOARD FOR THE PARISHES OF ST. JOHN, WESTGATE, AND ELSWICK, NEWCASTLE.

Burial board—Discontinued burial-ground—Repairs of—Who liable to repair.

The churchyard of St. John, Westgate, Newcastle, was the property of private persons, and burials therein being discontinued by an order in council, a joint burial board was constituted for the said parish of St. John, Westgate, and the parish of Elswick. The walls and fences of the said churchyard being out of repair, the burial board were required to repair them, under the provisions of sect. 18 of the 18 & 19 Vict. c. 128:

Held, that that section applies only to burial-grounds the property of the parish.

This was a demurrer to a return to a mandamus.

It appeared that by an order in council of the 18th Feb. 1854, burials had been discontinued in the churchyard of St. John, Westgate, Newcastle, and that a joint burial board had been constituted for that parish and the parish of Elswick. It also appeared that the said churchyard of St. John, Westgate, was the property of private persons, and that the walls and fences were out of repair, whereupon the said burial board had been called upon to repair them, and had refused to do so, whereupon the present mandamus issued. The defts. returned that the said churchyard was not a churchyard or burial-ground of any parish or place having separate overseers and maintaining its own poor, but was and is the property of certain private persons; that separate burial boards had been constituted for the parish of St. John, the township of Westgate, and the township of Elswick, and that subsequently a joint burial board had been appointed for the said parish and two townships, for the purpose of providing and managing one burial-ground for the common use of such parish and township, and for such purposes only.

By sect. 18 of the 18 & 19 Vict. c. 128, it is enacted that "In every case in which any order in council has been or shall hereafter be issued for the discountenance of burials in any churchyard or burial-ground, the burial board or churchwardens, as the case may be, shall maintain such churchyard or burial-ground of any parish in decent order, and also do the necessary repair of the walls and other fences thereof, and the costs and expenses shall be repaid by the overseers upon the certificate of the burial board or churchwardens, as the case may be, out of the rate made for the relief of the poor of the parish or place in which such churchyard or burial-ground is situate, unless there shall be some other fund legally chargeable with such costs and expenses."

Jones now appeared in support of the demurrer, and argued that the facts stated in the return were no answer to the mandamus. [COCKBURN, C.J.—The difficulty arises in consequence of the words "burial-ground of any parish. Can it be said that that is a burial-ground of a parish? The words are not "burial-ground in any parish."] To carry out the obvious intention of the Legislature the word "of" should be read as the word "in." The first part of the section speaks of churchyards and burial-grounds generally. After the ground is closed the private owner has no longer any profit in it, and so has no interest in keeping it in repair. [COCKBURN, C.J.—Where the Legislature uses plain language that language must be followed; here it says, "burial-ground of any parish," not "in any parish." I do not mean to say that the intention may not have been different. But if the Legislature uses language which has a plain meaning we must abide by it.] The intention of the Legislature is clear from the language it uses in sect. 21 of the 24 & 25 Vict. c. 61 (Local Government Amendment).

Mellish, Q.C. appeared in support of the return, and was arguing for its sufficiency, but was stopped by Judgment for the debts.

Ex parte THE INHABITANTS OF KIMBOLTON.

Witness—Inability to travel—Appeal pending—Order to examine.

Where there are proceedings pending at sessions on a removal order, and a material witness is unable to travel, but in a fit state to be examined, this court has no power to make an order for his examination to be taken for the purpose of being used in such proceedings.

J. J. Powell, on a former day, having applied for an attachment against William Stanton for disobedience to a subpoena to attend at a petty sessions in a case of a pauper removal order, and been refused on the affidavits then before the court, but with liberty to renew his motion, now stated that it appeared from a medical certificate that Stanton was unable to travel to the sessions, but in a fit condition to be examined, and he therefore moved for an order for Stanton to be examined, with a view to his examination being used in the pending proceedings. He referred to 1 Will. 4, c. 22, s. 4, and Reg. v. Upton St. Leonards, 10 Q. B. 827.

BLACKBURN, J.—The statute 1 Will. c. 22, s. 4, gives us no power to make such an order with reference to proceedings pending in another court. Here the proceedings are at sessions.

By the COURT.—This court has no power either at common law or by statute to make the order asked for.

Rule refused.

COLE v. TERRY.

Sheriff's officer—Right to recover charges—Ineffectual levy.

*A sheriff's officer having made an ineffectual levy under a f. fa. upon the goods of a debt. by reason of a claim by an assignee, upon which the officer was obliged to abandon the possession, is not entitled to sue the attorneys for the plt. who sent the writ to the sheriff for execution, for his charges.*

This was an action by an officer of the sheriff of Devon for work done as a sheriff's officer in executing divers writs at the debts' request, and upon their retainer.

The debts. Messrs. Terry and Watson are solicitors at Bradford, and in the usual way forwarded a f. fa. for 30*l.* 5*s.*, to be executed against the goods of one Walk at the suit of Gath, by the sheriff of Devon. The writ was placed in the hands of the plt., a bailiff of the sheriff, who sent his assistant to Newton, a distance of twenty-one miles, to execute it upon Walk's goods and chattels. The assistant made the levy, and while in possession received notice that the goods seized had been assigned to one Greatrex, and in consequence he abandoned the levy after four days' possession. The plt. now sought to make the debts. liable for his charges of the abortive levy. The claim was for 2*l.* 11*s.* made up of charges for levying, mileage and four days' possession. The case came on for trial before the under-sheriff of Devon, and the jury upon the ruling of the under-sheriff returned a verdict for the plt.

Milward on a former day obtained a rule nisi to set aside the verdict on the ground of misdirection.

Mellish appeared to show cause against the rule, but admitted that he could not distinguish an officer's right from that of the sheriff, and that the case of Bilke v. Havelock, 3 Camp. 374, was against the plt.'s right to recover, where Lord Ellenborough said: "The law knows of no promise to pay the sheriff for executing the king's writ. Such an action as this was never heard of in Westminster-hall. It is the duty of the sheriff under a writ of f. fa. to seize the goods in his bailiwick belonging to the debt. If he is in doubt as to the property he may impanel a jury for his own protection. If the goods are sold he receives in poundage the specific recompence for his trouble which the law has provided. He is entitled to none for seizing and remaining in possession of goods belonging to a stranger. The office of sheriff would become a very lucrative one if he could maintain an action for every ineffectual attempt by his officers to execute a writ."

By the COURT:

Rule absolute.

WILTSHIRE (app.) v. BAKER (resp.)

Llandaff and Canton District Market Act, 21 & 22 Vict. c. 105, s. 25.

A person selling or exposing for sale an article subject to toll, in a ship or vessel within the limits of the above Act, is not exempted by sect. 25 of that Act.

This was a case stated under the 20 & 21 Vict. c. 43, by the justices of the peace of the borough of Cardiff in the county of Glamorgan.

At a petty sessions held in and for the said borough, on the 12th July 1861, the resp. appeared before us in obedience to a summons charging him with having on the 5th July instant unlawfully exposed potatoes for sale at a certain place within the limits of the Llandaff and Canton District Market Act 1858, "to wit, in a vessel in the old canal, within the said borough of Cardiff.

WILTSHIRE v. WILLETT.

Sect. 25 of the said Act enacts as follows:—

"Every person who shall sell or expose for sale at any place within the limits of this Act (other than in any existing market-place, or the market-house or market-places to be established under this Act, or in his own dwelling-house, or in any shop attached to, and being part of, any dwelling-house) any article in respect of which tolls are by this Act authorised to be taken, other than eggs, butter and fruit, shall forfeit and pay to the company any sum not exceeding 40s.

The town of Cardiff (including a portion of the "Old Canal") is within the limits of the Act.

The evidence produced at the hearing was as follows:—

Thomas Gould said: I was at the old canal on the morning of the 25th July. I remember seeing William Baker weighing up potatoes on the wharf, and I purchased from him half a ton. They were taken out and weighed on the wharf, and I took them away. I paid at the rate of 9l. 10s. per ton.

Cross-examined.—I saw Wiltshire there. This is the place where they are regularly sold.

Re-examined.—The potatoes were purchased in the vessel, and were landed and weighed on the wharf.

This was the case in support of the summons. We were of opinion that the place of sale here (the vessel) should, in a liberal interpretation of the exemption clause above recited, be considered a dwelling-house or shop, and we accordingly dismissed the information.

The app. being dissatisfied with our determination, as being erroneous in point of law, applied to us in writing within three days after such determination, to state and sign a case for the opinion of the Court of C. B., in compliance with which application we hereby state this case, and pray the opinion of the court thereon.

The question for the consideration of the court is, whether the sale or exposure for sale of an article subject to toll, in a ship or vessel within the limits of the Act, is protected by the exemption clause above referred to.

Giffard for the app.—This is a case of a vessel on a canal selling marketable articles within the limits prescribed, and contrary to the provisions of the Act, and the magistrates having found that the resp. came within the exemption given by sect. 25, but there is no evidence to justify such a decision.

The resp. was not represented.

ERLE, C. J.—I am of opinion that the decision of the magistrates ought to be reversed. I presume strongly in favour of the decision of those whose duty it is to adjudicate, as they can bring their local knowledge to bear on the case; but as I cannot put myself in their position, and am not in possession of the full particulars of the case, I must confine myself to the question whether a vessel in a canal is such a "dwelling-house or shop attached to and being part of any dwelling-house" within the meaning of the clause giving exemption; and I am of opinion that it is not.

The rest of the Court concurred.

Decision of magistrates reversed.

WILTSHIRE (app.) v. WILLETT (resp.)

Construction of words in local Act (Llandaff and Canton District Market Act, 21 & 22 Vict. c. 105, s. 25—Selling in a shop attached to and being part of a dwelling-house.

By sect. 25 of the above Act, it is enacted that every person who shall sell or expose for sale at any place within the limits of this Act (other than in any existing market-place, or the market-house or market-places to be established under this Act, or in his own dwelling-house, or in any shop attached to and being part of any dwelling-house) any article in respect of which tolls are by this Act authorised to be taken, other than eggs, butter and fruit, shall forfeit and pay, &c.

The resp. exposed for sale certain goods not excepted by the above section in an auction-room, which is attached to and part of a dwelling-house, but in which the owner of the goods did not live:

Held, that he came within the exception of the above section, as the place where the goods were exposed for sale was a shop within the meaning of the Act.

This was a special case stated for the opinion of the court from justices, under 21 & 22 Vict. c. 43.

CASE.

At a petty session held in and for the said borough of Cardiff, in the county of Glamorgan, on the 23rd Aug., the resp. appeared before us in obedience to a summons charging him with having, on the 9th Aug. inst., unlawfully exposed for sale forty sacks of flour, one sack of toppings, a quantity of ham, a quantity of beef and pork, and a quantity of cheese, in certain auction-rooms in High-street, in the said borough, and within the limits of the Llandaff and Canton Markets Act 1858. Sect. 25 of the said Act enacts as follows: "Every person who shall sell or expose for sale at any place within the limits of this Act (other than in any existing market-place or the market-house and market-places to be established under this Act, or in his own dwelling-house, or in any shop attached to and being part of any dwelling-house) any article in respect of which tolls are by this Act authorised to be taken, other than eggs, butter and fruit, shall forfeit and pay to the company any sum not exceeding forty shillings."

The town of Cardiff is within the limits of the Act; the sale by auction by the resp. of the article, and at the place and time mentioned in the summons, was proved by James Holloway, who, in cross-examination, said, "Mr. Willett's auction-room is part of a house; a regular house; no one lives there now; it is a dwelling-house."

The resp. admitted that he only rented the shop, and no other part of the house.

The resp. called several witnesses, but the only one who gave evidence material to the grounds of our determination was his clerk Henry Jones, who, after making certain statements irrelevant to this case, said: "The premises which Mr. Willett occupies are part of No. 5, High-street, which is a dwelling-house with shop under it; the upper part is occupied by Mr. Evans, who has a communication with it; there is a communication down stairs; Mr. Willett occupies the shop." On cross-examination he added, "I don't go to any other part of the house for business."

We were of opinion, upon these facts, that the sale took place in a shop attached to and being part of a dwelling-house, and so was within the exception contained in the section of the company's Act above recited, and we accordingly dismissed the charge.

The app. being dissatisfied with our determination, as being erroneous in point of law, applied to us in writing within three days after such determination, to state and sign a case for the opinion of the Court of C. B., in compliance with which application we hereby state this case, and pray the opinion of the court thereon.

The question for consideration of the court is, whether the sale in question is within the exception above referred to.

Giffard for the app.—This is not within the meaning of the clause giving exemption. The dwelling-house to which the shop is attached must be a dwelling-house at the time when the exemption was claimed. "Any dwelling-house," which are the words used in the statute, must mean the seller's dwelling-house. Here no one lived in the house. The sale intended to be within the exemption was a sale of a person's own goods, and a sale by an auctioneer was not contemplated by the statute.

Waddy for the resp. — The Act must have been framed to meet such a case as this. The Markets and Fairs Clauses Act, 10 & 11 Vict. c. 14, is incorporated in this Act, and applies except where it is expressly varied, as in the present instance, for by sect. 13 of the old Act, the words used are, "except in his own dwelling-place or shop," whereas in this Act they are, "or in his own dwelling-house or in any shop attached thereto, and being part of any dwelling-house."

ERLE, C.J. — I am of opinion that on the first point the magistrates were right in holding that this shop was within the meaning of the exception, whether the party selling lives in the house or not. The general Act of 10 & 11 Vict. c. 14, s. 13, says that a person selling, except in his own dwelling-house, is liable to a penalty. In the local Act, which is before us, he is liable to a penalty, "unless he sells in his own dwelling-house, or in any shop attached to and being part of any dwelling-house." It seems to me that the deviation from the general Act shows that the words were intentionally placed in this local Act; and it shows that a person who sells is not liable if he sells in any shop attached to and being part of any dwelling-house. Then, with regard to the question whether this was a shop, some of the witnesses speak of it as a shop, and there was no evidence to the contrary; and, taking that with the decision of the magistrate, we may take it to be a shop, and so to be protected. Then comes the question as to whether an auctioneer selling there is within the exception. I do not see why a person may not in his own shop dispose of his goods by auction, private contract, or on commission.

REGISTRATION APPEAL.

Monday, Nov. 11.

LEWIS (app.) v. ROBERTS (resp.)

County vote—Service of notice of objection—Duplicate notice—Signature by objector—6 Vict. c. 18, ss. 7 and 100.

It is sufficient proof of the service of a notice of objection through the post, under sect. 100 of the Registration Act, 6 Vict. c. 18, to produce before the revising barrister a duplicate notice signed by the objector and stamped by the postmaster; and it is not necessary to show that the original notice, forwarded by the postmaster in compliance with his duty under that section, was signed by the objector.

This was an appeal from the decision of the revising barrister for the western division of the county of Kent.

CASE.

At a court by me, the revising barrister duly appointed to revise the list of voters for the western division of the county of Kent, held on the 14th day of Oct. 1861, at Greenwich, in the said division, for revising the lists of the parishes in the polling district of Blackheath, John Innous (on the register of voters for the parish of Bromley, in the said division) objected to the name of Thomas Lovitt Howard being retained on the list of voters for the parish of Plumstead, in the said western division of the county of Kent.

A paper writing (which is annexed to, and forms part of, this case), purporting to be a duplicate of the notice of objection, stamped at a proper post-office on the 24th day of August last, was produced before me, and it was proved that in due course of post the original notice would have reached the voter on or before the 25th day of August last. The signature to the said paper writing or duplicate was proved to be in the handwriting of the said John Innous, and the identity of the person signing the said duplicate notice with the person of that name on the said Bromley list of voters was proved, but no proof was given before me that the original notice of objection, of which such paper writing purported to be a duplicate, had been signed by the said John Innous, other than the production of such stamped duplicate so signed by him as aforesaid.

The notice of objection to the overseers in the same case was duly proved.

It was contended on behalf of the said Thomas Lovitt Howard that the notice was signed by the party objecting, as required by 6 Vict. c. 18, s. 7.

The original notice was not produced.

The said Thomas Lovitt Howard did not prove his qualification, and I held that the notice of objection to him was valid, and expunged his name from the list.

The name of James Jacobs was expunged from the same list of voters, under the same circumstances.

If the court should be of opinion that such notice of objection was invalid, the names of the said Thomas Lovitt Howard and James Jacobs are respectively to be restored to the list of voters for the said parish of Plumstead; and the register of voters is to be amended accordingly.

If the court should be of opinion that such a notice of objection was valid, the said register is to stand without amendment.

I declare that the appeals against such decisions ought to be consolidated, as they depend upon the same decision; and with his consent I name Mr. Charles Edward Lewis, of 6, Old Jewry, in the city of London, gentleman, a person interested for and on behalf of himself and all other persons in like manner interested in such appeals, to be the app. in such consolidated appeals, and to prosecute and answer the said appeal; and with his consent I name Mr. Thomas Nicholls Roberts, of 11, Coleman-street, in the city of London, gentleman, to be resp. in such consolidated appeal.

Macnamara for the app. — The question here is whether in a case where the duplicate notice of objection, stamped by the postmaster and signed by the objector, is produced before the revising barrister, it is necessary to prove that the original notice was signed by him also. Sect. 7 of the Registration Act, 6 Vict. c. 78, directs that "the objector shall give or cause to be given to the person objected to, or leave or cause to be left at his place of abode, as described in the list of voters, a notice according to the form numbered 5 in schedule A, or to the like effect, and every such notice of objection shall be signed by the party so objecting as aforesaid." Then sect. 100 directs the proceedings as to the duplicate. It provides that whenever any person shall be desirous of sending a notice of objection by the post, he shall deliver the same, duly directed, open and in duplicate, to the postmaster, &c., under such regulation with respect to registration, &c., and the fee to be paid for such registration, as shall from time to time be made; and in all cases in which such fee shall have been duly paid, the postmaster shall compare the said notice and the duplicate, and on being satisfied that they are alike in their address and their contents, shall forward one of them to its address by the post, and shall return the other to the party bringing the same, duly stamped with the stamp of the said post-office; and the production by the party who posted such notice of such stamped duplicate shall be evidence of the notice having been given to the person at the place mentioned in such duplicate on the day on which such notice shall in the ordinary course of post have been delivered to such place: (Toms v. Cuming, 7 M. & G. 88; Allen v. Waterhouse, 6 Scott, 88.)

T. Atkinson for the resp.—The court will take the stamped duplicate notice produced before the revising barrister as an original. It is not necessary to prove the signature of the original notice of objection: (Birch, app., v. Edwards, resp., 5 C. B. 45; Bishop, app., v. Help, resp., 2 C. B. 45.) The production of the stamped duplicate notice of objection is sufficient. [BYLES, J.—Does not the question turn upon the meaning of the word “duplicate?”] The stamped duplicate is a thing created by the statute, and is in reality an original document.

Macnamara in reply.—There is no duty on the postmaster to satisfy himself as to the signatures or the handwriting upon the original notice or duplicate being that of the objector. There may be a duplicate, though not written by the same person as the original. The courts have always enforced with much strictness the provisions of the sections relating to notices of objection.

ERLE, C.J.—I am of opinion that the revising barrister was right in this case. The evidence was, that duplicate notice of objection had been taken to the post-office, and all the requirements of sect. 100 had been complied with; that the two duplicates were signed by the objector, and the duplicate, which the postmaster returned to the party who posted them, was produced; and the question is, whether that is evidence that the notice of objection had reached the party objected to. The words of sect. 100 of the 6 Vict. c. 18, are “the production by the party who posted such notice of such stamped duplicate shall be evidence of the notice having been given to the person at the place mentioned in such duplicate on the day on which such notice shall in the ordinary course of post have been delivered to such place.” I am of opinion that that statute was passed to prevent the necessity of a specific witness going to the place of residence of the objector, and doing all that might be necessary in case of personal service; and I am of opinion that the statute has provided abundantly for all the Legislature intended to be secured by the provision here mentioned. Then it enacted, in terms, that the production of the duplicate shall be evidence of the notice having been received by the party—not conclusive proof, but evidence; and I think I give effect to the enactment by holding that there was evidence in this case that the notice of objection had reached the party objected to. It is said that the Legislature intended that the objector should be identified by his personal signature. That is one point of the judgment in the case of Toms v. Cuming, that the objector must be identified by his personal signature; and a further point in the case was, that each of the documents taken to the postmaster as duplicates must be signed by the objector, and more than one judge in the course of giving judgment in that case, says, that the meaning of the word “duplicate” is “identical” in all essential respects, and that actual signature by his own hand on the part of the objector is an essential of the notice of objection. In that case the party sent a notice signed by himself, and kept what he called the duplicate not signed by himself, but in reality a copy, and it was held that the requirements of the Act of Parliament were not complied with, and the copy kept was not a duplicate, because not signed by the objector. All duplicates must be signed by the objector, and then their production will be evidence. The statute provides against the possibility of a man of straw being put forward different from the party that was expected to come forward, because his own handwriting is to the duplicate to be kept, and that estops him from saying that it was not in his own writing; he has brought the duplicate forward which he has marked; he has sent the duplicate of the one he has kept signed by himself; the statute has provided that the postmaster shall compare the notice and the duplicate, and on being satisfied that they are alike in their address and contents, shall forward one and return the other. The postmaster is to look to the contents, and part of the contents must be the signature of the objector; both must be signed by the same person, and in all essentials the same. And the statute has further provided that this precaution shall be taken, because the production of the duplicate kept by the objector is evidence of the other having been sent to the person objected to, and it is for the purpose of giving an opportunity to examine whether the two documents were two duplicates in the sense I have mentioned, that is, identical in all essential points—identical, therefore, in both being the genuine signature of the party objecting; he must know that, and he is the only party that is capable of giving this statutory proof by producing the duplicate that was kept. I am of opinion that the words of the statute are complied with, and the decision, it seems to me, is in entire accordance with the case of Toms v. Cuming, which altogether turned on the difference between “copy” and the “duplicate:” they cannot be duplicates unless identical in all essential respects, both being equally signed. I think we shall entirely defeat the intention of the statute, which meant to give a short and easy, and as the Legislature thought, as it seems to me, a safe mode of proof that the notice had been sent, if we said this was not sufficient. The words of the 100th section dispense with any further proof than the production of the stamped duplicate. For these reasons I am of opinion that the revising barrister was right.

WILLIAMS, J.—Not, I must say, without some hesitation and difficulty, I concur in the opinion expressed by my Lord, and those formed by my learned brothers, not only from a sincere deference to their opinion, but because I am desirous to give the Act of Parliament a construction that would render it both useful and sensible. I will just state, in a few words, the grounds on which I entertain some doubt. The section in question, the 100th, after enacting that “whenever any person shall be desirous of sending any such notice of objection by the post, he shall deliver the same duly directed, open, and in duplicate, to the postmaster,” then goes on to define what the postmaster is to do, and it says that “in all cases in which such fee shall have been duly paid, the postmaster shall compare the said notice and the duplicate, and on being satisfied that they are alike in their address and in their contents, shall forward one of them to its address by the post.” If the Act of Parliament had said, on being satisfied that they are “duplicates,” I should have thought it was stronger—indeed that the word “duplicate” was used in the sense of their being wholly similar, and to purport to be by the same person; but it does not say that the postmaster is to find they are duplicates; all it says is, “on being satisfied that they are alike in their address and in their contents.” As to the contents and address there may be some doubt, the signature being the same. Then comes the rest of the enactment, as to what is to be the effect of the production by the party of the stamped duplicate; it says it shall be evidence, not of the duplicate having been given to the person at the place mentioned, but of the notice having been given—that means the notice the postmaster sends, whatever it may be.

BYLES, J.—I am of opinion that the production of this duplicate was evidence of the due service of the notice of objection. The statute uses the word "duplicate," as contradistinguished from "draft" made before the original document, or from "copy" made after it; and when it says "duplicate" or "duplicates," it means two originals; and two originals there cannot be unless they are both signed. Now just consider the position of the barrister when this question is before him. The statute says, "the production by the party who posted such notice of such stamped duplicate shall be evidence of the notice having been given;" that means the duplicate produced before the postmaster. Then that is not to come from any quarter. There is a particular party appointed; that is the party who posted it. He shows it as the duplicate of which the statute speaks. When that is proved, what says this statute? It says, "the production by the party who posted such notice shall be evidence of the notice having been given to the person at the place mentioned." The notice refers to the notice mentioned in the 7th section, and the notice mentioned in the 7th section is and must be a notice duly signed. It seems to me, therefore, that the revising barrister has rightly decided that this is all that is necessary. Indeed, if it were not so, I conceive that the beneficial effect of this clause of the Act of Parliament, in making proof simple and compendious, would be, to some extent at all events, lost.

KEATING, J.—It appears to me that the revising barrister was right, and that he had evidence before him that the objector had sent to the party objected to a notice signed by him. It appears to be not unworthy of observation that the section with reference to the question whether these papers are to be duplicates, has said that the party is to take two papers to the postmaster, and the postmaster is to send one of them and return the other. That being the state of the law, that which is produced before the revising barrister must be proved as signed by the objector. It seems to me there is here satisfactory evidence that the one sent was signed by the objector. The case which has been referred to of Toms v. Cuning would scarcely have been decided in any other way, because in Toms v. Cuning they decided that that which is retained must be signed by the objector. If they were not duplicates in the sense of being signed by the same parties, surely proof that that which was sent was signed by the objector would have been amply sufficient to satisfy the provisions of the 7th section. It appears to me that the revising barrister was right, and the decision ought to be affirmed.

REG. on the prosecution of CHURCHWARDENS OF BURMINGTON v. THE REV. G. WHEELER.

Poor-rate—Tithe rentcharge—Curate's salary—When not to be deducted.

Merton College, Oxford, were the patrons of the vicarage of Wolford, and they were also the lay impropriators of the tithe rentcharge of the adjoining chapelry of Burmington. In 1843 they presented the Rev. G. D. Wheeler to the vicarage of Wolford, and in 1847 they granted him a lease of the tithe rentcharge of Burmington upon his covenanting to do the spiritual duty for that chapelry. His bishop having required that two full services should be performed in each church on Sundays, Mr. Wheeler appointed a curate, at a salary of 80l. per annum, to do the duty in Burmington. Being assessed on his tithe rentcharge for Burmington to its full amount, he claimed to have his curate's salary deducted:

Held, that he was not entitled to claim such deduction.

This was a case stated for the opinion of this court under the 11 & 12 Vict. c. 45, s. 11, as to whether or not a deduction should be made from the tithe rentcharge of the vicar of Wolford, in respect of the salary of a curate employed by him in the chapelry of Burmington. It appeared that the Rev. George Domville Wheeler was the vicar of Wolford, and that he was also the lessee of the impropriate tithe rentcharge of the adjoining chapelry of Burmington. In the year 1843 he was appointed by Merton College, Oxford, to the said vicarage of Wolford, and in the year 1847 the college granted him a lease of the impropriate tithe commutation rentcharge of Burmington, upon his covenanting to do the spiritual duty for that chapelry. The Bishop of Worcester having required that two full services should be performed in each church on Sundays, it became necessary for Mr. Wheeler to appoint a curate to do duty at Burmington, and this he did, giving his curate a salary of 80l. a-year. The parish officers of Burmington assessed Mr. Wheeler's tithe rentcharge for Burmington to the full amount, not allowing anything for the curate's salary, and this deduction having been claimed by Mr. Wheeler, and refused by the parish officers, the present case was stated.

The Attorney-General (Mellish, Q. C. with him) contended that it was optional with Mr. Wheeler to have accepted the lease of the impropriate tithe rentcharge of Burmington; it was not for him to say that he could not himself perform the duties, since such an argument would be available for any pluralist; that his being vicar of Wolford did not necessarily entail upon him the duty of performing divine service at Burmington: (Reg. v. Goodchild, El. Bls. & El. 1.)

F. M. White, contra, argued that originally the two livings had been united, and that the impropriate tithe rentcharge of Burmington had been leased to the vicar of Wolford, by a resolution of Merton College, in augmentation of the said vicarage of Wolford, Burmington being in fact a chapelry of Wolford; and that, had the lease not been granted, still, as Merton College must have employed a curate for Burmington they would have been entitled to have had his stipend deducted: (Hickcock v. Thornborough, 2 Roll. Ab. 337; Reg. v. Adams, 4 B. & Ad. 61; Reg. v. Summertime, 10 A. & L. 157.)

The Attorney-General replied.

COCKBURN, C.J.—I am of opinion that the rate was a good rate, and that the tithe rentcharge was properly assessed. The objections taken rest upon two grounds: first, that the chapelry of Burmington was to be taken as one with Wolford, and that the two together formed but one benefice, and that, as Mr. Wheeler was unable to discharge his spiritual duties in both without the assistance of a curate, he is entitled to have the salary of such curate deducted in ascertaining the rateable value of such rentcharge. This proceeds upon the assumption that the two parishes are necessarily connected. Possibly at some remote period the chapelry of Burmington may have been a dependency of the parish of Wolford; but it is quite clear that for a long series of years, perhaps for centuries, they have been dissociated so as to form two distinct parishes. It appears that for many years the authorities of Merton College have been in the habit of dealing with the rentcharge as of a distinct parish, sometimes appointing one of their own body, sometimes another, and even the present app. was appointed to Welford, and held it four years before the college thought proper to grant him the lease of the tithe rentcharge of Burmington, with the obligation of providing for the performance of spiritual duties. It is, therefore, impossible to conclude that the two are so indissolubly connected as to form one benefice. Mr. Wheeler then stands in the position of a clergyman holding two livings, and Reg. v. Goodchild is an authority for saying that the rector was not warranted in deducting the stipend of the curate. It was quite optional with him whether or not he would accept the lease of the tithe rentcharge of Burmington. But then, secondly, it is said that, inasmuch as Merton College are the improprators of the tithe rentcharge of Burmington, with the obligation of employing a minister to perform the spiritual duties, the salary of a curate is a necessary outgoing, and ought to be deducted. Now it is not necessary for the present purpose to consider what might be our decision if Merton College took the tithe rentcharge themselves, and employed a curate to perform the duties and paid him a salary, for that is not the present case; for here the whole of the tithe rentcharge is placed at the disposal of the vicar of Welford, who discharged the duties at Burmington as any ordinary rector, and in whose hands the whole of the rentcharge would be rateable. I confess I cannot see the difference between a rector who takes the whole tithe rentcharge and one situated like the app., and I see no reason why he should be placed in a better situation. But, without giving an express opinion, I am strongly inclined to think that if the college themselves employed a curate they would be liable to be assessed to the whole amount of the tithe rentcharge. I can see no reason why they should not be liable, or be in a better situation than a spiritual rector who takes the tithe rentcharge. In ancient times the tithes were annexed for the purpose of providing for the performance of the spiritual duties of the parish; why, therefore, when there is a lay improprator instead of a spiritual one, should there be any difference? I quite agree with my brother Blackburn that the principle laid down in Reg. v. Goodchild should not be extended.

Q. B.]

REG. v. JOSHUA YEADON AND JAMES BIRCH.

[C. CAS. R.]

BLACKBURN, J. concurred.

Judgment for the resps.

[Note.—This case will doubtless cause a considerable amount of perplexity to parish officers, as well as to the clergy, and probably give rise to a good deal of litigation. In the preceding case on the same point (ante, p. 462) the court held that, under the circumstances, the curate's salary might be deducted. Here the deduction was not permitted. As no principle was laid down for guidance it will be very difficult for the overseers to determine in such case whether the circumstances justify a deduction. Perhaps the nearest test will be the question, "Is a curate requisite for the needs of the parish (not for the convenience of the incumbent)?—ED.]

CROWN CASES RESERVED.

REG. v. JOSHUA YEADON AND JAMES BIRCH.

Indictment—Counts for grievous bodily harm, cutting, stabbing and wounding, and occasioning actual bodily harm—Verdict of common assault—Refusal to take such verdict—Miscarriage.

Upon an indictment charging the defts. in the first count with inflicting grievous bodily harm; in the second count with unlawfully and maliciously cutting, stabbing and wounding; and in the third count with assaulting and occasioning actual bodily harm; the jury returned a verdict of guilty of a common assault. The chairman declined to take that verdict, on the ground that a common assault was not included in the indictment, and told the jury to reconsider their verdict. The jury then found the defts. guilty, and a verdict was entered of guilty of an assault occasioning bodily harm, whereupon the chairman sentenced the prisoners:

Held, that the first verdict ought to have been taken, and that the second ought not, and that the prisoners ought not to undergo the sentence; that there had been a mistrial, and that a venire de novo should issue.

Case reserved for the opinion of this court by the chairman of the West Riding of Yorkshire sessions.

Joshua Yeadon and James Birch were indicted at the quarter sessions for the West Riding of Yorkshire, held at Bradford on the 2nd July 1861, under 14 & 15 Vict. c. 100, s. 29, and 14 & 15 Vict. c. 19, s. 4, as follows:—

"West Riding of Yorkshire to wit.—The jurors of our Lady the Queen, upon their oath present, that Joseph Yeadon, late of Otley, in the West Riding in the county of York, labourer, and James Birch, late of the same place, labourer, on the 23rd May in the 24th year of the reign of our Sovereign Lady Victoria, by the grace of God of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, Queen, Defender of the Faith, with force and arms, at the parish of Guiseley in the said West Riding of the county of York, unlawfully and maliciously did assault one Hiram Roberts, and did then and there unlawfully and maliciously kick and wound him the said Hiram Roberts in and upon the face, mouth and neck of him the said H. Roberts, and thereby then and there did unlawfully and maliciously inflict on the said H. Roberts grievous bodily harm, to the great damage of the said H. Roberts, against the form of the statute in such case made and provided, and against the peace of our said Lady the Queen, her crown and dignity.

"Second count.—And the jurors aforesaid, on their oath aforesaid, do further present, that the said J. Yeadon and J. Birch afterwards, to wit on the said 23rd May, in the year aforesaid, with force and arms, at the parish of Guiseley aforesaid, in the said West Riding of the county of York, unlawfully and maliciously did cut, stab and wound the said H. Roberts, to the great damage of the said H. Roberts, against the form of the statute in such case made and provided, and against the peace of our said Lady the Queen, her crown and dignity.

"Third count.—And the jurors aforesaid, upon their oath aforesaid, do further present, that the said J. Yeadon and J. Birch, afterwards, to wit on the said 23rd May in the year aforesaid, with force and arms at the parish of Guiseley aforesaid, in the said West Riding of the county of York, in and upon the said H. Roberts, in the peace of God and our said Lady the Queen, then being unlawfully, did make an assault, and him, the said H. Roberts, then and there unlawfully did beat, wound and ill-treat, and did thereby then and there occasion actual bodily harm to the said H. Roberts, so that his life was greatly despaired of, and other wrongs to the said H. Roberts then and there did, to the great damage of him, the said H. Roberts, and against the peace of our said Lady the Queen, her crown and dignity and against the form of the statute, in such case made and provided."

The indictment did not contain any count for a common assault merely.

On behalf of the prosecution it was proved that Yeadon and Birch, on the 23rd May, about a quarter past eleven at night, burst open the house-door of one Sarah Clayton, where H. Roberts was sitting with her and her son, a lad aged sixteen, on entering they both attacked Roberts; he was twice knocked down and was kicked about the face and body, had his chin cut open and his lip cut through, two teeth knocked out, and was saved from further injury by the entrance of neighbours. A surgeon attended him all the next day and the following morning.

On behalf of the defence it was alleged by way of justification, that Yeadon and Birch did not burst open the door, but that Roberts opened it from the inside and struck the first blow with a fire poker.

The amount of injury sustained by Roberts, and the fact that it was done by the defts., was never denied.

The jury were told by the chairman in his summing up, that the defts. were charged with an aggravated assault under a statute specially framed to meet such cases as are not sufficiently punishable under the Common Assault Act.

They retired and found a verdict of "guilty of a common assault."

Before the verdict was entered the chairman told the jury that they had found the defts. guilty of an offence with which they were not charged in the indictment, and that they must reconsider their verdict: that if they thought the defts. had unlawfully assaulted Roberts, and thereby occasioned him actual bodily harm, they must find the defts. guilty, but must acquit them if there was any doubt.

They then found the defts. guilty, and a verdict was entered of "guilty of an assault occasioning bodily harm."

On this it was contended for the defence, that the first verdict, "guilty of a common assault," was really an acquittal, and ought to have been taken as such.

The chairman doubted, but sentenced the defts. each of them to hard labour for four calendar months, and discharged them on their finding bail, to appear and render themselves in execution of judgment.

The opinion of the court is asked whether the verdict of guilty of a common assault ought to have been taken, and was tantamount to an acquittal, or should the second verdict stand, and the defts. undergo the sentence.

FRANK WORMALD, Chairman.

No counsel appeared for the prisoners.

T. Campbell Foster for the prosecution.—No doubt the first verdict of guilty of a common assault was one which ought to have been taken, and it has been so held upon this form of indictment: (Reg. v. Oliver, Bell's C. C. 287, and 8 Cox C. C. 384.) The substance of the offence charged and proved was a battery, which includes an assault. It is submitted that the latter part of the second verdict, "occasioning bodily harm," is merely matter of aggravation, and may be struck out, and that that verdict may be treated as one of assault only, and therefore in substance the same as the first verdict.

By the COURT.—We are of opinion that the first verdict of "guilty of a common assault" ought to have been taken, as it might have been, upon this indictment, and that the second verdict ought not, and that the defts. ought not to undergo the sentence.

Cur. adr. vult.

Nov. 27.—By the COURT.—In this case there has been a mistrial, and a venire de novo must be awarded.

[Note.—It is settled law, that on an indictment for wounding a verdict for a common assault may be found. The only question in this case was, whether the verdict might be accepted as a verdict for a common assault, by treating as surplusage the three last words "occasioning bodily harm." The decision is, that this could not be done, but that the verdict must be taken as it was given. However, the only result is a new trial, not an acquittal.—ED.]

REG. v. DONALD M'DONALD.

Embezzlement—Servant or partner—Share of profits.

Previous to 1855 the prisoner was in the prosecutors' service as cashier and collector, and another person W. as salesman. In that year the prisoner and W. applied each for an increase of salary, and in the end the prosecutors agreed to allow each of them 12½ per cent. on the profits in addition to their salaries, and if there was no profit in any year, neither the prisoner nor W. were to contribute anything towards the loss, but were to receive their salaries only. The prisoner and W. from time to time, instead of receiving their shares of the profits at the end of the year, allowed portions of them to remain in the hands of the prosecutors at 7 per cent.

Held, that the prisoner was a servant of the prosecutors within the meaning of the 7 & 8 Geo. 4, c. 29, s. 47, and liable to be convicted of embezzlement.

Case reserved for the opinion of this Court by the Recorder of the borough of Manchester.

At the quarter sessions for the city of Manchester, holden before me, on Monday, the 24th June 1861, Donald M'Donald was tried and convicted on an indictment for embezzling three several sums of 663*l.* 3*s.*, 449*l.* 5*s.* 6*d.*, and 182*l.* 6*s.*, the property of Joshua Lord and another, his masters.

The prosecutors, Joshua Lord and Richard Smith, carried on business as manufacturers at Bacup, under the style of James Smith and Sons, but there were no other partners than the two above named; they also carried on business in Birchin-lane, Manchester, as commission agents in cotton cloth and yarn. At their establishment in Birchin-lane they sold their own goods manufactured at Bacup, and other persons also consigned goods to them to sell, and they themselves bought goods to sell again there.

The prisoner was in their service in the Manchester business as cashier and collector, and a person of the name of Edward Williamson was their salesman.

In 1855, the prisoner and Williamson having held their respective situations in the service of the prosecutors for about seven years, applied to have their salaries, which were 150*l.* a-year each, increased. This was not at once acceded to, but in the end the prosecutors agreed to allow the prisoner and Williamson each

12½ per cent. on the profits, in addition to their salaries; and it was stipulated that if the concern should be a losing one in any year, neither the prisoner nor Williamson were to contribute anything towards the loss, but that in that event they would have to be content with their salaries.

None of these parties intended to alter, nor up to the time of the prisoner's apprehension on this charge, did any of them suppose that they had altered by this arrangement the relation of master and servant which had previously existed between the prosecutors and the prisoner and Williamson.

After this arrangement the prisoner and Williamson continued to discharge the same duties, and to hold the same positions they had respectively done before, and neither of them had any control over the management of the business.

Amongst the payments which the prisoner as such cashier had to make, were the wages and salaries of servants (the weekly payments were called wages, monthly payments salaries), and in his account he credited himself every month with the payment of his own salary amongst the rest as he had done before.

At the end of the first year after the arrangement, prosecutors proposed to prisoner and Williamson to leave with them a portion of the profits they had then to receive, and that the prosecutors would allow them 7 per cent. upon it. This was as an inducement to them to save their money, but they both then declined doing so at that time. At the end of the next year, they each left 70*l*. with the prosecutors, they agreeing to pay them 7 per cent. for it, the men being at liberty to draw it out any time if they thought they could lay it out to more advantage. It was afterwards increased, and at the time of this trial the prisoner and Williamson had each 120*l*. in the hands of the prosecutors, for which they were entitled to receive 7 per cent. as long as it remained there. Seven per cent. was the interest with which the prosecutors debited the concern on the capital employed by them in it.

There never was in any one year an actual loss to the concern. But in 1860 a great many bad debts were made; and at the stock-taking at the end of that year the profits were very trifling indeed; and the prosecutors, in consideration of that, made to each of their men, the prisoner and Williamson, a present in addition to their salaries.

On these facts the jury were of opinion that the prisoner was a servant within the meaning of the statute, and found him guilty, and I sentenced him to be imprisoned and kept to hard labour in the gaol of the city of Manchester for eighteen months.

The question for the opinion of the court is, whether the jury were warranted, on the above-stated facts, in finding that the prisoner was a servant within the meaning of the statute.

If the court should be of opinion that they were, the verdict and sentence to stand; if otherwise, both to be set aside.

RO. B. ARMSTRONG, Recorder of Manchester.

No counsel appeared for the prisoner.

Hopwood, for the prosecution, referred to Harrington v. Churchward, 29 L. J. Ch. 521, to show that the arrangement was a contract of hiring and service, and not a partnership.

By the COURT.—The prisoner was not a partner with the prosecutors, and was properly convicted.

Conviction affirmed.

[Note.—To share profits constitutes a partnership, but only as regards the claims of creditors, not in the relationship of the parties inter se. To pay a servant by a percentage on the profits does not change the character of the service; if in other respects he is in fact a servant. It is the nature of the engagement, and of the duties performed, that determines the relationship, and not the mode of payment.—ED.]

SMITH (app.) v. HUGGETT (resp.)

SMITH (app.) v. JAMES (resp.)

Election law—Notice of objection—Service on overseer through post—6 Vict. c. 18, ss. 7, 17, 100, and 101—County vote—Borough vote.

In serving notices of objection through the post on overseers, it is not necessary that the formalities required by sect. 100 of stat. 6 Vict. c. 18, should be observed; it is enough to post them properly addressed, so that they reach the overseers in due time; therefore,

Where the objector inclosed a number of notices of objection in one and the same envelope addressed to the overseer, and there was evidence that they reached him in due time, and were published by him,

The Court held, that service through the post was the same as service by an agent, and was therefore good.

This was an appeal from the decision of the revising barrister for Westminster.

CASE.

At a court held before me, the barrister duly appointed to revise the list of voters for the city of Westminster, Henry Smith objected to the name of John Michael Allen being retained on the list of voters for the parish of St. Anne's, Westminster. The name of John Michael Allen appeared on the list of persons claiming to vote in the snbjoined form:

Allen, John Michael	37, Wardour-street	House	37, Wardour-street
---------------------	--------------------	-------	--------------------

The facts of the case were as follows:—On my calling on the objector, in conformity with the 40th section of stat. 6 Vict. c. 18, to prove the service of his notice of objection on the overseers of the parish of St. Anne, it appeared that this notice was inclosed in the same cover with several others intended to be served by the objector in the same parish, the cover addressed "To the Overseers of the parish of Saint Anne in the city of Westminster," and a parcel of notices thus made up was dispatched by post, but the regulations prescribed by the 100th section of the above-mentioned statute for the posting notices of objection were not followed, and no duplicate stamped by any postmaster, according to the provisions of that section, was produced before me. The notice of objection reached the overseers of the parish of St. Anne on or before the 25th Aug., and was by them included in their published list of objections.

It was contended that service of a notice of objection on overseers by post in the manner described was sufficient to satisfy the provisions of the statute, and that if it were not sufficient, the effects of the irregularity were removed by the publication of the objection in the overseers' list.

On the first point I was of opinion that if notices of objections were served on overseers by post at all, the mode of posting prescribed by the 100th section of the statute 6 Vict. c. 18, must be adopted. This mode of posting being, by the 107th section, made applicable to the service of notice on overseers, could only be proved before the revising barrister by production of a duplicate stamped by a postmaster in conformity with the regulations provided by the 100th section of the statute.

SMITH v. JAMES.

On the second point I was of opinion that it was not in the power of the overseers by the publication of the objection to remove the effects of any irregularity committed by the objector in the performance of any of the acts required from him by the statute.

My conclusion on the case before me was, that there had not been such a service of the notice of objection on the overseers as the Act of Parliament demanded. Consequently I retained the name of John Michael Allen on the list of voters for the city of Westminster; but, in view of the appeal to be brought before the Superior Court, I called upon the said John Michael Allen to prove his qualification, which he failed through non-appearance to do.

Other appeals in the cases of persons named in the list subjoined depend on the same decision and ought to be consolidated with it.

If my decision in the case was wrong, the name of the said John Michael Allen, and also of the other persons named in the list subjoined, according to their respective descriptions therein, ought to be expunged from the register of voters for the city of Westminster. If my decision was right such names should be retained upon the register.

(Signed) T. H. T.

Macnamara (Bourke with him) for the app.—It is submitted that the services of the notices of objection was sufficient, especially so as they reached the overseer in due time, and were published by them. It is immaterial how the notice reaches the overseer; if it be shown that it actually reached him in time, the mode of service is of no consequence. Sect. 7 is of the same effect as sect. 17, with this difference only, that the former applies to the case of county votes, the latter to borough votes. Both enact that any person may object to the name of another person appearing on the list of voters, and every person so objecting shall, on or before, &c., give or cause to be given to the overseers of, &c., a notice of objection, &c., and every such notice of objection shall be signed by the party objecting. Then sect. 100 prescribes the mode of sending objections by post, and of proving before the revising barrister, by means of the production of a duplicate notice stamped by the postmaster, that the notice of objection has been duly served on the person objected to. Sect. 101 enacts, that whenever any notice is required to be sent to the overseers, it shall be sufficient if such notice be delivered to any one of such overseers, or shall be left at his place of abode, or at his office or other place of transacting parochial business, or shall be sent by the post free of postage, addressed to the overseers of the township or parish, naming it, and the county, city, or borough, &c., to which the notice so sent may relate," &c. From this it would appear that the mode of service is immaterial, so that service actually is effected within the prescribed time: (Bishop v. Helps, 2 C. B. 45; Jones v. Innous, 17 C. B. 290, 295; Phillips v. Ensoll, 1 C. M. & R. 374.)

D. Keane contra.—The statute by sect. 100 describes the process and mode of service, and it must be observed. Here a number of notices were inclosed in one envelope and sent to the overseers, which is clearly not enough: (Dunlop v. Higgins, 1 Cl. & Fin. 381.)

[The Court now took the next case, to which the judgment will apply.]

SMITH (app.) v. JAMES (resp.)

This was an appeal from the decision of the revising barristers for the county of Middlesex.

At a court held before the barristers duly appointed to revise the list of voters for the county of Middlesex, on Oct. 28, 1861, at Brentford,

John Antony Coates objected to the name of George Henry Hayward being retained on the list of voters for Brentford. The name of George Henry Hayward appeared on the list of persons claiming to vote in the subjoined form:

Hayward, George Henry	Acton	Copyhold Lands and Buildings	Church Field, Acton.
--------------------------	-------	---------------------------------	-------------------------

The facts of the case were as follows:—

On our calling upon the objector, in conformity with the 40th section of statute 6 Vict. c. 18, to prove the service of his notice of objection on the overseers of the parish of Acton, in the county of Middlesex, it appeared that this notice was inclosed in the same cover with several others intended to be served by the objector in the same parish. The cover had been addressed "To the Overseers of the parish of Acton, in the county of Middlesex," and the parcel of notices thus made up was dispatched by post; but the regulations prescribed by the 100th section of the above-mentioned statute for the posting of notices of objection were not followed, and no duplicate stamped by any postmaster according to the provisions of that section was produced before us. The notice of objection reached the overseers of the parish of Acton on or before the 25th Aug., and was by them included in their published list of objections.

It was contended that service of a notice of objection on overseers by post in the manner described was sufficient to satisfy the 101st section of the statute, and that if it were not sufficient the effects of the irregularity were removed by the publication of the objection in the overseers' list.

On the first point we were of opinion that, if notices of objection were served on overseers by post at all, the mode of posting prescribed by the 100th section of the statute 6 Vict. c. 18, must be adopted, this mode of posting being, by the 101st section, made applicable to the service of notices on overseers; and that, consequently, service by post of a notice of objection on overseers could only be proved before the revising barrister by production of a duplicate stamped by a postmaster, in conformity with the regulations provided by the 100th section of the statute.

On the second point, we were of opinion that it was not in the power of the overseers, by the publication of the objection, to remove the effects of irregularity committed by the objector in the performance of any of the acts required from him by the statute.

Our conclusion on the case before us was, that there had not been such a service of the notice of objection on the overseers as the Act of Parliament demanded. Consequently we retained the name of George Henry Hayward on the list of voters for the county of Middlesex; but, in view of the appeal to be brought before the Superior Court, we called upon the said George Henry Hayward to prove his qualification, which he failed, through non-appearance, to do.

Other appeals in the cases of the persons named in the list subjoined depend on the same decision, and ought to be consolidated with it.

If our decision in the case was wrong, the name of the said George Henry Hayward, and also of the other persons named in the list subjoined, according to their respective descriptions therein, ought to be expunged from the register of voters for the county of Middlesex. If our decision was right, then such names should be retained upon the register. (Signed)

COURTIS v. BLIGHT AND OTHERS.

[C. B.]

Bridge, for the app., offered no argument.

Welsby for resp.—The service of the notice of objection must be in the mode prescribed by sect. 100 of the statute—that is to say, by the production of a duplicate, signed by the objector, and stamped by the postmaster, and nothing less will suffice. Here then the proof failed. The 17th section says that the objector shall “give or cause to be given” a notice to the overseers. Now this may be effected in various ways. You may serve the notice personally; you may serve it by an agent, or you may send it by the post; but if you adopt the latter course, it must be sent in observance of the formalities prescribed by sect. 100.

Counsel were not heard in reply.

ERLE, C. J.—I am of opinion that the revising barrister was wrong in this case, and that the evidence was sufficient to show that the statute had been complied with in respect of sending notice of objection to the overseers. The statute requires that the objector should deliver, or cause to be delivered, notice of objection to the overseers, and the evidence here is that he put the notice into the post, and the further evidence is that the notice of objection reached the overseers in due time. If he had delivered the notices with his own hand there would have been no question, and so if he had sent them by a private messenger there would have been no question. He did send them by post, and the post is now for many purposes of law an agent between the parties who are to send and receive letters. In this case the post would be agent for the sender of the notice, and he therefore sent the notice by his agent. He was bound to go on and prove that his agent delivered the notice, and that he delivered it in time. The objection is, that by sect. 100 a special mode is provided for proving the service of notices. A statutable mode is given for proving that the notices to which that section applies had been sent, and it is an enabling statute to facilitate the proof, and it relieves the party on whom the obligation is cast of sending notice—it relieves him from being bound to produce evidence to show that his notice reached its destination, provided he dispatched it according to the formalities mentioned in sect. 100, such as sending it to the post-office, having a duplicate, and keeping one duplicate and getting it stamped. Then the party who delivers these two duplicates to the postmaster, who sends one of them, is enabled by the statute to prove that all that the statute requires was done in respect to that notice. It is an entirely enabling and facilitating provision, and it takes away none of the modes of proving that the notice reached its destination that are consistent with the law as it stood before; and that being so, the argument entirely fails in calling upon us to construe the statute as if it said, “You must send by post, and nothing is sufficient to show that the notice reached its destination except the statutable mode of proving it.” The section has no such words, and it is very clear to my mind that there was no such intention. It gives facility if the party chooses to adopt it. Where the section does apply is this—that it gives a facility, but all other facilities are still allowed by law. I am of opinion that all that the statute required has been done by showing that the notice was delivered to the post in time, and by proving that the notice reached its destination in time.

WILLIAMS, J.—I am entirely of the same opinion. It is quite unnecessary for the court to say what would have been their decision if in this case the notices had not reached the overseers. If the post-office had made default, the question might have arisen whether there had been a sufficient compliance with the Act to enable the objector to stand on his objection; but the notice has reached the overseers here, and therefore it is sufficiently demonstrated that the objector has complied with the Act. The question is whether the objector delivered, or caused to be delivered, his notice in proper time; and I am of opinion that he did.

BYLES, J.—I also agree with what has fallen from my Lord and my brother Williams. The only question arises on the 7th and 17th sections of the statute—one section applying to the case of county, and the other to that of borough voters, which provide that a party objecting shall give, or cause to be given—that means give by yourself or your agents—notice within proper time. In this case he did not give the notice by himself, but by his agent, and why that party is the less his agent because he is a public officer I do not see.

KEATING, J.—I also agree.

REGISTRATION APPEAL.

Nov. 19 and 22.

COURTIS (app.) v. BLIGHT AND OTHERS (resps.)

Election law—Notice of objection—Objector's place of abode—6 Vict. c. 18, s. 7.

The true place of his abode at the time of signing the notice of objection must be stated by the objector pursuant to 6 Vict. c. 18, s. 7, on the notice sent to the person objected to; and if he has bonâ fide two places of abode, it is enough if he state either.

The question as to what is the true place of abode of the objector is rather one of fact than of law.

At a court held before the revising barrister duly appointed to revise the lists of voters for the borough of Devonport, for the revision of the list of voters for the parish of Stoke Damerel, James Webb Courtis objected to the name of Walter Seymour Blight and the other persons whose names are set forth in the schedule hereto, and to divers other persons (whose names it is not material to mention), being retained on the list of persons entitled to vote in the election of members of Parliament for the borough of Devonport.

The notices of objection both to the overseers and to the party purported to be signed thus, “James Webb Courtis, of 25, Clowance-street, on the list of voters for the parish of Stoke Damerel.” The total number of cases affected by these notices was 202.

The notices, which were in all other respects good, were impeached on two grounds:

1. That the place of abode of the objector had been inserted after the objector had signed the notices.
2. That the objector's place of abode was not properly stated in the notices.

The facts were as follows:—

It is the practice of the overseers of the parish of Stoke Damerel, in making out the list of voters, to divide it into six wards, being the wards into which the parish is divided for municipal purposes.

The name of the objector (the app.) appeared twice on the list.

First, in St. Aubyn ward (which is the second ward in order) his name stood thus:

Courtis, James Webb,	94, Fore-street	{ house	25, Clowance-street.
		{ house	94, Fore street.

Secondly, in Clowance Ward (which is the fourth ward in order) his name stood thus:

Curtis, James Webb,	25, Clowance-street,	house	25, Clowance-street.
---------------------	----------------------	-------	----------------------

Throughout this list, whenever the voter's qualification is supposed to consist of two houses occupied in succession, the words "in succession" are not inserted, but the word "house" is inserted in the third column, and the description of the two houses is inserted in the fourth column in the order of their occupation.

The notices, which were in the ordinary printed form, were prepared in the office of a solicitor, and were properly filled in with the name of the person objected to, the date, and the like before the objector signed them, but a blank was left for the objector's signature and place of abode. The app. signed all the notices with his own hand on the 23rd Aug. 1861, but he did not add any place of abode; but immediately after he had signed them the words "25, Clowance-street," were written after his signature by the clerks who had previously filled in the other written parts. In some cases this was done in his presence, in all cases on the same day.

The app. gave no directions for the insertion of any particular place of abode; but he knew that, as fast as he signed, the clerks added the description, "25, Clowance-street," as his place of abode.

It was contended that the notices were bad, because the place of abode was added after the app. had signed, and without any express direction from him.

I was of opinion that this did not invalidate the notices, and I decided that (inasmuch as the addition was known to and sanctioned by him) the notices were in this respect good.

It was then contended that the notices were bad, because 25, Clowance-street, was not the app.'s place of abode. Upon this point the facts were as follows:—For about two years before Feb. 1861 the app. occupied and lived in 25, Clowance-street. The house belonged to his mother, but much of the furniture belonged to him, and it had been verbally agreed between the app. and his mother that he should occupy the house as her tenant at will, paying no rent; and that she should live with him. In Feb. 1861 the app. (who until Christmas 1860 had been in a solicitor's office) removed with his wife to 94, Fore-street, and there the app. carried on the business of a licensed victualler until the time of holding this court, the 12th Oct. 1861. During all this time the app. had no other occupation, and it was necessary for the conduct of the business that he and his wife should live and sleep at 94, Fore-street.

They did live and sleep there from Feb. 1861 until the 12th Oct. 1861 without any interruption save this, that the app. and his wife slept at 25, Clowance-street one night, and that the app. himself slept there ten nights. The app. and his wife were living and slept at 94, Fore-street, on the 23rd Aug. 1861. The app., however, continued the occupation of 25, Clowance-street, and he did nothing to prevent him from returning to live there, and he intended to return to live there whenever it should suit his convenience; and about the 1st Oct. 1861 he entered into an arrangement (which has not been yet carried into effect) to discontinue the business carried on at 94, Fore-street, and give up the occupation of the premises.

After the app. removed to 94, Fore-street, his mother had no other permanent home than 25, Clowance-street, and she occasionally resided there, and whilst she so resided the app. kept a woman servant to attend on her; but between February and October the mother frequently lived elsewhere, sometimes with the app. at 94, Fore-street, sometimes with a daughter at Kingsbridge, which is fifteen miles from Devonport, and during the mother's absence from 25, Clowance-street, no servant was kept, so that it frequently happened that the house 25, Clowance-street, was left for two or three weeks at a time without any one living in it, and no servant was kept there during the months of July, August and September.

Upon these facts it was contended by the resps. that 94, Fore-street, and not 25, Clowance-street, was, on the 23rd Aug. 1861, the app.'s true place of abode; that he could not, for this purpose, have two places of abode, and that the notices were therefore bad.

It was contended by the app.—1. That the place of abode was rightly stated, inasmuch as 25, Clowance-street, was the place of abode, stated on the list of voters for Clowance ward. 2. That the app. had two places of abode; that is to say, 25, Clowance-street, his permanent home, and 94, Fore-street, his temporary residence.

I was of opinion that the app. was required to state his true place of abode at the time when he signed the notices; that, if he really had two bona fide places of abode, he might state either; but I thought that it was not sufficient to prove a mere legal residence at 25, Clowance-street, and I was of opinion that, under the circumstances above stated, 25, Clowance-street had for the time ceased to be the app.'s place of abode, and that 94, Fore-street was for the time his only true place of abode. I therefore decided that the notices were bad, and retained on the list the names of the persons objected to; but I offered to allow them to prove their respective qualifications, which some of them did, but the resps. whose names are set forth in the schedule hereto failed or declined to do so.

The appeals in all these cases depend upon the same decision, and ought to be consolidated.

If the Court of C. B. shall be of opinion that the notices of objection were invalid for either of the reasons insisted on by the resps., the register will remain without amendment; but if the court shall be of opinion that app. was properly described as of 25, Clowance-street, and that the notices were not invalid by reason of the addition of the place of abode after the app. had signed, then the names of the persons set forth in the schedule hereto are to be expunged from the register. Cur. adv. vult.

Nov. 22.—ERLE, C. J. now delivered the judgment of the court. In this case we think that the revising barrister was right in requiring that the objector should state his true place of abode, and that if he had bona fide two places of abode, he might state either. We also agree with him in thinking that the objector actually resided with his family, and carried on a business in 24, Fore-street at the time of the objection; and that if Fore-street, had been stated, it could not have been objected to with success. But the question before us is, whether Clowance-street is not shown to be also his true place of abode by reason of the fact that he continued tenant at will to his mother of the house there, and had the intention of returning, and had left some furniture, and had slept there at a stated time. We consider that to be rather a question of fact than law. The state of his tenancy at will to the mother with the intention to return, is in close analogy with the liberty to stay at his mother's house when he should choose. He was personally absent from Fore-street at the time when the party objected to might require information, and during a great part of the time between the objection and revising the house appears to have been empty. We think the revising barrister was not bound in law to hold Clowance-street the true place of abode by reason of the tenancy at will under the circumstances stated, and we therefore affirm his decision.

COURT OF QUEEN'S BENCH.

Reported by JOHN THOMPSON, T. W. SAUNDERS, and C. J. B. HERTALET, Esqrs., Barristers-at-Law.

Wednesday, Jan. 15.

NICHOLL AND OTHERS v. ALLEN.

Bridge—Liability to repair—Receipt of toll—Private Acts.

A private Act, 20 Geo. 2, recited that it was convenient that a bridge should be built across the Thames from W. to S., and that D. had proposed to build it, and then enacted that D., his heirs and assigns, were thereby authorised and empowered to build the same, and gave all necessary powers for that purpose; and sect. 10 recited that for and in consideration of the great charges and expenses which D., his heirs and assigns would be at, not only in building, but also in repairing, maintaining and keeping up the same, it should be lawful for them to take and receive certain specified tolls; and by sect. 13, that when, from accidents, tempests, or otherwise, the passage of the bridge should become dangerous or impracticable, they might set up a convenient ferry as near as might be to the said bridge, and receive the said tolls for crossing the river by means of such ferry, provided that such ferry should not continue for a longer time than necessary for repairing or rebuilding the said bridge, or than the passage over the same might be dangerous or impracticable. The bridge was to be deemed extra-parochial, and the adjoining parishes were exempted from liability to repair. The 20 Geo. 3, c. xxxii, recited that the bridge was in a ruinous condition, and that S. had proposed to repair it conformable to the previous Act, but the tolls were inadequate to the expense thereof, and gave to S., his heirs and assigns, power to take increased tolls.

The bridge was built and repaired, and the tolls taken by the successive proprietors thereof down to 1829, when the deft. became proprietor, since which time he has received the tolls and exercised the powers of the Acts. In 1859 the principal arch of the bridge fell in, and the damage has not in any way been repaired, but the deft. has set up a ferry and received tolls thereat under the Act:

Held, that the deft. was bound to reinstate the bridge, and maintain the same in a state practicable for passage.

This was an action brought by the plts. against the deft. for the recovery of damages sustained by them by reason of the passage of the bridge hereafter mentioned being impracticable, and for a mandamus commanding the deft. to repair and reinstate the said bridge, and maintain the same in a fit state for passage, and by consent the following case was stated for the opinion of the court:—

CASE.

In the 20th year of the reign of King George II., an Act of Parliament was passed intituled "An Act for building a bridge across the river Thames, from the parish of Walton-on-Thames to Shepperton, in the county of Middlesex."

Shortly after the passing of this Act the bridge thereby authorised to be built was, under and by virtue of the powers therein contained, built by Samuel Dicker, Esq., in the said Act mentioned.

In the 20th year of the reign of King George III. another Act was passed for enlarging the powers of the said first-mentioned Act. Both Acts are to be referred to as part of this case.

From the time of the said bridge being built until it became impassable as hereinafter mentioned, no repairs were required, nor were any done to the structure of the said bridge, save those contemplated by the said Act of the 20th George III., but all other repairs required for the maintenance of the said bridge and the roadway thereof were from time to time done by the successive proprietors thereof, and during all the time aforesaid the said bridge was used by the public for the purpose of passage on the payment of the tolls by the said Act authorised to be demanded and taken. These tolls, and other the powers, privileges, and immunities by the said Act given and granted, have been received, exercised and enjoyed by the successive proprietors of the said bridge from the time of the same having been built as aforesaid.

In or about the year 1829 the deft. was, and from thence hitherto has been and still is, the proprietor of the said bridge, and as such proprietor has received, exercised and enjoyed the said tolls, powers, privileges and immunities.

On the 11th Aug. 1859 the principal arch of the said bridge fell in, but whether in consequence of some original defect in the structure or foundations of the bridge, or for want of needful and necessary maintenance and repairs, has not been ascertained, and by reason thereof and of the said damage or injury not having been in any way repaired or made good, the passage of the said bridge became and was, and from thence has been, and still is, wholly impracticable.

On the passage of the bridge so becoming impracticable, the deft., under and by virtue of powers in that behalf vested in him as the proprietor of the said bridge by the said Acts, provided and set up, and from thence hitherto has maintained, a ferry across the Thames, near to the said bridge, and for passage over the river by the ferry he has demanded and taken, and still continues to demand and take, the tolls in that behalf authorised by the said Acts. A reasonable time for repairing and reinstating the said bridge and rendering the passage thereof practicable elapsed before the commencement of this suit, and before the incurring of the damages by the plts. for which the action is brought.

The plts. are the owners of a considerable estate near to and on the Middlesex side of the bridge, and also of another considerable estate near to and on the Surrey side of the bridge, and have sustained damage by reason of the passage of the bridge being impracticable, and are personally interested in the said bridge being repaired and reinstated and maintained in a state practicable for passage.

The question for the opinion of the court is, whether the deft., as the proprietor of the said bridge, is, under or by virtue of the said Acts, bound to reinstate the bridge and maintain the same in a state practicable for passage.

The following are the material parts of the Acts referred to:—The 20 Geo. 2, recites, that "Whereas it is convenient that a bridge should be built across the river of Thames from the parish of Walton-upon-Thames, in the county of Surrey, to the opposite shore in the parish of Shepperton, in the county of Middlesex, for the better ease and commerce of the inhabitants of the said counties respectively, and the parts adjacent; and whereas Samuel Dicker, of Walton-upon-Thames, in the said county of Surrey, Esquire, hath proposed to build the said bridge across the said river for the purpose aforesaid, whereby many mischiefs and inconveniences will be remedied, and great advantages accrue to the public. Be it therefore enacted, that it shall and may be lawful to and for the said S. Dicker, his heirs and assigns, and he and they are hereby authorised and empowered, and shall have full power and authority by virtue of this present Act, at his and their own proper costs and charges, by himself and themselves, his and their deputies, agents, officers, workmen, servants and others, to build the said bridge from Walton-upon-Thames to Shepperton aforesaid, and that for the purposes aforesaid he and they shall have full power and authority by himself and themselves, his and their servants, agents, workmen, and others, to remove any shelf or shelves, or to deepen or widen the said river of Thames, or any ayts or stops in the same between the parishes of Walton-upon-Thames and Shepperton aforesaid, and to dig or cut the banks of the said river Thames in such manner as shall be necessary and proper for building the said bridge and the navigation and passage of boats, barges, lighters and other vessels, and for the more convenient and the better carrying on and effecting the said undertaking, and making the navigation of the said Thames more easy for the boats, barges, lighters and other vessels as aforesaid, under, or to and from such bridge when built (be it the soil or ground of the King's most excellent Majesty, his heirs or successors, or of any other person or persons, bodies politic or corporate whatsoever), and also to cut, remove, and take away all trees, roots of trees, beds of gravel, sand, or mud, or any other impediment whatsoever, which may anyways hinder the said navigation, either by obstructing the sailing, haling, towing, or drawing boats and vessels, with men or horses, or otherwise, upon the said river Thames, between the said parishes of Walton and Shepperton, and to build, erect and set up, and to make in, over, or on the said river and lands adjoining or near to the same, any camp-shot trenches and landing-places, and to amend, alter, remove, or heighten any foot-bridge foot-paths, or horse-paths, or to turn or alter any highways in, upon, or near unto the said river, leading to the said new intended bridge, within the parishes of Walton and Shepperton, so as not to stop any common highway leading to, from, or through either of the towns of Shepperton or Walton, and to appoint, set out, and make any towing paths, banks and ways for towing, haling and drawing of boats, barges, lighters, and other vessels passing in, through and upon the said river, under the intended bridge between the parishes of Walton and Shepperton, or any part thereof, and from time to time and at all times hereafter, to do all other matters and things necessary or convenient for making, maintaining, continuing and perfecting the said bridge, and the navigable passages under or near the same, or for the improvement or prosecution thereof, the said S. Dicker, his heirs and assigns, doing as little damage as may be, and first giving satisfaction to the respective owners and proprietors of such trees, ground, land, tenements, or hereditaments as shall be pulled down, demolished, altered, dug up, cut, removed, or otherwise made use of for every or any of the purposes aforesaid, or that in anywise shall be prejudiced or damaged by or for the carrying on the building, effecting, preserving and continuing or maintaining the said bridge, or the navigation near thereunto; and also giving satisfaction for all damages that shall be done, such damages to be ascertained in the manner hereinafter directed, according to the true intent and meaning of this Act."

Sect. 10. That for and in consideration of the great charges and expenses that the said S. Dicker, his heirs or assigns, shall be at, not only in building the said bridge, but also in making, erecting, repairing, cleaning, maintaining, keeping up, and continuing other matters necessary to be made and erected as aforesaid, it shall and may be lawful to and for the said S. Dicker, his heirs or assigns, and no other person whatever, from time to time, and at all times hereafter, to ask, demand, receive, recover, and take to and for his and their own proper use and behoof in respect of his charges and expenses aforesaid for pontage, or in the name of a toll or duty for any passage over the said bridge, or any part thereof, the sums hereafter mentioned, before any person or any coach, berlin, landau, chariot, calash, chaise, chair, hearse, waggon, wain, cart, dray, carriage, horse, mare, gelding, mule, or ass, oxen, sheep, lambs, hogs, or other cattle or carriage whatsoever shall be permitted to pass over the said bridge to be erected by virtue of this Act, the several sums following, that is to say: (the section then specified the several tolls that were to be taken.)

Sect. 13. And whereas it may so happen that the said bridge may in times to come receive such damage by unforeseen accidents, or by tempests or otherwise, that the passage thereof may for some time become dangerous or impracticable; be it further enacted that in all such cases it shall and may be lawful to and for the said S. Dicker, his heirs and assigns, from time to time, as often as occasion shall require, to provide, maintain and set up a proper and convenient ferry or ferries across the said river of Thames, at such place or places as he or they shall judge to be most proper and convenient, and as near to the said bridge as conveniently may be, and there to take for passage over the said river, by such ferry or ferries, such rates and duties as are granted by this Act for the toll or pontage aforesaid.

Sect. 14. Provided always, that such ferry or ferries shall not continue for any longer times than shall be necessary for repairing or rebuilding the said bridge, or longer than the passage over the same shall or may be dangerous or impracticable as aforesaid.

Sect. 19. That the said bridge shall not be rated or assessed for or towards the land-tax, the repairs of highways, poors-rate, churchwardens, or any other parish rate whatsoever, nor shall the said bridge or any part thereof be deemed or looked upon to belong to or to be within any parish, but be extra-parochial to all intents and purposes whatsoever.

Sect. 20. Provided always, and it is hereby further enacted and declared, that the said bridge, when built, shall not be deemed or taken to be a county bridge, so as to subject the counties of Middlesex and Surrey, or either of them, to the repairing or supporting the same.

The 20 Geo. 3, c. xxxii. (an Act for enlarging the powers of an Act made in the 20th year of Geo. II., for building a bridge cross the river Thames, from the parish of Walton-upon-Thames, in the county of Surrey, to Shepperton, in the county of Middlesex), recites that "Whereas by an Act made in the 20th year of the reign of his late Majesty king George the Second, intituled, 'An Act for building a bridge cross the river Thames, from Walton-upon-Thames, in the county of Surrey, to Shepperton, in the county of Middlesex,' several tolls, duties and powers were given and granted to S. Dicker, Esq., of the parish of Walton, in the county of Surrey, to build a bridge cross the river Thames from the said parish of Walton to Shepperton, in the county of Middlesex, and a bridge was accordingly built, and passable for many years. And whereas the said bridge is now in a ruinous condition, and if not effectually repaired or rebuilt will be manifestly to the inconvenience of the public. Whereas Michael Dicker Sanders, of the city of Exeter, is now sole proprietor of the said bridge cross the said river, and hath proposed effectually to repair or rebuild the said bridge cross the said river, conformable to the powers and subject to the provisos in the above recited Act, but it having been found from experience that the pontage toll or duty for passage over the said bridge, or any part thereof, is greatly inadequate to the expense of building and keeping in repair the same; be it therefore enacted, that from and after the passing this Act it shall and may be lawful to and for the said M. D. Sanders, his heirs and assigns, or such person or person authorised and empowered by the said M. D. Sanders, his heirs and assigns, and no other person whatsoever, and he and they is and are hereby authorised and empowered, and shall have full power and authority, by virtue of the present Act, from time to time and at all times thereafter, to ask, demand, receive, recover and take to and for his and their own proper use the tolls following:" (the Act then specifies the increased tolls to be taken.)

[Q. B.]

Sect. 8 enacts that the powers of the former Act shall be extended to this Act.

Kemplay, for the plts., contended that there was an obligation on the deft. to restore the bridge, he having received the tolls and having erected a ferry near to the bridge since its partial destruction, and taken tolls in respect thereof which he would have no right to have done but for the purpose of repairing the bridge.

Lush (T. J. Clark with him), for the deft., argued that the Acts did not impose any obligation to rebuild the bridge on the deft.; that the language of the Acts was permissive and empowering only; that although it was a public bridge, it did not follow that some one was bound to repair it. In the Acts it was put as a matter of convenience, not of obligation.

Cases cited:—R. v. York and North Midland Railway Company, 1 El. & Bl. 178, 860; R. v. Kent, 13 East, 220; R. v. Lindsey, 14 East, 317; R. v. Kerrison, 3 M. & S. 526; R. v. Severn and Wye Railway Company, 2 B. & Ald. 646; R. v. Isle of Ely, 15 Q. B. 827; R. v. Yorkshire, 2 W. Bl. 685-708; R. v. Llandilo, 2 T. R. 232.

WIGHTMAN, J.—I am of opinion that the plts. are entitled to judgment, and that the duty was cast on the deft. to keep up the bridge as long as he received the tolls given under the Acts. There is no question that after the building of the bridge it became a public bridge, and by the Acts for the building and keeping the bridge in repair the builder is entitled to receive certain tolls by the name of pontage. And the Act says, that whenever it happens that the bridge may receive such damage by unforeseen accidents or tempest, or otherwise, that the passage thereof may for some time become dangerous or impracticable, it shall be lawful for the said S. Dicker, his heirs and assigns, from time to time to provide, maintain and set up a proper and convenient ferry, and to take for passage over the said river by such ferry such rates and duties as are granted by this Act for the toll or pontage aforesaid, provided that such ferry shall not continue for any longer times than shall be necessary for repairing or rebuilding the said bridge, or longer than the passage over the same shall or may be dangerous or impracticable, as aforesaid. Now it seems to me, that the Act contemplated that the payment of the toll during the time the bridge may be under repair, and the passage over the river is by ferry, was to be in lieu of the pontage which the owner was entitled to receive if the bridge had still been passable. The toll to be received by authority of the Act is for the purpose not only of building, but of maintaining, keeping up, and continuing the bridge. It is said that, though the public are to be chargeable with toll, no correlative duty is cast on the proprietor to keep up and maintain the bridge. But the Act says that, in consideration of building and keeping up the bridge, the proprietor shall be entitled to demand the toll. It then gives certain tolls. And, in my opinion, therefore the deft. is liable to keep up and maintain the bridge, he down to the present time having received the tolls which have been payable for the last 130 years; otherwise he might not spend one farthing on the repair of the bridge, and take the pontage as a mere annuity.

CROMPTON, J.—I also think that the deft. is liable to repair the bridge as long as it may be liable to repair and he may be the proprietor of it. It is an unusual mode to attach a liability to repair a bridge to a man and his heirs and assigns; in general such a liability is attached to the land adjoining the spot over which the bridge may happen to pass. In reference to the bridge itself, it may be that the builder may have bought land for the abutments, and the people who take the land by inheritance or assignment may be liable to repair and maintain it; and that if the proprietor were to assign it to a beggar, he would get rid of his obligation. If the bridge were wholly destroyed and the proprietor gave up taking the tolls, there might be some difference as to his obligation. But the intention of the Act was, that Mr. Dicker should take the tolls and build the bridge in the first instance, and afterwards that he should maintain and keep up the bridge as long as he used his rights as the proprietor, and took the tolls, and with them to repair the bridge. If this were not so, it would be the only case where the obligation to repair a public bridge is not thrown on some one.

MELLOR, J.—I am of the same opinion. At the time the bridge was originally built it was contemplated by the Legislature and the undertakers of the project, that the tolls would abundantly compensate him for the expense of erecting and maintaining the bridge; and anything so absurd cannot be imagined as that the bridge should be built and no one be bound to repair it. The Act, in consideration of the great charges and expenses Mr. Dicker, his heirs and assigns, would be at, not only in building the bridge, but also in keeping up, maintaining and continuing it, gives them a right to take tolls. From the recitals in the second Act, it appears that the expectation that the tolls would always be sufficient for those purposes had not turned out to be correct, and that by that Act the proprietor asked for increased tolls, which were expressly given to him under the name of pontage, on the ground that by experience the original toll had been found inadequate for the purpose of keeping and maintaining the bridge in repair, and he receives the tolls on that ground. He would have no right to them for any other purpose under the Act of Parliament.

Judgment for the plts.

Ex parte WATKINS.

Quarter sessions—Order for costs—Taxation after sessions over—Jurisdiction.

Where a party objects to an order of quarter sessions, on the ground that the amount of costs inserted in the order was ascertained by taxation after the sessions had expired, he should protest against the taxation before the taxing officer; otherwise, if he attends and proceeds with the taxation without protesting, he waives the objection.

J. A. Russell moved for a certiorari to bring up an order made at the Buckinghamshire quarter sessions, holden on the 14th Oct. 1861, affirming an order of affiliation with costs: (7 & 8 Vict. c. 101, s. 4.) The ground of the motion was, that the taxation of costs took place after the sessions were over, and that the order, as drawn up by the clerk of the peace, with the amount of taxed costs inserted, was his act, and not the act of the court. The rule is, that not only must the costs be ordered to be paid by the court, but the amount must also be ascertained by the court: (Reg. v. Long, 1 Q. B. 740.)

COCKBURN, C. J.—Did the party now objecting attend the taxation? because, if he did so without protest, he has waived the irregularity.

Russell.—He attended the taxation, and the affidavit does not say that he protested against the taxation.

COCKBURN, C. J.—The case of Reg. v. The Shrewsbury and Hereford Railway Company, 25 L. T. Rep. 65, is precisely in point: "Where the parties attend and proceed with the taxation of costs by the clerk of the peace under an order of sessions, without making objection to his jurisdiction, they are estopped from moving to quash the order drawn up by the clerk of the peace after such taxation for payment of the amount taxed." On the authority of that case the irregularity is waived.

The rest of the Court concurring,

Rule refused.

REG. v. THOMAS BIGGINS.

Summary conviction—Master and servant—Adjournment to enable deft. to obtain legal assistance—Trying several defts. together—Abatement of wages—Jurisdiction.

Although a deft. has a right under the 11 & 12 Vict. c. 43, s. 12, to make his full defence by counsel or attorney, this does not give him a right to have a case adjourned in order to procure such assistance, even though he has had no opportunity of procuring it. Where there are several charges against several defts., but the evidence against them all is the same, and they are all tried at the same time, and each is separately convicted, no objection having been raised at the time by the defts. to this course of proceeding, such convictions cannot afterwards be objected to upon the ground that each deft. should have been tried separately.

Under the 4 Geo. 4, c. 34, s. 3, the justice may by his conviction order wages already due and unpaid to be abated.

A. B. and several others were apprehended under a warrant at nine o'clock in the evening of the 19th June, for an offence under sect. 3 of the 4 Geo. 4, c. 34, and were locked up all night, having no means of communicating with any legal adviser. At half-past seven the next morning they were taken before a justice, when, before the case was gone into, they requested an adjournment to enable them to procure legal assistance; this was refused by the justice, who proceeded to hear the charge, which, as it was the same against all the defts., was heard against all at the same time, no objection having been raised to such a course of proceeding. The justice convicted each deft., and ordered 10s. of the wages due to each to be abated:

Held, that the foregoing facts did not show a want of jurisdiction, and that the conviction was good.

This was a motion for a rule to quash a conviction turned into this court by certiorari.

It appeared that on the 20th June last the deft. was convicted before the Rev. H. C. Lipscombe, a justice of the county of Durham, under the 4 Geo. 4, c. 34, for absenting himself from his service before the term of his contract was complete, without the consent of his master.

The affidavit of Thomas Biggins, upon which the rule was moved, stated that before and up to and inclusive of the 18th June last, he was employed by one Henry Weaver as a stonemason at Cockfield, about four miles from the village of Staindrop, in the county of Durham, in and about the erection of a certain viaduct, for the erection of which the said Henry Weaver was the contractor; that on the morning of the 19th June last, before commencing the day's work, he (in exercise as he then believed of his legal right to do so) put an end to his said employment, and thereupon went to the office of the said Henry Weaver to obtain payment of the wages then due to him, which payment he refused to make; that in the evening of the same day a message, purporting to be from the said Henry Weaver, was delivered to him and to several other persons who had in like manner left the service, that if they would go to a certain public-house they should be paid the wages then due to them respectively; that in consequence of the said message he went to the said public-house, as did also the others; that on his and the other persons arriving at the public-house the said Henry Weaver was waiting there, and shortly after several policemen came from another room and produced warrants for their apprehension upon a charge of having illegally left their said employment, which warrants were signed by the said Rev. H. C. Lipscombe; that immediately after the production of the warrants the policemen handcuffed them and took them into custody, and on foot, to the village of Staindrop (three miles from the said public-house) and that they arrived there about half-past nine that night; that they were put together in cells in the lock-up house, and were kept there all the night, and up to the time of their being taken before the said Rev. H. C. Lipscombe the following morning; that from the time of his being taken into custody until the time of his being taken before the said Rev. H. C. Lipscombe, he was not allowed to communicate, nor did he in fact communicate, with any person except his fellow-prisoners, nor had he any means or opportunity of preparing his defence, or of instructing any attorney to appear on his behalf, although he believed that he had a defence to the said charge on the merits, and although he was anxious to instruct, and should have instructed if there had been time or opportunity afforded to him to do so, an attorney to appear and defend him against the said charge; that before half-past seven o'clock in the morning of the 20th June he and the other persons were taken together from the said lock-up house into the office of the clerk of the magistrates at Staindrop aforesaid, and were then charged before the said Rev. H. C. Lipscombe, by the said Henry Weaver, with unlawfully leaving their employment on the previous day; that immediately upon their being so brought before the said magistrate, and before the hearing of the charge was entered upon, he and the other persons applied to the said magistrate to have the hearing adjourned to enable him, and the said other persons to obtain legal assistance, and it was distinctly stated to the said magistrate at what hour of the previous night they had arrived at the said lock-up house, and that they had no opportunity of communicating with, or of obtaining, and had been unable to obtain, any attorney to act on their behalf; but the said magistrate refused to grant any adjournment, and proceeded, in the absence of any legal assistance on their behalf, to hear and adjudicate upon the said charge; that no separate charge was gone into or made against him, or against any or either of the said other persons, nor was either of them tried separately or singly, but they were all tried together, in the lump; and the said magistrate, after hearing the said Henry Weaver and his son, stated that he (the said magistrate) should fine each of them 10s., and the magistrate, addressing him and the other persons, asked whether they were prepared to pay such fines, to which they replied that they were not, and that they would rather go to gaol than pay, whereupon the said Henry Weaver, stated to the magistrate that he had wages in his hands due to each of them, and the magistrate thereupon stated that the fines might be stopped out of such wages.

The conviction stated "that on the 20th day of June, A. D. 1861, at Staindrop, in the said county of Durham, Thomas Biggins, of Cockfield in the said county of Durham, is convicted before the undersigned, one of her Majesty's justices of the peace in and for the said county of Durham, for that he the said Thomas Biggins on the 27th day of March last, at the parish of Cockfield, in the said county of Durham, being then and there a handicraftsman, did contract with Henry Weaver, of Staindrop, in the same county, contractor, to serve him for an indefinite period, determinable nevertheless by either of the contracting parties at the end of any day by either of them giving to the other of them verbal notice to that effect, at and for the daily wages of five shillings payable at the end of each fortnight, with a weekly allowance for subsistence in the mean time; and that the said Thomas Biggins having entered into such service accordingly, did afterwards, to wit, on the 19th day of June instant, at the said parish of Cockfield, absent himself the said Thomas Biggins from his said service before the term of his said contract was completed, without the consent of the said Henry Weaver, and without just cause or excuse, and hath from thence neglected to fulfil his said contract, contrary to the form of the statute in such case made and provided. I do therefore adjudge the said Thomas Biggins for his said offence to be punished by abating the sum of 10s., being a part of the wages due to the said Thomas Biggins for and in respect of his said service and employment, according to the form of the statute in such case made and provided," &c.

By the 4 Geo. 4, c. 34, s. 3, it is enacted, "That if any servant in husbandry, calico-printer, handicraftsman, &c., shall contract with any person or persons whomsoever, to serve him, her, or them for any time or times whatsoever, or in any other manner, &c., or having entered into such service, shall absent himself, &c., before the term of his or her contract, &c. shall be completed, &c., it shall be lawful for such justice to commit every such person to the house of correction, there to remain and be held to hard labour, for a reasonable time not exceeding three months, and to abate a proportionable part of his or her wages for and during such period as he or she shall be so confined in the house of correction, or in lieu thereof to punish the offender by abating the whole or any part of his or her wages, or to discharge such servant, &c., from his or her contract," &c.

By sect. 12 of the 11 & 12 Vict. c. 43, it is enacted that "the party against whom such complaint is made, or information laid, shall be admitted to make his full defence thereto, and to have the witnesses examined and cross-examined by counsel or attorney on his behalf."

Wheeler, Serjt. (Holl with him) now moved to quash the conviction, and he contended, first, that the conviction is bad, because it does not show that the deft. contracted to serve in any one of the capacities mentioned in the statute. [BLACKBURN, J.—Must it not be taken that he was to serve as a handicraftsman?] He may have been a handicraftsman without serving as such. Rez v. Lewis, 1 Dowl. & Low. 822, and Re Copestick, 1 New Sess. Cas. 181, are decisively in point. Secondly, the magistrate had no jurisdiction to hear the complaint, as the men had no opportunity of having the assistance of an attorney, and as they required an adjournment for the purpose of having legal assistance. Being arrested late in the evening, locked up all night, and taken before the magistrates between seven and eight the next morning, they had no opportunity of having legal assistance, and when therefore, before the case was entered into, they required an adjournment for the purpose of having the assistance of an attorney, the magistrate ought not to have proceeded, but should have granted an adjournment, otherwise the provision of the 12th section of the 11 & 12 Vict. c. 43 is a nullity. [BLACKBURN, J.—I do not see how his proceeding is without jurisdiction.] It is the same as though he had refused to allow him the assistance of an attorney. [BLACKBURN, J.—He may have exercised an improper discretion, but I cannot see the want of jurisdiction. COCKBURN, C.J.—If the justice had heard the case at that early hour to prevent the deft. from having legal assistance, that might be a ground for a criminal information against him.] Under the circumstances it was utterly impossible that the deft. could have legal assistance. [COCKBURN, C.J.—The magistrate must have a discretion as to adjourning. This act does not put the right in such a case higher than that of a prisoner tried for a felony. Suppose a prisoner in the dock says he wants counsel and attorney. It may be very proper to postpone his trial, but you cannot say that if the judge chooses to try him at once he has no jurisdiction.] The Act says, "shall be admitted to make his full answer and defence by counsel or attorney." [COCKBURN, C. J.—Under the old law parties were not entitled to the assistance of counsel or attorney, but the present Act alters that, but only says that he shall be entitled to have such assistance. It does not give him an absolute right to an adjournment for the purpose of obtaining such assistance; he has an absolute right if he can obtain such assistance] To prevent a man from getting an attorney is the same thing as refusing to hear an attorney. Thirdly, the justice had no jurisdiction to try all the parties together in a lump, for he thereby deprived each of the evidence of the others. [CROMPTON, J.—I suppose there were several convictions.] Yes; but all the defts. were taken together. [BLACKBURN, J.—I suppose it was precisely the same case against each one?] Yes; but each had a right to be tried separately. [BLACKBURN, J.—No objection seems to have been raised at the time to such a proceeding.] Fourthly, the adjudication is bad, as it abates wages already due, whereas the justice had a right to order the abatement only of wages to become due.

COCKBURN, C.J.—I think you are entitled to a rule upon the first point. As regards the second point, with reference to the refusal to adjourn, I think there should be no rule upon that. The intention of the statute was, that it should not be in the power of the justices to refuse a party legal assistance upon a summary hearing when he desired it; but when the matter resolves itself into a question of adjournment, I think that, though it would have been proper for the justice to have adjourned under the circumstances, yet the statute does not touch his discretionary power upon the subject. I think, also, that there should be no rule upon the ground of all the parties being tried at once. That proceeding was not intended to deprive each of the testimony of the others, but was thought to be a convenient method of disposing of the whole matter; and it does not appear that it was objected to. Then as to the adjudication of the justice with regard to the abatement of the wages. I think the statute applies equally to wages already due as to wages to become due.

CROMPTON, J.—I am of the same opinion. This court does not interfere with every irregularity of justices. We quash their proceedings when they have acted without jurisdiction, but we do not interfere where they have exercised a discretion. As regards the trying of all these people together, that does not show a want of jurisdiction. It was thought to be more convenient to do so, and there was no application that each should be taken separately. I think also there is nothing in the objection as to the abatement of the wages. The rule will go, therefore, only on the first ground.

BLACKBURN, J.—I am of the same opinion. As regards the second ground, it is impossible to say that in every case in which an adjournment is required on account of the party desiring the assistance of an attorney it should be granted; many cases may arise in which it would be very proper for the justice to refuse it. In the present case, it seems to me that the justice refused an adjournment when he should have granted it, but that does not go to his jurisdiction.

Rule nisi upon the first ground only. Refused as to others.

THE VESTRY OF ST. LUKE, MIDDLESEX (apps.) and THOMAS LEWIS (resp.)

Metropolis Local Management Act 1854—Authority of local board to require a water-closet to be provided in lieu of a privy.

By sect. 81 of the 18 & 19 Vict. c. 120 (Metropolis Local Management Act 1854), it is enacted that if it appears to the vestry or district board that any house is without a sufficient water-closet or privy and ashpit, they may require the owner or occupier to provide a sufficient water-closet or privy and ashpit, or either of them, as the case may require: Held, that the vestry or district board were authorised under the foregoing section to require a water-closet to be provided in lieu of a privy.

Q. B.] THE VESTRY OF ST. LUKE, MIDDLESEX (app.) AND THOMAS LEWIS (resp.) [Q. B.]

This was a case stated under the 20 & 21 Vict. c. 43.

It appeared that the resp. is the owner of four houses in John's-place, Great Arthur-street, which is a court in the parish of St. Luke, and which was erected before the passing of the Metropolis Local Management Act 1854 (18 & 19 Vict. c. 120). These houses have attached to them two privies. Early in the spring of 1860 the vestry, in consequence of some complaints respecting the condition of these privies, served upon Mr. Lewis a notice to do certain works, which he complied with so far as to fix pans to the closets, but not in providing water supply. On the 14th July 1860 a notice was served upon him by the surveyor of the parish that he intended to inspect the drains, water-closet, privies, cesspools and water supply apparatus, and to cause the ground to be opened in such place or manner as might be necessary, &c. Accordingly he attended and opened the drains passing under the footway pavement, and connecting the privies with the sewer, which were found to be choked and blocked up; these drains he cleansed and put in order at the expense of the vestry. The vestry then served a further notice upon the resp. requiring him to provide water supply to the two closets in John's-place, Arthur-street, within twenty-eight days from the date thereof, to the satisfaction of the vestry, and that if he refused or neglected the vestry would, at the expiration of the said period, cause the same to be constructed, &c. No attention having been paid to this notice, a further notice was served upon him, that at the expiration of twenty-four hours the vestry would, by their surveyor, agents and workmen, enter the said premises and proceed to amend and reinstate the drainage of the privies there, to clean, empty and destroy the cesspools, and provide all such pans and traps, water supply, and water supply apparatus, pipes and cisterns, as to the said vestry or their surveyor might appear proper and requisite, &c. In pursuance of this notice the vestry, on the 1st Dec. 1860, entered upon the premises and fixed a cistern upon the roof of the privies, removing the roof and also three courses of brickwork of the upper side or pitch thereof, for the purpose of procuring a level base for the cistern; the roof was not replaced, but the lower part of the cistern formed a new roof. They also fitted the necessary plumbers' work for connecting the cistern with the pipes of the water company, and also the pipes connecting the cistern with the pans of the closets, and they also fixed new seats in the privies at an expense to the vestry of 12*l.* 10*s.* The surveyor to the vestry and the sewers' contractor likewise proved that, at the time of their entering upon the premises to do the works, the pans of both the privies were filled and choked up with filth, and that the seats and floor were covered with filth in consequence of the want of water supply. The works having been completed, the vestry took out a summons against the resp. to appear before one of the metropolitan police magistrates at Clerkenwell, to show cause why an order should not be made under the provisions of the Metropolis Local Management Act 1854, requiring him to pay to the vestry of the said parish of St. Luke, Middlesex, the sum of 12*l.* 10*s.*, being the expense above referred to. At the hearing the magistrate was of opinion that the above-mentioned statute contains no power to the vestry to convert a privy into a water-closet by providing water supply thereto, as had been done in this instance, but that if the privy already established was not sufficient, the vestry should have required the resp. to have made it so, and on his default the vestry were empowered to make it sufficient under the authority of the 81st section by doing such works as the case required, and then to have recovered from the resp. the expenses incurred by them in so doing.

By sect. 81 of the 18 & 19 Vict. c. 120 (Metropolis Local Management Act 1854), after providing for houses to be built after the passing of the Act, it is enacted that "if at any time it appear to the vestry or district board of such parish or district, that any house in any such parish or district, whether built before or after the commencement of this Act is without a sufficient water-closet or privy and ashpit furnished with proper doors and coverings, and with other apparatus and works as aforesaid, the vestry or district board shall, in case the same can be provided without disturbing any building, give notice in writing to the owner or occupier of such house requiring him forthwith, or within such reasonable time as shall be specified in such notice, to provide a sufficient water-closet or privy and ashpit as furnished as aforesaid, or either of them as the case may require, and if such notice be not complied with it shall be lawful for the vestry or district board to cause to be constructed a sufficient water-closet or privy and ashpit, or either of them, or do such other works as the case may require, and to recover the expenses incurred by them in so doing from the owner of such house in manner hereinafter provided. Provided always, that where a water-closet or privy has been and is used in common by the inmates of two or more houses, or if, in the opinion of the vestry or district board, a water-closet or privy may be so used, they need not require the same to be provided for each house."

Bovill, Q.C. appeared for the appa., and contended that the magistrate ought to have made an order, for that the vestry were right in requiring the privy to be converted into a water-closet.

The Court called upon Beasley to support the decision of the magistrate, and he contended that, there having been a privy, the vestry could not require a water-closet to be constructed, their powers under the second branch of the 81st section not extending to converting the one into the other, and that they could only have required in the present case a proper privy to have been constructed: (Tinkler v. The Board of Works of Wandsworth, 27 L. J. 342, Ch. [WIGHTMAN, J.—In that case there was a general order.] There is nothing to show that this privy might not, by a proper cleansing, have been made sufficient. The section also only gives them power to make an alteration "without disturbing any building." Here there was a considerable disturbance. [CROMPTON, J.—There must always to some extent be a disturbance. The works cannot be done without.]

COCKBURN, C.J.—I am of opinion that the decision was erroneous. The question is, whether the 81st section authorises the vestry or district board, when there is an insufficient privy, to order that a water-closet shall be constructed in its stead? It has been argued that, where there is a privy, the local authority can only order that privy to be made effective, and that they have no power to order a water-closet to be substituted; but I do not think that that is the meaning of the section. The power is given in the alternative to order a sufficient water-closet or privy to be provided as the case may require. And this seems to be a very necessary authority, because it may be that a privy could not be so altered as to meet the necessities of the case; it may be impossible to keep it free from an accumulation of filth, and the only remedy might be the having of a flow of water so as to get rid of the nuisance. They certainly ought to have such power, and I am of opinion that the 81st section has given it to them.

WIGHTMAN and CROMPTON, JJ. concurred.

REG. v. ALLEN.

[Q. B.]

REG. v. ALLEN.

Criminal prosecution—Entering a nolle prosequi on the part of the Crown—Jurisdiction.

Where, in an indictment for perjury, the Attorney-General enters a nolle prosequi on the part of the Crown, he does so on his own responsibility, and this court will not interfere.

J. J. Powell moved for a rule calling on the deft. in this case, William Allen, to show cause why the prosecutor, Francis James Gregory, should not be at liberty to proceed to the trial of two indictments for perjury which had been found against the deft. at the Central Criminal Court, and had since removed into this court by certiorari.

It appeared that Gregory, the prosecutor, had formerly been an out-door officer of the Customs, and in the month of Sept. 1860 a charge was brought against him by Allen, the deft., for stealing spirits in conjunction with him (Allen) the informer. The case was fully investigated before Mr. Gray, a commissioner of Customs, and upon that occasion Allen stated that the offence was committed on the 11th Nov. 1859. On Gregory being called on for his defence, he requested that time might be allowed him to produce his witnesses, and the case was thereupon adjourned for that purpose until the 13th Sept. A book was kept at the Custom-house, in which was entered the manner in which the out-door officers were employed, with the statement of the time and the duties in which they were occupied, and Gregory applied for permission to inspect this book, to trace his occupation on the day and at the time alleged, but he was refused, though he now stated in his affidavit that he had been informed that Allen had in the interval between the hearings before the commissioner applied for and been permitted to inspect the book. When the inquiry was resumed before the commissioner on the 13th Sept. Allen repeated his previous statement, and swore that what he had then deposed was correct, except as to the date on which the alleged offence was committed, which he said ought to have been the 18th April 1860, instead of the 11th Nov. 1859.

Witnesses were then examined on both sides, and in the end the deft. and ten others were dismissed from their employment by the Commissioner of Customs.

Gregory and the ten others had who been so dismissed then memorialised the Board of Customs, and prayed that they might be indicted, and so have the charge tried before a jury, but that application was refused.

On the 18th Sept. the parties went before the Lord Mayor at Guildhall, and made a charge of perjury against Allen. The Solicitor of the Customs appeared, and defended Allen, and in consequence of some discrepancy in the evidence of a boy called as one of the witnesses for the prosecution, the Lord Mayor said he thought it very improbable that a jury would convict, and refused to commit the accused. Gregory and the other ten men then proceeded to prefer an indictment against Allen, and eventually true bills were found on two indictments at the Central Criminal Court, and the deft. Allen was taken into custody and brought before the Lord Mayor; he was again represented by the Solicitor for the Customs, and ultimately was discharged on his own recognisances. The indictments were then moved into this court by certiorari; but when a rule was applied for the deft. to come in and plead, it was discovered he had not entered into any recognisances, but that the Attorney-General had entered a nolle prosequi. [COCKBURN, C. J.—Upon what ground do you ask us to interfere with the undoubted right of the Attorney-

General to enter a nolle prosequi?] Upon the ground that the Attorney-General had acted on an ex parte application. The Attorney-General has no power to enter a nolle prosequi without calling before him and hearing all the parties. [COCKBURN, C. J.—If it be shown to the Attorney-General that he has been misled, no doubt he will set the matter right. BLACKBURN, J.—It will be difficult to show that this court has power to interfere with the prerogative power of the Crown as exercised by the Attorney-General.] The course adopted in this case is contrary to the ordinary practice: (Crown Circuit Companion, 22; 2 Gude's Crown Practice, 550.) [CROMPTON, J.—Do you say that the Crown could not pardon without an inquiry? The authorities you refer to mean to say that the prosecutor cannot enter a nolle prosequi without the Attorney-General, for fear of collusion and the compounding of felony. COCKBURN, C. J.—There is nothing to prevent the Attorney-General entering a nolle prosequi toties quoties. The Attorney-General is the great public prosecutor for the State, who ought to be at liberty to act upon his own sense of public duty. Do you find any case in which the court interfered after the Attorney-General had entered a nolle prosequi?] There is no direct authority; but it is contended that this nolle prosequi has been entered irregularly: (R. v. Evelyn, Trin. Vac. 1820.) Then, assuming that the Attorney-General has such a power, still a nolle prosequi is only a temporary proceeding, and this court may order the proceedings to continue without a fresh indictment; although it is a stay, the indictment is not quashed, and a prosecution may be continued on it: (Goddard v. Smith, 6 Mod. Rep. 262; Stretton and Tayler's case, Leonard's Rep. 119; R. v. Ridpath 10 Mod. Rep. 152.)

COCKBURN, C. J.—I am of opinion that in this case there should be no rule. It is the undoubted right and power of the Attorney-General, as the representative of the Crown in matters of criminal law, to enter a nolle prosequi, and thereby at once to stay proceedings in a criminal suit or information; and no instance has been cited, nor can any be found, in which the court, after a nolle prosequi had been entered by the Attorney-General, has taken upon itself to direct such proceedings to be prosecuted. Even if this court should do so, there is nothing to prevent the Attorney-General from entering a nolle prosequi toties quoties. It is not for this court to create a precedent of this sort where none before existed—a precedent contrary to the understanding of the profession, and one that would be fraught with public mischief. Under ordinary circumstances, no doubt, the Attorney-General would act wisely in calling the prosecutors before him before he proceeded to enter a nolle prosequi; but there may be particular circumstances in which, from the knowledge of the facts, or the particular nature of the charge, the Attorney-General might think it necessary to enter a nolle prosequi without adopting that course. It cannot be contended for one moment that there can have been any abuse exercised by one whose functions are of so highly a responsible character; but if there had been—and I only put it hypothetically—the remedy is not by an application to this court to interfere by the exercise of its undoubted power and prerogative, but to hold him responsible before the High Court of Parliament. I am not at all disposed to establish a precedent in such a case, and I think therefore there should be no rule.

CROMPTON, J.—I am of the same opinion. I think we have no power to do what is now asked of us, and I think we ought not to interfere with the undoubted power of the Crown vested in the Attorney-General. There is nothing in the present case to take it out of the general rule. I think the Attorney-General can interfere in any public prosecution whenever he pleases, and all the cases referred to are clearly distinguishable from such an one as this.

BLACKBURN, J.—I am of the same opinion. This particular branch of the prerogative is entrusted to the Attorney-General, who, on his own responsibility, determines whether the prosecution shall go on or not.

MELLOR, J. concurred. Application refused.

Ex parte THE LOCAL BOARD OF LEAMINGTON.
Information before justices by local board of health—
Attendance of clerk to local board at hearing.

H. Lloyd moved for a rule to show cause why the justices of Leamington should not hear certain informations which had been laid by the Leamington Local Board of Health without requiring the attendance of the clerk to the board. It appeared that the justices were of opinion that the clerk of the board of health was the real informant, and they therefore refused to hear any information unless he were present. Many of these informations, it was alleged, involved only matters of administration and police, and the local board had intrusted all such to the inspector of police, who fully understood all about them. In many of such cases the clerk had personally no knowledge, the board was the real informant, and their clerk only represented them for certain purposes: (11 & 12 Vict. c. 63, s. 133.) [COCKBURN, C. J.—He must either go himself or send some one properly qualified. CROMPTON, J.—I don't know that there is anything that actually requires it, but it is very reasonable to require the attendance either of the informant or of his attorney or counsel to assist the justices in the construction of these very difficult Acts of Parliament. COCKBURN, C. J.—I see no objection to the police superintendent attending if the justices think fit to hear him, but you ask us to compel the justices to hear him.] If such an opinion of the court could be conveyed to them it might be sufficient, but they seem to have assumed that they had no option, that there was a general enactment which bound them to require the attendance of the informant; frequently the cases come more particularly under the cognisance of the police, and in the instance in question the clerk was performing other duties in connection with the board elsewhere.

By the COURT: Rule refused.

Ex parte WOOLRICH.
Friendly society—Dispute not provided for by rules—
Expulsion—Jurisdiction—18 & 19 Vict. c. 63.
Where a member of a friendly society was expelled for an offence not within its rules, this court refused to interfere by mandamus, being of opinion that the County Court had jurisdiction to hear and determine the case.

J. E. Davis moved for a rule to show cause why a mandamus should not issue, calling on the trustees of the Loyal Nelson Lodge, a friendly society, held at Woodside, Worcestershire, to show cause why one Woolrich should not be reinstated a member of the society. It appeared that the applicant had been a member of the society for twenty years; that in 1860 he became blind and entitled to full pay for six months, and after that period to half-pay. The half-pay continued till August last, and on his making an application subsequently for a payment of his half-pay then due, he was told that his daughter had received one week's payment too much, and that he had been struck off the books as a member and would receive no more.

The rules of the society were enrolled in 1857, subsequent to the stat. 18 & 19 Vict. c. 63. By rule 16 disputes were to be referred to a committee, and afterwards, in case of the dispute continuing, to a special committee, and he was told that this had been done, and that the committees had decided that his name would be erased from the list; but there was no rule applicable to the present case. An application had been made to the registrar of the County Court to issue a summons, and he had expressed an opinion that the County Court had no jurisdiction, and that the 18 & 19 Vict. c. 63, had failed to vest in the judges of the County Court the jurisdiction formerly vested in justices of the peace. It is said that the County Court has no jurisdiction, because rule 16 provides another tribunal—first, a private committee, and then another and more formal committee; and the society say they have referred the case to these committees, who have heard the case and determined it against the applicant, and expelled him; but he has never had an opportunity of defending himself, and none of the rules refer to a case like the present. [BLACKBURN, J.—In any case you must go to some other tribunal than this. Sect. 40 of 18 & 19 Vict. c. 63, provides for the determination of disputes according to the rules of the society, and sect. 41, for such cases as are to be determined by the County Court.] But if this be such a dispute as is neither within the rules, or within those cases cognisable by the County Court, the court can interfere. Sect. 42 directs how the orders of a County Court are to be enforced, and provides for the removal of orders by certiorari. [CROMPTON, J.—Is not the expelling a man pointed to by that section?] It would be sufficient for the applicant that the County Court should act, and the expression of opinion by this court that it should do so would probably be sufficient? [COCKBURN, C. J.—You must not take such an expression as my opinion. I doubt very much whether the County Court has jurisdiction; if the man is no longer a member it is a great question whether the case is one for them to try.] Under one of the old Acts of Geo. 3, members excluded might apply to the County Court.

COCKBURN, C. J. (a)—It may be a question whether this expulsion is not altogether idle and vain, and whether under rule 16 there has been any expulsion. My learned brothers think an application might be made to the County Court, and that therefore we have no jurisdiction. Rule refused.

REG. v. THE CHURCHWARDENS AND OVERSEERS OF ST. MARY ARCHES, EXETER.

Poor-law—Unemancipated child—Settlement of parents—Status of irremovability.

An unemancipated child has the settlement of its parents, and as that settlement changes so does the settlement of such child.

The father of a pauper lunatic, whose parish of settlement was A., acquired the status of irremovability by a residence in B., and died leaving a widow and a daughter (the said pauper), who, though more than thirty years of age, was unemancipated by reason of continued ill-health. After his death in 1858, the said daughter was received into the workhouse of B., and whilst there her mother lost the status of irremovability from B., which she had acquired through her husband, by removing to C. After such removal of the pauper's mother, the said pauper was sent to the county lunatic asylum as a lunatic pauper, and an order of maintenance was made upon the parish of A., being her father's parish of settlement, her mother having acquired no other settlement than that obtained through her husband:

Held, that the mother of the pauper having lost her status of irremovability from B., the pauper lunatic lost it also, and that the order of maintenance was properly made upon A.

This was a case stated by the Lancashire quarter sessions, upon an appeal by the parish officers of St.

(a) Before Cockburn, C. J., Crompton, Blackburn and Mellor, JJ.

Q. B.]

WHITTLE v. FRANKLAND.

[Q. B.]

Mary Arches, Exeter, against an order made upon them at the instance of the guardians of the poor of the township of Manchester, adjudging the last place of settlement of Ann Cambridge, a lunatic pauper, to be in the said parish of St. Mary Arches, Exeter, and ordering the parish officers of such parish to pay certain sums of money for the lodging, maintenance, &c. of such lunatic pauper. It appeared that the place of settlement of David Cambridge, the father of the pauper lunatic, was in the appellant parish of St. Mary Arches, Exeter, and that on the 3rd Oct. 1827 he was married to one Elizabeth Trapnell; that the pauper lunatic is the legitimate unmarried daughter of the said David Cambridge and his said wife, and was born on the 16th Aug. 1829, and that she has never been emancipated, not having been able at any time, owing to ill-health, to provide for or take care of herself; that for twenty-four years, namely, from July 1832 to July 1856, the pauper lunatic and her parents resided together continually in the respondent township (Manchester); that upon the 23rd July 1856 the said David Cambridge died; that after his death the pauper lunatic and her mother continued to reside together in the respondent township until the month of Oct. 1858, when the pauper lunatic was sent from her said place of abode by the guardians of the poor into the Cheet-ham-hill workhouse, the said workhouse being a workhouse of and for and situate within the said township of Manchester; that she remained there until the 24th Jan. 1860; that in the month of Dec. 1859, and whilst the pauper lunatic was in the said workhouse, her mother (who continued to be the widow of the said David Cambridge) removed from the said township of Manchester to and went to reside in the township of Chorlton-upon-Medlock, in the said county, in which latter township she has ever since continued to reside, not having during her widowhood acquired any settlement in her own right; that from the 24th Jan. 1860 the said Ann Cambridge was a pauper lunatic, and was, pursuant to the statutes in that behalf, sent from the said workhouse where she was then residing, to the county lunatic asylum, situate at Prestwich, in the said county, and being a lunatic asylum for the said county, where she remained until the 25th April 1860, when she was discharged, and sent to reside with her mother in the said township of Chorlton-upon-Medlock. At the hearing of the appeal, it was contended, on the part of the appa., that, under the circumstances, the said order ought not to have been made, inasmuch as the pauper lunatic was, at the time of being conveyed to the said county lunatic asylum at Prestwich, exempt from removal to the parish of her settlement by reason of some provision in the 9 & 10 Vict. c. 66, and the 11 & 12 Vict. c. 111. It was contended, on the part of the respa., that the said order was rightly made, inasmuch as the pauper lunatic, when conveyed to the said county asylum, was not exempt from removal to the parish of her settlement under the said statutes. The question for this court was, whether the pauper lunatic was or was not, at the time of her being conveyed to the said county lunatic asylum, exempt from removal to the parish of her settlement. If the question be answered in the affirmative, the order is to be quashed; if in the negative the order is to be confirmed.

The 11 & 12 Vict. c. 111, s. 1, repeals the proviso of the 9 & 10 Vict. c. 66, and enacts the following one instead:—"Provided always, that whenever any person should have a wife or children having no other settlement than his or her own, such wife and children should be removable from any parish or place from which he or she would be removable notwithstanding any provisions of the said recited Act, and should not be removable from any parish or place from which he or she would not be removable by reason of any provision in the said recited Act."

Wheeler, Serjt. and West appeared in support of the order of sessions, and contended that, as the pauper lunatic was unemancipated, she would follow the settlement of her surviving parent (her mother), who having lost her status of irremovability in Manchester, would have been liable to have been removed to the app. parish, which was her husband's parish of settlement, and so the pauper lunatic was rightly adjudged to be liable to support from that parish: (Reg. v. Cudham, 28 L. J. 105, M. C.; Reg. v. St. Giles, 30 L. J. 12, M. C.; Reg. v. Elvet, 29 L. J. 17, M. C.; s. c. 5 Jur. N. S. 1350; Rez v. Much Cowarne, 2 B. & Ad. 861.)

Kaye and Hopwood, contra, argued that the pauper lunatic was exempt from being removed at the time the order was made; that at the time she was sent to the asylum she had obtained the status of irremovability, and was not affected by the break in the residence of her mother: (Reg. v. Elvet, Reg. v. St. Giles, Reg. v. Hartfield, 17 Q. B. 746; Reg. v. West Ward Union, 7 El. & Bl.; 26 L. J. 29, M. C.; Reg. v. St. Leonard's, Shoreditch, 22 L. J. 51, M. C.; 24 & 25 Vict. c. 25, s. 2.)

COCKBURN, C. J.—I think that the judgment in this case should be for the respa. The case turns upon whether or not, at the time the pauper lunatic was taken from the workhouse to the asylum, she was irremovable. The father, it appeared, had at the time of his death acquired the status of irremovability in Manchester, and at his death his widow, the pauper's mother, retained his settlement. The pauper being a lunatic was placed in the workhouse, and down to the time when this question arose none of the exceptions existed to interfere with her irremovability. The mother, however, removed from Manchester, and so she lost her status of irremovability, and now the question which arises is, whether the pauper, being unemancipated, continues a member of her mother's family so as to partake of her removability. I think she does, and that the residence of a child while unemancipated will not give a status of irremovability. Here the mother, who is the head of the family, is still living; would she, if she were in Manchester, be removable? She clearly would be. Then the pauper, being unemancipated, could she be removed? I think she could, and that the effect of the statutes is this, that as long as the child remains a member of the family he shall not acquire the status of irremovability until the death of the parent, the object being to keep members of the family together. If the child is removable, the object of the statute would be defeated. There is certainly some apparent absurdity in saying that a person thirty years of age, as in this case, is to be treated as a child; but it is well-established law that an unemancipated person is to be considered for all purposes as a part of the parent's family. We must come then to the conclusion that the pauper followed the settlement of her mother, and as she had lost her status of irremovability, the order was properly made upon the parish of settlement.

CROMPTON, J.—I am of the same opinion. We shall best carry out the intention of the Legislature by holding that it makes the removability of an unemancipated child to depend upon the settlement of the parent. It has been said that the settlement was not that of the mother, but that of the father, and so it was in some sense; but as the mother gained it, it became the settlement of the child, and then being unemancipated, it followed that of the mother. The child has in the words of the Act no other settlement than that of the mother. Therefore her removability depends upon her mother's removability.

Master and servant—Contract of service—4 Geo. 4, c. 34, s. 3.

Q. B.]

WHITTLE v. FRANKLAND.

[Q. B.]

A contract to serve is not void because the master does not in terms agree to give any specific amount of wages.

Where, therefore, A. B. contracted to serve C. D. as a collier, and neither party was to put an end to the service before the expiration on twenty-eight days' notice; but C. D. did not bind himself to the payment of any specific amount of wages, but agreed to pay wages fortnightly according to piece-work, and A. B. left his service before giving such twenty-eight days' notice, and was thereupon convicted under the 4 Geo. 4, c. 34, s. 3:

Held, that the conviction was good.

This was a case stated under the 20 & 21 Vict. c. 43, upon a conviction of justices under the 4 Geo. 4, c. 34, s. 3 (Masters and Servants Act). The case stated that at a petty sessions, holden at Rotherham on the 25th Feb. 1861, an information (preferred by Richard John Frankland, as agent to Thomas Bolland and his partners, hereinafter called the resps.) against John Whittle (hereinafter called the app.), under the 4 Geo. 4, c. 34, s. 3, charging for that the said app., on the 1st Dec. 1860, at the Holmes Colliery, did contract with the said resps. to serve them in the capacity and employment of a miner, until he should have given to or received from the said resps. one month's notice to leave the said service, and until such notice should have fully expired, at and for certain wages, and that the said app. did afterwards duly enter into his said service according to the said contract, and that the said app. afterwards and before the term of his said contract was completed, to wit, on the 13th of February 1861, at the Holmes Colliery, was, in the execution of his said contract, and otherwise respecting the same, guilty of a certain misconduct and misdemeanor, in this, to wit, that the said app. did then and there, and before the term of his said contract was completed, unlawfully absent himself from his said service without leave or lawful excuse, contrary to the statute, was duly heard and determined by us, and we duly convicted the said app. of the said offence, and adjudged him to be committed to the house of correction at Wakefield, in the said West Riding, to remain and be kept to hard labour for the term of one month. And it was proved before us, and we did so adjudge, that no wages were then due to the said app. from his said masters (the resps.), as he had been duly paid his wages for all work done by him up to that time, and that the contract was proved on oath before us, being that he was to be paid by piece-work; no wages could be earned by him, or would be payable to him during the time he would be in prison under the said sentence.

At the hearing of the information it was proved by the resps. that app. had entered into an agreement with Thomas Bolland, on behalf of himself and partners, constituting "The Rotherham, Masbrough and Holmes Coal Company (Limited)," the resps. in this appeal. The agreement stated that the said John Whittle, in consideration of wages to be paid to him fortnightly by the said Rotherham, Masbrough and Holmes Coal Company (Limited), doth contract and agree with the said company to work for and serve the said company faithfully, diligently and exclusively, as their servant, in the capacity of a collier at their collieries in the township of Bruiworth and Kimberworth, from the date thereof until the expiration of such notice as is after mentioned. The agreement then contains a provision for either party determining the same by giving twenty-eight days' notice. There was also a provision that, in consideration of such faithful service, he the said Thomas Bolland, on behalf of himself and partners, agreed that the said John Whittle should not be discharged by the said company without twenty-eight days' notice being given for that purpose.

The case further stated, that it was proved on behalf of the resps. that the app. entered into their service under the said contract, and afterwards, and while it was subsisting, absented himself from the service without leave or lawful excuse; that it was also proved that all wages then due to app. for all work done by him had been paid to him, and that he was paid by piece-work, and not by time; that evidence was also given on behalf of the app. that there had been a dispute about wages. It was contended on the part of the app., first, that the agreement did not bind the resps. to find work, or pay wages, and was therefore bad for want of mutuality; secondly, that the information was bad for proceeding in the name of Thomas Bolland and his partners, and not in the name of the company; thirdly, that there were no wages due at the time the alleged offence was committed, and therefore no wages could be abated; fourthly, that there was a bond fide dispute as to the amount that should be paid for certain work required to be done under the said contract, and the said contract not providing for any such dispute or difference, the said justices had no jurisdiction under the statute, and that such dispute or difference constituted a lawful excuse, and was a reasonable cause for such absentsing.

The justices, however, were of opinion, first, that, by reasonable implication, the agreement bound the resps. to find work and pay wages, and was a valid agreement; secondly, that, under the 11 & 12 Vict. c. 43, s. 1, the objection to the information could not be allowed, and they were of opinion that the variance, if any, between the information and the evidence adduced in support of it had not in any way deceived or misled the app.; thirdly, they were also of opinion that the statute authorised them to convict the app. and commit him to prison, although there were no wages due or becoming due to him, which they could abate; fourthly, they were also of opinion, from the evidence, that there was no dispute or difference as to the amount to be paid for work under the said contract which amounted to a lawful excuse or justification for app. refusing to work for the resps. under the said contract, or for absentsing himself from the service before the term of his contract was completed, and that app. was aware that he had no lawful excuse for absentsing himself.

Quain now appeared for the resps., and contended that upon all the grounds the justices were right, and the conviction good: (Reg. v. Welsh, 2 Ell. & Bl. 357; Pilkington v. Scott, 15 M. & W. 657; Valpy v. Gibson, 4 C. B. 837.)

Mellish, Q.C., for the app., contended that the contract was void for want of mutuality, for that whilst the app. was bound to remain in the service, the resps. were not bound to find him work or to pay him any certain wages: (Williamson v. Taylor, 5 Q. B. 175; Asplin v. Austin, 5 Q. B. 671; Elderton v. Emmes, 4 H. of L. Cas. 624.) [CROMPTON, J.—When there is a term in the contract that the party is not to be discharged under twenty-eight days, and that he is to be paid fortnightly, is it not illusory to say that they are not to find work?] They are not bound to find it; supposing the colliery to be stopped up, the masters could not find work, and yet it would be said that the men were bound to remain, yet receiving no wages, as they are to be paid by piece-work: (Sykes v. Dixon, 9 A. & E. 693; Re Baker, 2 H. & N. 219.)

COCKBURN, C.J.—The objection upon the ground of variance between the proof and the information is cured by the 11 & 12 Vict. c. 43, s. 1. Then, with regard to the main objection that the agreement is not a binding one upon the app., I think that the decision of the justices was right. The principle of the agreement is this, that the man shall serve, and that the employers shall find work at fortnightly wages; the man not to be discharged under a twenty-eight days' notice. It is quite clear that it would be perfectly illusory if, though the masters did not discharge him, they could starve him by not giving him work. By implication the masters are bound to find work whilst he continues in their service.

HARRISON (app.) v. LEAPER (resp.)

Highway—Nuisance—5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 50, s. 70—Conviction.

By sect. 70 of the 5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 50 (Highway Act) a penalty is imposed upon any person who shall sink any pit or shaft, or erect or cause to be erected any steam-engine, &c. within the distance of twenty-five yards from any part of any carriage way or cart way, &c.

The deft. was the owner of a steam-thrashing machine, which he lent to hire to a farmer, and sent his man with it, who superintended it. The machine was erected within a distance of twenty-five yards from the highway, but there was no evidence to show that the deft. directed it to be so erected, and he was himself not present at the time. Being convicted under sect. 70 of the 5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 50 :

Held, that the conviction was bad.

This was a case stated under the 20 & 21 Vict. c. 45, against a conviction of the deft. for having committed an offence against sect. 70 of the 5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 50 (General Highway Act).

The case stated as follows:—

This was an information preferred by John Leaper, of Spalding, in the parts of Holland, Lincolnshire, against Thomas Harrison, "for that the said Thomas Harrison, on Saturday, the 3rd day of February 1861, at the parish of Gedney, did erect, or cause to be erected, a certain steam engine and thrashing machine within the distance of twenty-five yards (to wit) twelve yards from a certain public carriage way there situate, leading through Gedney Dyke, the said engine and strap passed over the driving wheel of each; that deft. lets his said steam-engine and machine out for hire, sometimes by the day, but more frequently by a remuneration according to the quantity of corn thrashed, and that on such occasions the same are sent out and set to work under the immediate charge and control of the deft.'s own man or servant; that on the 23rd Feb. last the said machine was set up in the manner above described, and was thrashing corn on the premises of a Mr. Daniel Butters, in the parish of Gedney, aforesaid, in the open air, and unprotected by any building, screen, or other cover, at a distance of only twelve yards from the centre of a public highway, which passes by Mr. Butters' yard and premises, and that, whilst the machine was so at work, two horses, drawing a cart on the said highway, took fright and knocked down and seriously injured the man driving them. On the part of the deft. it was proved by his aforesaid servant that the machine on the day in question was let to hire to Mr. Butters to thrash his corn; that he (deft.'s servant) accordingly took and fixed same in Mr. Butters' yard in the situation above described by direction of Mr. Butters's son; that deft. himself did not come nigh at the time of fixing the machine, and that it is usual to place the machine where ordered by the party whose corn is about to be thrashed, or by some one representing him; and on cross-examination of this witness it was elicited that, during the whole time the steam-engine and thrashing machine were at work they were in charge of the engine-driver (deft.'s man), and that his wages were paid to him by his master (the deft.), and not by the party whose corn was being thrashed. The deft.'s attorney thereupon objected—first, that the said engine and machine are not such steam-machinery, &c. as are contemplated by the 70th section of the Highway Act, 5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 50, and do not therefore come within the provisions thereof, for that at the time of passing the said statute these portable steam-engines and thrashing machines were not in existence, so that the statute, being a penal one, could not be held to refer to them; secondly, that the engine and machine, being merely drawn by horses to the place where they work, could not be said to be erected, and therefore are not within the jurisdiction of the Act, which clearly has reference to a permanent nuisance; thirdly, that as it was proved that the deft. let out the engine and machine for hire (though sent in charge of and worked by his own man), he thereby for the time being lost or gave up the control thereof; and that, as it was further proved that the deft. himself was not present on the occasion in question, he could not be convicted of the offence imputed to him of erecting, or causing to be erected, &c. Whereupon we, the undersigned, did adjudge and determine that all such objections were untenable, and that the deft. was guilty of the offence charged against him, and we did accordingly convict him as before mentioned."

By the 5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 50, s. 70, it is enacted that "it shall not be lawful for any person to sink any pit or shaft, or to erect or cause to be erected any steam-engine, gin, or other like machine, or any machinery attached thereto, within the distance of twenty-five yards . . . from any part of any carriage way or cart way, unless such pit or shaft or steam-engine, gin, or other like engine or machinery, shall be within some house or other building, or behind some wall or fence, sufficient to conceal or screen the same from the said carriage way or cart way, so that the same may not be dangerous to passengers, horses, or cattle," &c.

Fitzjames Stephen appeared in support of the conviction, and argued that the justices were right upon all the points taken. As to the third objection, that the deft. was not present, and so could not be made liable for the acts of others, he contended that, as the steam-engine was under the care of the deft.'s servant, and was placed in position by him, he, the master, was liable. [CROMPTON, J.—The placing of the machine may have been the act of Butters; he directed where it was to be placed.] It was the duty of Harrison to have given his man orders not to place it in an improper position: (Rex v. Fisher, 1 Moo. & Mal. 437; Rex v. Dixon, 3 M. & Sel. 11; Attorney-General v. Siddon, 1 Cro. & Jer. 220.)

COCKBURN, C. J.—It strikes me in this way: if a servant in the care of such an engine negligently were to run up against another with it, his master would be liable. If, however, he wilfully does so, his master would not be liable. So here, if he wilfully erected this machine in an improper place, without his master's orders to do so, the master could not be made liable under this Act of Parliament. Upon that ground I think the conviction cannot be supported. The master was not present, and there is nothing to show that the engine was placed in that particular spot by his directions.

Conviction quashed.

house. He was the inmate of a hospital founded in pursuance of the will of a former Earl of Shrewsbury, and the constitutions framed for it provide that in the hospital there should be one governor and twenty poor persons who should perform certain specified religious acts, and should enjoy such chambers, rooms and accommodation therein from time to time, for their lives, together with such stipend and allowances as were therein-after, to every of them, limited and appointed; and the said persons were required to dispose themselves to some work and labour, according to their several abilities, that they might get somewhat towards their better maintenance, and in some measure eat their own bread, and have therewithal to help themselves in time of sickness. The constitutions then indicate the persons who are to elect the candidates for admission, and the mode of election. They then declare that the persons to be elected are poor indigent people, well esteemed of for godly life and conversation, of good condition, peaceable and quiet among their neighbours, and such as by persons of honest repute shall be judged fit objects for the charity; and if it so happen that, by misinformation or mistake, any person or persons shall be elected wanting such qualifications, or in any wise behave themselves contrary to these rules and constitutions, he shall then be removed and expelled by the governor and his assistants, and another chosen in his place and room:

Held, that the app. had not an equitable freehold in the chambers of the hospital in which he resided; that his holding was of an eleemosynary nature, and therefore he was not entitled to vote for the election of knights of the shire.

This was an appeal from the decision of the revising barrister in a case held at his court for revising the list of voters for the West Riding of the county of York.

At a court held before the barrister appointed to revise the list of voters for the West Riding of the county of York, Jonathan Buxton objected to Thomas Betts as not having been entitled, on the last day of July 1861, to have his name inserted in the list of voters in the township of Sheffield for the said West Riding. The name stood in the copy of the register to the said township as follows:—

Christian and Surname.	Places of Abode.	Nature of Qualification.	Place in Township.
Betts, Thomas	Shrewsbury Hospital, Sheffield.	Freehold house	Shrewsbury Hospital, self occupied.

Thomas Betts was an inmate of the hospital in the township of Sheffield, founded by Gilbert Earl of Shrewsbury, and was duly elected and appointed, and as such resided in separate chambers and rooms of the building of the hospital, pursuant to his appointment under the trusts and constitutions of the hospital hereinafter set forth, which chambers and rooms are of the annual value of 40s. and upwards, and were in his bonâ fide occupation, and had been in his possession for six calendar months next previous to the last day of July 1861.

By virtue of this the said Thomas Betts claimed to have his name inserted and retained on the list of voters, as entitled to vote for the knights of the West Riding in respect of an equitable freehold estate in a house, whereof he was seised for his own life pursuant to the 2 Will. 4, c. 46, s. 18.

The hospital of Gilbert Earl of Shrewsbury, situate in the said township, was founded under the following circumstances, and governed by the trustees and constitutions following:—

Gilbert Earl of Shrewsbury, by his will bearing date in the month of May, in the fourteenth year of the reign of King James I., devised to the executors thereof all his manors, lands, tenements and hereditaments whereof he was seised of any estate of inheritance in fee-simple in possession, remainder, or reversion (with certain exceptions), to pay funeral expenses, debts and legacies, and the residue and surplusage to his executors, their heirs and assigns. And he thereby willed and appointed an hospital, to be founded at Sheffield, for perpetual maintenance of twenty poor persons, and to be called the hospital of Gilbert Earl of Shrewsbury, and the same to be endowed with such revenues and possessions as his executors should think fit, not being under 200l. a-year.

This will was proved at London on the 14th May 1616. In the year 1625 the great-grandson of the above testator, whose name was Henry Earl of Norwich, and afterwards Duke of Norfolk, for performing the will erected a building as a hospital in Sheffield, and placed in it twenty poor persons—ten men and ten women; and in the year 1673 made certain constitutions in writing for the government of the said hospital.

By these constitutions it was established that, in the said hospital there should be for ever one governor and twenty poor persons—ten men and ten women—who should give themselves to the service of God and to pray for the prosperity of the noble family of the founder and his posterity, and that the governor and every of them should enjoy such chambers, rooms and accommodations from time to time for their lives, together with such stipend and all other allowances as were thereinafter to every of them limited and appointed, every one of them well and honestly behaving him or herself according to those statutes, constitutions and ordinances, and for the better preventing of idleness it was ordained that all such persons as were or should be placed in the said hospital, as well men as women, should dispose themselves to some work and labour, according to their abilities and health, that they might get somewhat towards their better maintenance, and might in some measure eat their own bread and have therewithal to help themselves in times of weakness or sickness.

The men were also required to be widowers or bachelors, and the women widows or maids, and both to be threescore years of age or upwards, unless dispensed with by the authority of the Earl Marshal of England.

Their mode of election to be, if the number has thereby (sic) also to be by the governor and three assistants named in the constitutions, or the major part of them, presenting the names of two persons for every void place to the Earl Marshal or his heirs, together with a certificate of their place, condition and behaviour, and to that end the said earl or his heirs might elect and appoint out of them one or more persons in the then vacant place or places, and in the event of his neglecting to do so for six weeks after due notice, then the governor and his assistants should fill up the vacancies; and it was also provided that the Earl Marshal or his heirs might make choice of a person without certificate. The persons to be elected are to be poor indigent people, well esteemed of for godly life and conversation, of good conditions, peaceable and quiet amongst their neighbours, and such as by persons of honest repute shall be judged fit objects for this charity; and if it so happen, by misinformation or mistake, that any person or persons be elected wanting such qualifications, or shall marry afterwards, or in anywise behave themselves contrary to these rules and constitutions, he shall then be removed and expelled by the governor and his assistants for the time being, or the major part of them, and another chosen in his place and room.

C. B.]

FREEMAN v. GAINSFORD.

[C. B.]

If any of the said poor persons profanely or frequently curse or swear, or frequent any wine-tavern or alehouse, or remain there above one hour in a day, or be drunk, or any otherwise misbehave themselves, the governor and his assistants are empowered to deduct from the offender's next week's allowance one-half for the first offence, one whole week's allowance for the second offence, and two weeks' allowance for the third offence. If he be incorrigible, the governor shall take from him his gown and badge, and he shall be for ever expelled and removed out of the said hospital, provided that the said Earl Marshal or his heirs may, according to their will and pleasure, by writing under his or their hand, restore any person so expelled.

It is also ordered that none shall lodge with any of the poor persons in their room or rooms, or be admitted to inhabit there upon any pretence whatsoever, unless licence be first obtained under the hands of the said Earl Marshal or his heirs, or under the hands of the governor and assistants or the major part of them, but they shall be helpful one to another, according to their strength and ability, as in charity they ought; provided that no person or persons be thereby hindered from helping any of the aforesaid poor persons in the daytime when occasion requires, or that none of the said poor persons shall lodge abroad, wander, nor beg alms upon any pretence whatsoever, upon pain of expulsion.

The constitutions having also pointed out the qualifications and duties of the governor of the hospital, and his salary having been named, and having pointed out the office of his assistants, provide then that one or more of them shall, monthly, meet with the governor to pay the governor and poor persons of the said hospital their allowances respectively, according to such proportion as thereafter limited and appointed: viz., to every man 2s. 6d. by the week, and to every woman the like sum of 2s. 6d., per week, and to every one in due season, two wain loads of pit coals for one year's firing. And the assistants and governor are likewise to buy clothing, to every man and to every woman one purple gown in seven years and a blue one every two years to be clothed withal, in each of which gowns shall be worn a silver badge with the arms and crest of the family of the founder, and the governor to have every year a scarlet gown.

The persons to be elected are to be taken or chosen out of the town or parish of Sheffield, if any persons can therein be found fit, the poor tenants thereof of the said Earl Marshal and his heirs to have the preference before any other in such election if duly qualified; if there be no persons then the said Earl Marshal is to make choice of any person qualified in any place and out of any other parish where the said earl has any lands descended from the said Gilbert Earl of Shrewsbury.

No member of the hospital has ever been expelled under the operation of the above conditions.

The said Henry Duke of Norfolk, by indenture dated the 23rd Nov. 1680, granted, released and conveyed certain lands and tenements in the counties of York and Derby to trustees and their heirs, in trust that the said trustees should by or out of the yearly rents and profits of the said lands and hereditaments maintain and keep the said house and building of the hospital and the gardens and yards thereunto belonging, from time to time for ever, as need or occasion should be, with all needful and requisite reparations, and should provide gowns and other provisions for the said governor and governess, and all members and officers of or belonging to the said hospital for the time being for ever according to the said constitutions.

Power to appoint new trustees was created by the above deed, which power was exercised in the year 1693, by indenture and by Act of Parliament passed in the eleventh year of the reign of George I., the trustees then surviving were declared to be seised of the trust-lands to their use upon trust to apply the rents and profits and accumulations that had arisen, in enlarging the buildings for accommodating additional members to be added to the hospital, and also in maintaining and keeping the house and buildings of the hospital and the gardens and yard thereunto belonging with good and decent order and repair.

It was also enacted that the governor of the hospital was to be a clergyman of the Church of England, and elected and appointed and displaced for any misfeasance or neglect of duty in the same manner as the governors of the said hospital are elected and displaced according to the said constitution.

Under the powers of this Act of Parliament it was provided that the number of poor persons that should be added to the then existing number of poor persons, members of the hospital, should not be less than four poor men, besides the then present poor women, and that as many more should be added to the number from time to time as the revenues for the hospital for the time being would extend to make provision for according to the constitutions made for the then existing members, so that a surplus of revenue be left sufficient to bear the expenses of the repairs and other necessary expenses relating to the hospital; and by this Act it was further provided that nothing in it should extend to take away or invalidate any powers belonging to the Duke of Norfolk and his heirs as heirs of the founders of the hospital, which he might claim, use, or exercise, by virtue of the constitutions of the hospital, and that the said duke and his heirs should for ever thereafter exercise such power, so as the execution thereof did not lessen the revenues of the hospital, nor the number of poor persons therein, or to be therein.

The number of members of the hospital had become subsequently increased to thirty-six by the increase of the accumulated surplus revenues until the year 1767, when a flood destroyed part of the hospital, and from the destruction and expense attending its restoration the numbers were after that time reduced to twenty-seven, and the original constitutions were lost, in consequence of which circumstances another Act of Parliament was passed in the tenth year of George the Third's reign for explaining and amending the last Act, and for enlarging the powers contained in the said Act, and for other purposes, and for establishing the constitutions a copy of the original were declared to be such as bound the hospital, and were made a schedule to the Act.

The powers for applying the accumulated revenues to the restoration of the hospital, and for restoring the number of its members, were thereby granted, and increased allowances given to the members, amounting in the whole to a weekly sum of 3s. 6d. apiece for each poor member of the hospital.

It was also stated that the amending and explaining the former Act might, in many respects, be highly beneficial to the charity, and be conformable to the original intentions of the founder of the hospital. The reservation of the powers of the Duke of Norfolk is therein repeated, so that their exercise did not lessen the revenues of the hospital.

The trust-estates, including the land and hospital of Gilbert Earl of Shrewsbury, have, from time to time, been conveyed and transferred to new trustees in trust under powers of the Acts of Parliament in that behalf for the said hospital, and according to the original constitutions, and as the rents and revenues have increased in value, additions to the hospital, and to the number of its members elected under the constitutions have been sanctioned and made by the Duke of Norfolk for the time being.

For the resp. it was contended, on the authority of the case of Simpson v. Wilkinson, that he had such an equitable estate of freehold for life in his chambers and rooms, the legal estate of which was vested in trustees of the hospital, as entitled him to vote and retain his name and qualification on the list of voters of the West Riding of Yorkshire; and for the app. that, on the authority of the case of Heartley v. Banks, the resp. was not the owner of an equitable freehold so as to confer a qualification to vote as claimed, but that his interest in his chambers and rooms in the hospital building was that of an occupier of part of the benefits of the charity, and a residence in the hospital, which did not make him the equitable freehold owner of a house and chambers, or justify the conclusion that it gave him a right to vote. I retained the name of the resp. on the register on the ground contended for by him.

Pickering replied.

ERLE, C. J.—I am of opinion that the decision of the revising barrister in this case ought to be reversed, and that the claimant had not an equitable freehold in the chambers in the hospital wherein he resided. It appears by the statement that the hospital in question was founded in pursuance of the will of the Earl of Shrewsbury, and the constitutions are before us, and the first of them directs that the persons to be elected are to be poor indigent people, well esteemed for good lives and conversation, who shall be judged by honest people to be fit objects of the charity. The other constitutions are entirely consistent with that; that the governors are to elect to places in the hospital persons answering the description that I have read; and it appears that in practice each party elected is placed in a set of chambers, and, for aught that appears, he probably continues in the chambers wherein he is placed from the time he is elected until he dies or leaves the hospital; but the question for us is not the time that he occupies, or the accommodation given, but what are his rights when elected and placed there. I am of opinion that he is appointed as an object of charity, and that the governors in putting him there did not give him an estate that he could enforce by bill in equity in his own name. A legal estate it is not contended that he has, but only an equitable estate. It would be contrary to the spirit of the ordinances that he should have a right, or in other words that he should be able to file a bill; that each person elected should be able to file a bill against the governors in reference to the estate vested in them. It appears to me also, that it would be contrary to the intention of the statute prescribing a qualification for voting; and indeed the qualification is intended to secure more independence and freedom than would be probably incidental to poor indigent people elected to an eleemosynary establishment as fit objects of charity. These are the general observations that lead me to the conclusion that the case of Heartley v. Banks is distinctly in point. The reason assigned by the court is, that objects of charity holding chambers as part of the eleemosynary bounty from the hospital are not persons having an equitable freehold that would qualify them to vote, and I think that upon that judgment there is no distinction in this respect between a qualification to vote for a borough and for a county. No doubt there is a section in the Reform Act excluding from voting in boroughs all who are in receipt of alms, and though it does not expressly state that this should apply to counties, I should think that the same principle would apply. But the whole of the reasoning in the case of Heartley v. Banks is as entirely applicable to votes for counties as to votes for boroughs. I rely upon that case, and I do not consider that the court is bound to elect between the two conflicting decisions in Simpson v. Wilkinson and Heartley v. Banks. No doubt in Simpson v. Wilkinson the claimants were objects of charity elected to a charity and having rooms in a charity building. They claimed to vote, and the circumstances might have authorised the same line of reasoning and the same judgment as was afterwards given in Heartley v. Banks, but that circumstance cannot be relied on. I think that the information we have, and the whole line of the report, satisfies me on this point, that whether the inmates of a hospital receiving rooms to be held for life have an equitable freehold in those rooms, was not the point for adjudication before the court. The court decided the point reserved by the barrister, "Is there evidence that authorises me to conclude that this hospital was founded under a license from Queen Elizabeth, and whether it was not a corporation aggregate?" The judgment was confined to that point. There is upon the matter the judicial opinion of perhaps more than one judge; and if I am reported correctly, there is an intimation of something of that kind on my part. Many of the observations made by learned judges, if they chance to be reported hostilely, would misrepresent them, they being for the arguing counsel to address his attention to, and not observations that the judges mean to be bound by. In that case the only question was whether it was a corporation aggregate, and not the point involved in the present case. For these reasons I think that the judgment of the revising barrister should be reversed.

WILLIAMS, J.—I am entirely of the same opinion. I think that the occupier of rooms as part of the benefit of the charitable institution is not the owner of the freehold of the rooms in which he resides; at all events, unless the constitution of the charitable institution assigns a separate house as a separate residence to the object of the charity during the continuance of his life, directly or indirectly. It is contended that in the present case there is such an occupation under the constitution of the charitable foundation in question. I do not accept that view. The app. relies upon the language in the first constitution, in which it says (after saying that in the said hospital there shall be one governor and ten poor men and ten poor women, it goes on to say), "that they and every of them shall enjoy such chambers, rooms and accommodations, &c., for their lives, together with such stipend and all other allowance as was thereafter limited and appointed, every one of them well and honestly behaving himself or herself according to these statutes and ordinances." I conceive that there is quite sufficient in this case to show that the claimants would have a freehold if they had any property in their rooms. I do not mean to controvert that, or to express an opinion in the affirmative or the negative of that. The question is, whether they have any property, and I am of opinion that they have none. I think the meaning of this language simply is, that some provision is to be made thereafter to regulate the mode in which the recipients of the charity shall be accommodated with lodging, clothes and a stipend, and that they are to have these things for life. It does not follow that the particular rooms are to be assigned to their particular recipients to be enjoyed by them as owners for their lives. I think that they have not the right of an equitable owner at all. If a man had such a right, he could insist upon remaining there notwithstanding the purposes of the charity might call for his being removed to some other proper chamber, or for his own being demolished or devoted to some reasonable purpose connected with the charity. He could put those having the conduct of the institution at defiance.

BUSHELL v. EASTES.

saying—"No; I have an equitable freehold in my room, and you shall not put a foot in it." No such thing as that was intended by these constitutions. This is plainly the case of a number of persons who are entitled to be properly and reasonably accommodated with chambers and other conveniences and allowances in the hospital provided by the bounty of the founder. Having a right to be so supplied, and having a right to go to equity to insist that such things shall be provided out of the funds, does not constitute them equitable owners of the rooms.

BYLES, J.—I am of the same opinion. This case really turns upon the construction of the 8 Hen. 6, because the provisions of the 2 Will. 4, c. 45, so far as relates to freeholds for life, cuts down the right, and does not extend it. The statute of Hen. 6 proceeds, "Whereas elections have now of late been made by excessive numbers of people dwelling within the same counties, &c., of which the most part was by people of small substance and of no value, whereof every of them pretended a voice equivalent as to such elections to be made with the most worthy knights and esquires," and then provides that elections shall be by people dwelling and resident in the same county, whereof every one of them shall have free land or tenement of the value of 40s. by the year at least, above all charges. The qualification is not badly expressed by the phrase "independent freeholders;" they are the parties invested with the right to vote, and first they must be freeholders. It seems to me, so far as I can make out, that this claimant has no one of the indicia of property. He has no right to say, "Give me a particular room," and I see nothing to prevent the managers of the hospital saying, "You have lived long enough in this room, go and live in another room." It is plain that, if he has a freehold interest, it is one of a very strange nature; he cannot assign it, he cannot underlet it, he cannot occupy jointly, and he cannot take in an inmate; and though an equitable estate as well as a legal estate now might be seised, and is extendable under an elegit, this particular estate cannot be applied to the payment of his debts. I very much doubt whether he could bring trespass for intruding into his room; so that the indicia of property are absent, and the very nature of his occupation is eleemosynary. My Lord has pointed out that the inmates are to be poor people, fit objects of this charity, and therefore we must approach this case with the consideration that the claimant is, I will not say an eleemosynary occupier—for I doubt whether he is an occupier at all—but an eleemosynary resident. These parties are clearly not within the statute of Hen. 6. With respect to Simpson v. Wilkinson, I do not repose on my recollection of the judgment, but it seems to me plain that, though Maule, J. expressed an opinion, yet the court thought that it was only entrusted by the Legislature with the very point left to them by the barrister, and that was not this point. Therefore Simpson v. Wilkinson is no authority, but I agree with my Lord and with my brother Williams, that Heartley v. Banks is a well-considered decision in complete accordance with the intention of the statute of Hen. 6 applicable to the case then before the court, and quite as applicable to the case now before the court.

KEATING, J.—I also think that the decision of the barrister should be reversed. It appears to me that we could not decide otherwise without interfering with the case of Heartley v. Banks, which was decided on by this court after great consideration. No doubt that the military knights in that case did not assume even so decided an eleemosynary character as the recipients of bounty here; but, looking through the constitutions as set out in this case, it is difficult to see how it was possible that the parties could be receiving charity under more stringent rules as to discipline and other conditions inconsistent with freehold property. I entirely agree that there is nothing here which obliges the governor to assign to this claimant any particular set of chambers; and therefore there is nothing which he could say he has a freehold interest in. No doubt he has a right to the benefits of the charity, and they are conferred for life so long as he conducts himself in accordance with the rules of the charity; but though it may be an appointment for life, it is not an appointment in connection with any particular set of chambers. For these reasons, it appears to me that this decision cannot be maintained, and should be reversed.

BUSHELL (app.) v. EASTES (resp.)

Election law—County vote—Qualification—Parish clerk.

A person claimed to vote in respect of his office as parish clerk. Part of the emoluments attached to his said office consisted of the clerk's share of an ancient due, payable to the clerk and sexton on the opening of every grave in the churchyard of the said parish, which share amounted by the year to 40s. and upwards:

Held, that he was not entitled to vote in respect thereof, the ancient due being in the nature of a fee for his services at funerals, and not a payment or emolument issuing out of land.

This was an appeal from the decision of the revising barrister on a claim to vote made at his court holden for the eastern division of the county of Kent.

CASE.

At a court held by me, the barrister duly appointed to revise the list of voters for the eastern division of the county of Kent, on the 25th day of September 1861, at Dover, in the said division, for revising the list of the parishes in the polling district of Dover, one Benjamin Richards Eastes duly objected to the name of William Minster Bushell being retained on the list of voters for the parish of St. James, Dover, in the said division of the county of Kent.

It was proved before me that the said William Minster Bushell was, in the year 1826, duly appointed parish clerk of the said parish of St. James, Dover, which he, the said William Minster Bushell, held, and which his predecessors had theretofore held, for life.

It was further proved that by licence under the seal of the Archbishop of Canterbury, dated the 23rd Aug. 1832, the said William Minster Bushell "was confirmed in his said office, together with all and singular the fees, salaries and profits either by law or ancient custom belonging to the same."

It was also proved that a part of the emoluments attached to the said office of parish clerk, actually received by the said William Minster Bushell during the period of his holding the said office, and by his predecessors therein, consisted of the clerk's share of an ancient due, payable to the clerk and sexton upon the opening of every grave in the churchyard of the said parish of St. James, Dover.

It was further proved that the clerk had not himself performed any of the work or labour incident to the opening of the graves, this being performed by the sexton.

It was further was proved that the sexton received a fee for the making of each grave, besides the fee he shared with the clerk on the opening of the grave.

The clerk's share of the fee paid on the opening of the grave was proved to amount annually to 40s. and upwards, and was described in the vestry book of the said parish as an ancient fee due to the clerk.

Upon this state of facts it appeared to me that the ancient due was in the nature of remuneration for services rendered in conducting the funeral rites, and that it was not a payment or emolument issuing out of land, or in anywise charged upon the soil of the churchyard, over which neither sexton, clerk, or vestry had any power or control. I therefore held that the said William Minster Bushell was not entitled to be retained upon the said list of voters, and expunged his name from the list of voters.

If my decision was correct, such list is to remain without alteration; if my decision was incorrect, the name of the said William Minster Bushell, with his address and particulars of his qualification, as stated below, is to be added to the revised list of voters for the said parish of St. James, in the said eastern division of the county of Kent.

Macnamara for the app.—The claimant here has a freehold office of the clear annual value of 40s., and is entitled to vote in respect of it. The claim is based upon or connected with land, and the court should put a construction on the statute (8 Hen. 6, c. 7) favourable to the franchise. The Middlesex Committee of 1804 no doubt were of opinion that a parish clerk had no vote; but there is no decision of the courts upon the point. All that is required by the statute is, that the claimant shall reside and be able to expend 40s. by the year from land or office connected therewith: (Co. Litt. 6 A; 2 Bl. Com. 17, 36, defining what is an office; Carthew, 478; Heywood on County Elections, 65; 2 Peckwith, 93.) The statutes on the subject are—8 Hen. 6, c. 7; 10 Hen. 6, c. 6; 7 & 8 Will. 3, c. 25, s. 3; 10 Anne, c. 23; 18 Geo. 2, c. 18; 20 Geo. 3, c. 17; 22 Geo. 3, c. 41; 28 Geo. 3, c. 36; 29 Geo. 3, c. 18; 2 Will. 4, c. 45.

Welsby (in answer to the court).—I shall contend that such a person as this never had a right to vote in respect of his office.

Macnamara.—There is nothing in the Act last cited (the Reform Act) inconsistent with the right now claimed. If the office is connected with or concerns realty, and (as the fees on burials were payable only in respect of the place, that is the churchyard), it clearly is, the court should give the vote: (2 Peckwith, 93; 4 Inst. c. 1, p. 46; 2 Halsett's Precedents; Ellicott on Elections, 22, 38.)

Welsby, for the resp., was not called upon.

ERLE, C.J.—I am of opinion that the revising barrister in this case was right. I do not dwell upon the question whether a parish clerk holds an office. I am clearly of opinion, together with the Middlesex committee of 1804, that he is not qualified by reason of being a parish clerk to vote for the county. The resolution of that committee has been, if I may so say, recognised and acted upon ever since 1804—recognised and acted upon by those who have had to decide on the qualifications to vote for the county; and the whole frame of the Reform Act at the time when the constituency was to be settled and qualifications were to be recognised—the whole frame of it is consistent with the supposition that the Legislature coincided with the opinion of the Middlesex committee, and not consistent with the claim put forward on behalf of the parish clerk upon the present occasion. I am against Mr. Macnamara on the first point, by reason of the office being a profit. That alone would do, irrespective of any connection with land. I am of opinion also against him on the second point; and if it was necessary to show this was an office yielding 40s. from land, the fact of the clerk of the parish receiving from persons connected with the burials in the churchyard certain donations that amount to more than 40s. by the year, I think, does not amount to a deriving profit from the land; and he has no interest in the freehold of the churchyard, taking a profit from the land thereby. I think the revising barrister put the right construction upon it; that it is a fee to the parish clerk by the persons connected with the burials, for the services he performs in attending and assisting at the funerals; and it is not at all analogous to those profits issuing from the land alluded to, where the parish clerk has a right to take so much of the actual profits of the land and other profits. The claim fails, and the revising barrister is right.

HALL (app.) v. LEWIS (resp.)

Election law - County Vote—Qualification—Preacher—Lay clerk—Bell-ringer.

A "preacher," a "lay clerk" and a "bell-ringer" in a cathedral, who were respectively appointed, the first during good behaviour, and the two last for life, and were paid their several stipends by the treasurer of the dean and chapter out of the chapter revenues, "which are derived wholly or in part from certain lands and tenements vested in the dean and chapter," claimed to be upon the register of voters for the county in respect of their offices: Held, that they had no equitable interest in the lands from which the funds were derived, and therefore were not entitled to the franchise.

This was an appeal from the decision of the revising barrister for East Kent.

Case.—At a court holden at Canterbury, in the eastern division of the county of Kent, before me, the revising barrister appointed to revise the list of voters for the said eastern division of the said county, on the 22nd Oct. 1861, the Rev. Francis James Holland, Joseph Burn, and Thomas Parnell severally claimed to be placed on the list of voters for the said eastern division of the said county, in respect of property situate wholly or in part within the parish called the ville of Christ Church, in the said city of Canterbury, and were duly objected to by Benjamin Richard Kastea, a person on the said register of voters, on the ground that they did not possess the requisite qualification. The claims were set forth in the following form:—

Christian and Surname	Place of Abode.	Nature of Qualification.	Street, Lane, &c.
Holland, Francis James	14, St. Dunstan-terrace, Canterbury	Freehold Office	As one of the six preachers in the Cathedral Church, Canterbury.
Burn, Joseph	16, Orchard-street, St. Dunstan's, Canterbury	Freehold Office	Lay clerk, Canterbury Cathedral.
Parnell, Thomas	St Radigund's, Canterbury	Freehold Office	Bell-ringer, Canterbury Cathedral.

As regards the claim of the Reverend Francis James Holland, the facts proved before me were, that the said Reverend Francis James Holland was appointed by the Archbishop of Canterbury one of the six preachers of Canterbury Cathedral; that he held his office during good behaviour, provided he remained in the diocese, and preached at least twice a year in the said cathedral; that he received an annual stipend of 32*l.* a-year as preacher from the treasurer of the dean and chapter, at the audit room in the cathedral precincts, situate within the said ville of Christ Church. It was further proved that each of the six preachers formerly received an annual stipend of 20*l.* a-year, and a house to live in, but that the stipend was afterwards increased and the house taken away.

As regards the claim of Joseph Burn, the facts

BRIDGEWATER v. DURANT.

[C. B.]

proved were, that at a chapter, held in July 1834, the said Joseph Burn was appointed by the said dean and chapter of Canterbury Cathedral one of the eight lay clerks of the said cathedral; that the appointment was for life, and was made by a resolution of the chapter, a minute of which resolution was recorded in the records of the chapter-house, and signed by the said Joseph Burn; that a salary of 80*l.* a-year was attached to the said office of lay clerk, and was paid annually to the said Joseph Burn by the treasurer of the said dean and chapter in the said audit-room of the said cathedral, situate within the said ville of Christ Church; that the duty of the said Joseph Burn as lay clerk was to attend and officiate as clerk a certain number of times in each year during the celebration of divine service in the said cathedral.

As regards the claim of Thomas Parnell, it was proved that in 1857 the said Thomas Parnell had been appointed by the said dean and chapter one of the eight bell-ringers in the said cathedral; that the appointment was for life, and that an annual stipend of 20*l.* a-year, payable out of the cathedral funds, was attached to the said office of bell-ringer, and was paid annually to the said Thomas Parnell by the said treasurer of the said dean and chapter, at the said audit-room in the said ville of Christ Church, and that it was the duty of the said Thomas Parnell to attend from time to time to assist in ringing the bells at the said cathedral prior to the celebration of divine service therein.

It further appeared that the appointment to these different offices, the duties incident to them, and the amount of salary payable to the holders or occupants of the said offices, were regulated by certain statutes of the metropolitan cathedral of Christ Church, Canterbury, which were produced in court, and read; and it was agreed that these statutes should form part of the present case, and, if necessary, should be referred to as evidence in support of the claims of the respective claimants. It was further proved that such salaries were paid out of the chapter revenues, which were derived either wholly or in part from certain lands and tenements situate in the said parish of Christ Church ville and other parishes in the said eastern division of the said county and elsewhere out of the said county, and which lands and tenements were vested in the dean and chapter of the said cathedral.

Upon this state of facts I retained the names of the said Francis James Holland, James Burn and Thomas Parnell on the list of voters.

The names of the several persons following appearing on the revised list of voters for the said parish of the villa of Christ Church, were allowed to remain upon such list, though duly objected to under circumstances similar to the cases of the said Joseph Burn and Thomas Parnell; that is to say, George Eastes, James Hurn Farrow, William Clife Gough, William Henry Longhurst, William Newsome, William Norman, William Pugh, Robert Rhodes and Mark Teal. I declare that the appeals against such decisions ought to be consolidated, as they depend upon the same decisions.

If the court, under the circumstances aforesaid, should be of opinion that my decision was incorrect, the names of the said Francis James Holland, Joseph Burn, Thomas Parnell, George Eastes, James Hurn Farrow, William Clife Gough, William Henry Longhurst, William Newsome, William Norman, William Pugh, Robert Rhodes and Mark Teal, are to be expunged from the said register of voters for the eastern division of the county of Kent for the said parish of Christ Church villa.

If the court be of opinion that my decision was correct, the said list will remain without amendment.

(Signed)

C. G. A.

Welsby for the app.—The question in this case is, whether these claimants have their stipend arising out of land, for after the decision in Bushell v. Eastes, it may be assumed that unless their stipend arises from land, they are not entitled to the franchise. All these parties are paid at the audit-room from funds of the cathedral; but there is nothing in the case to show that either of them has a clear income of 40*s.* a-year arising from land. The statute says, the funds are to come out of the common goods of the cathedral. Now the said common goods do not arise wholly out of land. In the next place the case does not show that these claimants had severally 40*s.* a-year stipend arising out of lands in the parish of Christ Church.

Macnamara for the resp.—As to the last point, there is sufficient arising out of lands in the parish of Christ Church to satisfy the requirement of the statute; and if the court finds difficulty on this point, I shall pray that the case may be sent back to have this fact found. It is found in the case that the salaries are derived from land. These claimants are therefore entitled to vote; for the dean and chapter hold the lands out of which the funds arise, as trustees for them.

ERLE, C. J.—I think the decision of the revising barrister in this case ought to be reversed. It is not necessary to make the case turn upon the question whether this person held the office of bell-ringer for the district, because, as Mr. Macnamara truly contended, if he was appointed and had an equitable interest and right to the salary from freehold lands, that would be a freehold qualification within the district from which the qualification is to be derived. I cannot find myself that there is any equitable interest in any lands anywhere. I can find nothing more than an agreement that "out of our property we will pay you 20*l.* a-year." I cannot conceive any distinction between this functionary, as Lord Mansfield called the party who claimed to hold an office, and any other party hired to do service, as far as creating an equitable interest in any of the property of the party who hires him. There the parties hire him for 20*l.* per annum, which they must pay out of their funds. There is not the least sign of any equitable interest in him.

WILLIAMS, J.—I am of the same opinion. I think the claimants have, at all events, functions and emoluments for life, so as to give an equitable title to a certain quantity of the funds of the dean and chapter. There is no other enjoyment of the property, and I cannot see any equitable estate.

BYLES, J.—I quite agree. These seems to me to be no substantial difference between an officer of a corporation aggregate and of a man of property. I do not see anything to prevent the parties here from appointing these functionaries, and paying them out of real or personal property. It might be more convenient, and even if it could be done and was done, that they were paid out of real property, non constat the whole body had enough, and if they had, non constat the revenue of each of these functionaries comes out of so much of the property as is in the parish in question.

KEATING, J.—I am of the same opinion.

BRIDGEWATER (app.) v. DURANT (resp.)

Borough vote—Qualification—Lay clerk—Occupation as tenant—2 Will. 4. c. 45, s. 27.

*A lay clerk appointed to his office by a dean and chapter, and occupying a house assigned to him by them, above the value of 10*l.* a-year, the freehold of the house being in the dean and chapter, the said lay clerk not being bound to reside, and being able to perform the duties incident to his office without residing in the house, is not entitled to vote in respect of the said house, as having a legal or equitable interest therein.*

C. B.]

WHITE v. STEEL AND OTHERS.

C. B.

The question as to the nature of the holding in such a case is one of fact for the revising barrister.

Case.—At a court held before me, the barrister duly appointed to revise the list of voters for the borough of New Windsor, Robert Bridgewater claimed to have his name inserted in the list.

The claimant has occupied a house in the Lower Ward, within the borough, about fourteen years. He occupies as a lay clerk, to which office he was appointed by the dean and canons of Windsor seventeen years ago.

The freehold of the house is in the dean and canons; its value is above 10*l.* a-year. It is extra-parochial.

A certain number of houses are occupied by lay clerks. There are more lay clerks than houses, and the juniors receive 20*l.* a-year more salary till a house becomes vacant. The salary is then reduced by 20*l.* The lay clerk may then take the house, but is not obliged to reside. He can perform all his duties without residing in the house, but cannot let without permission of the dean and canons.

The claimant on his appointment took the oath of allegiance and some other oath. He believes he holds his office for life, or so long as he does his duties. He has never seen the statutes of the dean and canons. He has no doubt that there are such statutes, but he has no right of access to them, and he has made no attempt to see them or procure any evidence from them. He knows no book relating to his office but the cheque-book in which his name is entered, and which he sees once a month.

I held that these facts did not show a sufficient occupation either as owner or tenant, and refused to insert the claimant on the list of voters.

If the court should be of opinion that my decision is erroneous, the claimant's name is to be inserted in the list of voters for the borough of New Windsor and will stand.

Revising Barrister.

Macnamara for the app.—In this case the app. is a lay clerk under the dean and canons of Windsor, and he claims to vote under sect. 27 of 2 Will. 4, c. 45, in respect of his occupation of a house as tenant: (Hughes v. The Overseers of Chatham, 5 M. & G. 54.) The distinction drawn in that case was recognised and acted on in Dobson v. Jones, 5 M. & G. 112. It is not necessary to show the nature of the tenancy, all he has to do is to show that he occupies as tenant. [KEATING, J.—A tenancy at will would be enough.] Yes: Clarke v. The Overseers of Bury, 1 C. B., N. S., 23. Those cases show the distinction between occupation as owner or tenant. The other cases raised questions as to the tenancy being of an eleemosynary nature: (Heartley v. Banks, 5 C. B. N. S. 40; Heath v. Haynes, 3 C. B. 389.)

Griffiths contra. — The decision of the revising barrister was correct. The statutes of the dean and chapter were not brought before the revising barrister, so he was left in doubt as to the nature of the tenancy. It did not appear what a lay clerk is or what are his duties. If the statutes were before the court it would be seen that the claimant stands in the same position as the Military Knights of Windsor, who the court has held are not entitled to vote.

Macnamara in reply.—So far as the case is concerned there is no evidence that there are any statutes of the dean and chapter in existence.

Cur. adv. vult.

Nov. 22.—ERLE, C. J. now delivered the judgment of the court.—In this case the revising barrister states the facts which were proved relating to the occupation of a house by the claimant, and suggests other facts which were proved; and decided that he was not satisfied that the claimant, a lay clerk, occupied his house either as owner or tenant within the statute. Occupation, alone, of a house is not sufficient to qualify—that is, occupation as a member of a corporation aggregate, or as the receiver of charitable bounty (Heartley v. Banks, 5 C. B., N. S., 40); or for purposes connected with service to be performed (Dobson v. Jones, 5 M. & G. 112; Clarke v. The Overseers of Bury, 1 C. B., N. S., 23); or under the appointment from governors of a charity at their discretion: (Davis v. Waddington, 7 M. & G. 37.) In these cases the alleged holding has been held not to qualify. The question is one of fact, and it was for the revising barrister to draw his own conclusion from the premises before him. Upon the statement of the case we do not find any proof that the appointment of the lay clerk, together with the assignment of a house for his occupation, necessarily created any legal or equitable freehold interest in him. In this case, therefore, we see no reason why the decision of the revising barrister should be wrong; and his decision is confirmed.

Monday, Nov. 25.

WHITE v. STEEL AND OTHERS.

At a meeting of ratepayers it was proposed and agreed that a sum of money should be borrowed on the security of the rates for the purpose of purchasing land for a burial-ground. One of the ratepayers present demanded a poll, but his motion not being seconded it fell to the ground, and a rate was agreed to for paying off the loan. Application was then made to the Church Commissioners under sect. 26 of 3 Geo. 4, c. 72, and they confirmed the rate, and ordered the churchwardens to make and levy it. The defts. and others having refused to pay, recourse was had to the Ecclesiastical Court, when the defts. alleged that the rate was improperly made, inasmuch as a poll had been demanded and not granted. The learned judge of the Ecclesiastical Court ruled that he had no power to examine the validity of the order of the commissioners, whereupon the defts. moved for a prohibition to issue to restrain the Ecclesiastical Court from further proceeding in the matter:

Held, that, considering the extreme importance of the case, and the interests at stake, and the difficulty of construing these Acts of Parliament, the parties must declare in prohibition.

This was a rule calling on the plts, to show cause why a writ of prohibition should not issue against the Ecclesiastical Court to prohibit it from proceeding with a suit.

It appeared that in the parish of Plumstead the Home Secretary had ordered a churchyard to be closed, upon which it became necessary for the parishioners to consider what they should do to obtain a proper and sufficient burial-ground. A meeting of the parishioners was accordingly held, at which it was determined to have a burial board and a burial-ground, a part of which was to be consecrated and a part not, and an application was made to the Church Commissioners to authorise the purchase, but they replied that they had no power under the statutes relating to the subject to authorise the purchase of ground of which only a part was to be consecrated. Another meeting was then called, and in the notices it was stated.

C. B.]

SINGLETON v. WILLIAMSON.

[Ex.]

to be the intention to rescind the resolution of the former meeting, and to propose fresh resolutions. In consequence of this notice a large meeting of parishioners was held at the vestry, at which sixty-four ratepayers were present, and the resolutions of the former meeting were rescinded, and it was proposed and agreed to, that a sum of 1000*l.* should be borrowed on the security of the rates for the purpose of purchasing land for a burial-ground, to be duly consecrated, under the powers of the statute of 3 Geo. 4, c. 72, s. 26. A ratepayer demanded a poll, but not being seconded the motion fell to the ground, and a rate was agreed to for paying off the 1000*l.* by two instalments.

Application was then made to the Church Commissioners under the stat. 3 Geo. 4, c. 72, s. 26, and they confirmed the rate, and, under the powers given them, ordered the churchwardens to make and levy the rate. The rate was accordingly made, the money borrowed of the bank, and a piece of land purchased for the new burial-ground, and consecrated; and at the expiration of five months, when the rate was demanded and collected, certain persons objected to pay, and the churchwardens were driven to the Ecclesiastical Court to enforce payment of the rate. The usual libel and declaration setting forth the facts, and the names of the parties so refused, was filed, and to this these parties put forth a responsive allegation, which alleged that the rate was improperly made, inasmuch as a poll had been demanded, and not granted. To this there was a demurrer, the plts. contending that it was not competent to the court to consider what had been done previous to the order of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners; and that the order of the commissioners, duly made under the powers given them by the statute, and sealed by their seal, was binding, like a judgment, on the court. The judge of the Ecclesiastical Court was of opinion that that court had not power to examine the validity of the order of the commissioners; and the question raised by the present motion for a prohibition to issue to restrain the Ecclesiastical Court from further proceedings in this suit was, whether the learned judge was right or not in deciding that he could not examine whether the decision of the commissioners was right or not.

A rule having been obtained on a former day, Phillimore, Q.C. (F. M. White with him) now showed cause, and contended that it was not competent for the Ecclesiastical Court to consider any of the preliminary proceedings, and that the order of the commissioners must be taken to have been rightly made and was conclusive. The statutes 58 Geo. 3, c. 45, ss. 59, 60, giving power to borrow money on the credit of parishes, and to make a rate to pay the cost of increasing the accommodation of existing churches; and 59 Geo. 3, c. 134, ss. 23 and 24, requiring the assent of the major part of a vestry to such a motion, and two-thirds of the parishioners, were referred to. They also contended that the proper remedy of parties objecting to the rate was by mandamus, and that to grant the prohibition would extinguish the suit; that the rate was not a common law rate, and governed by the requirements to make it valid at common law, but that it was made under 3 Geo. 4, c. 72; and that the existence of a desire among the parishioners for a burying-ground was a sufficient foundation for the order of the commissioners, as that under this statute they had jurisdiction to make their order, and there were no means pointed out how that desire should be expressed. They cited Rex v. Inhabitants of Lambeth, 3 B. & Ad. 657.

A. Wills, in support of the rule, contended that the statute 3 Geo. 4, c. 72, did not apply to this case, as that statute applied to the enlarging of churches and giving additional church accommodation, and this rate was for obtaining an additional burying-ground; that the consent of the parishioners to the rate had not been obtained in the only legal way in which it could be obtained. A poll had been demanded and refused; it was therefore contended that the resolution of the meeting for making a rate was null and void, and the foundation of the jurisdiction of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners to make an order for the rate was gone, and that the order was therefore invalid; and that the responsive allegation which had been rejected by the judge of the Court of Arches was an answer to the suit. He cited Reg. v. Dursley, 5 A. & E. 10; Reg. v. Willim, 16 Q. B. 1; Blunt v. Harwood, 8 A. & E. 810; Burder v. Veley, 12 A. & E. 233; Richards v. Dyke, 3 Q. B. 256.

ERLE, C. J.—Having paid great attention to the arguments on both sides, and considering the extreme importance of the case and the interests at stake, not merely in this suit, but in a number of similar cases; and considering the difficulty in construing these Acts of Parliament, we think the matter ought to be put in a train in which the parties should have the power of taking the opinion of the proper tribunals; therefore the applicants had better declare in prohibition.

Judgment accordingly.

COURT OF EXCHEQUER.

Reported by F. BAILEY and H. LEIGH, Esqrs., Barristers-at-Law.

SINGLETON v. WILLIAMSON (see next case).

Distress damage feasant—First escape of cattle from defect of fences; afterwards, breaking down good fence into corn land—Who ultimately liable. The plt. occupied land adjoining a river, and on the other side the deft. occupied land which he was bound properly to fence, but from his neglect to fence it the plt.'s cattle escaped into the deft.'s close, and afterwards from that close, over a good and substantial fence, into an adjoining corn field of deft.'s. The deft. then distrained the plt.'s cattle in the corn field as damage feasant:

Held, in an action of trover by the plt., that he was entitled to recover; that the cattle having first escaped in consequence of the deft.'s neglect to fence the first field, he could not distrain the cattle when they escaped over the sound fence into the second, or corn field.

This was an action of trover and detain for cattle.

Pleas:—1. Not guilty. 2. That the cattle were not the plt.'s. 3. Non-detinet. 4. Justification by reason of distress damage feasant.

The plt. was the occupier of land called "Hail Moor," which in the year 1813 was awarded by certain inclosure commissioners to the plt. By this award the plt. was bound to erect and keep in repair a fence to the south of this land, which land was bounded on the north by the river Irt. The deft. occupied land bounded on the south by this river, so that the river divided the plt.'s land from the deft.'s. In the year 1815 the Inclosure Commissioners for the parish of Gosforth, where the deft.'s land is, awarded it by a sale thereof to the deft.'s wife's father, a Mr. Butler.

By the Act (4 Geo. 3) for inclosing the lands of the parish of Gosforth, the 13th section required the commissioners "to allot and set out by marks and bounds so much of the commons and waste grounds as shall seem necessary, and to sell the same, and the purchasers thereof and their heirs and assigns shall be liable to make and keep in repair such part of the ring or outer fences as shall be directed by the said commissioners." And the commissioners by their award required "fences to be erected and kept in repair east and south" of the lands so allotted to Mr. Butler, and which land was called Bridge-green. Butler had since died, and the deft. was now the owner of Bridge-green. On the north of Bridge-green the deft. has a piece of arable land which is bounded on the south by a fence in good repair. In June 1861 six or seven of the plt.'s beasts in Hail-moor crossed the river Irt, and got into the deft.'s land called Bridge-green, the fence being out of repair, and thence from Bridge-green, over the fence that was in good and perfect repair, into the deft.'s arable land, where they did damage. The deft. caused them to be distrained as damage feasant and impounded, for which this action was brought. The cause was tried at the last Carlisle summer assizes, before Wilde, B., who told the jury that it was the deft.'s duty to maintain a fence in Bridge-green along the margin of the river, and this in many places was shown to be level with the ground. If the jury believed the plt.'s cattle crossed the river into Bridge-green and thence into the corn field, it was immaterial whether the fence of the corn field or arable land was in repair or not. The jury returned a verdict for the plt. for 1*l.* 10*s.* 6*d.* A rule nisi having been obtained for a new trial on the ground of misdirection, first, in directing the jury that it was immaterial what was the state of the fences of the field, or whether the cattle were taken damage feasant; secondly, in discharging the jury from giving any verdict as to the second count,

Mellish, Q. C. and T. Jones showed cause against the rule.—Where cattle escape through the defect of one man's fences into that person's land, and thence into the land of another, doing damage, the owner of the cattle would be liable to an action, and he would have his remedy over against the party who neglected to keep good the defective fence: (Powell v. Salisbury, 2 Yo. & Jer. 391; Holbach v. Warner, Cro. Jac. 665.) The person who ought to have kept the fences, but did not, is liable for all the consequences. If therefore the land into which the plt.'s cattle escaped over the sound fence had not been the deft.'s, but another person's, the plt. would have been liable to that third person for the damage his cattle had done, and the deft. would have been again liable to the plt., because it was in consequence of his defective fence the cattle first escaped. It was the deft.'s own neglect that the cattle first got into Bridge-green, from his omission properly to fence against the river, and having reached Bridge-green through the deft.'s defective fence, the plt. is not liable to him for their subsequently getting into the deft.'s corn field over a good fence. It thus avoids a circuitry of action. Nor is it to be taken as certain that, if the cattle had not been permitted to escape into the first field, they would have gone over the good fence into the corn field at all; they may not have broken through a good fence in the first instance. But having once got out through a defective fence, there was then no stopping them, and the person whose first fence is defective, and by which they escaped, would be ultimately liable. The deft. was, in fact, as much bound to fence to keep his own cattle in his own field as to keep the plt.'s out. [BRAMWELL, B.—I do not understand the deft. will say that he is not bound to keep up a sufficient fence; what he says is, that there was a proper and substantial fence against the corn field into which the plt.'s cattle escaped and did the damage.]

Edward James, Q.C. (Kemplay with him) in support of the rule.—The learned judge's direction to the jury was erroneous; the deft.'s land was properly fenced, and it can make no real difference whether the fence was against the river in Bridge-green or a little further in—against the corn field; the cattle broke over a good substantial fence, and thus got into the corn field, where the damage was done of which he complains; probably for anything done by the cattle in Bridge-green he may have had no just ground of complaint. [POLLOCK, C. B.—On the contrary, if they had sustained any injury there he may have been liable.] There being a sound fence against the plt.'s cattle, and over which they broke into the deft.'s corn, the plt. is liable. [WILDE, B.—If one man's bullock, through a defective fence, gets into another's field, and stakes itself in breaking through a strong inner fence, could the owner of the bullock maintain an action for the injury to the bullock against the occupier of the first field by reason of his defective fence?] Possibly he might. [WILDE, B.—And the owner of the fence damaged against the owner of the beast for the injury to the fence?] Perhaps so; but the learned judge at the trial told the jury in effect that the condition of the second fence was immaterial. It is admitted the deft. was bound to fence as against his neighbour's field; that he did. Here was a perfectly good fence as against the plt.'s cattle, and the deft. is not to suffer because his fence was further in than may have been desired, or because there were not two fences.

POLLOCK, C. B.—I am of opinion that this rule should be discharged. It was a motion for a new trial on an alleged misdirection of my brother Wilde to the jury. When application was made for the rule it certainly appeared to me to be not only a case of hardship upon the deft., but one which was worthy of some consideration. After hearing the argument upon it, I have come to the conclusion that my brother Wilde was quite correct, and that it is in accordance with the whole policy of the law of England upon the subject. When any wrong is done or damage sustained, the law inquires when was the first wrong done, who was the cause of first setting it in motion, or what was the origin of the mischief? In this instance the owner of the close called Bridge-green was bound so to fence it as to prevent his neighbour's cattle from getting into it. This it appears he neglected to do; there was little or no fence at all there in some places; the consequence was, that the plt.'s cattle got into the close called Bridge-green, and thence on over a fence into the deft.'s corn field, where they were distrained by him as damage feasant. It was argued for the deft. that it was not a necessary consequence of their being on the corn land that their original escape was by the deft.'s default in fencing Bridge-green as against the river; but, if a man dig a pit in a highway, it is not a necessary consequence that a passenger should fall into the pit, but if he does, it is sufficient if the accident is the result of something that ought not to be done. I think the learned judge's summing-up was in this case quite correct.

BRAMWELL, B.—I am entirely of the same opinion. The deft. was bound to fence his own land as between himself and the plt. The deft. is as much obliged to fence his land to keep the plt.'s cattle in his (the plt.'s) own land as he is to keep his (the deft.'s) own cattle upon his own land. If any injury arises from his neglect, the party injured has a right to complain of the injury which is the necessary consequence of the omission to perform that duty. It is conceded that, according to the authorities, if the plt.'s cattle being by deft.'s default in his land, had escaped therefrom into the close of a third party and had there sustained an injury, the plt. could maintain an action against the deft. for damages in consequence of the injury, and on that ground, to avoid circuitry of action, the deft. should not be at liberty to impound the plt.'s cattle damage feasant, and then leave the plt. to a cross-action against him for the injury sustained by the impounding. The damages to be occasioned is the not unnatural consequence of the deft.'s own omission to fence the first close, called Bridge-green. No man should complain of another's act when it is the immediate result of his own negligence. Suppose the plt.'s bull escaped into the deft.'s first field from a neglect of the deft. to fence his land, and while in the first field, where he had escaped from the deft.'s neglect to fence, from some excitement or other he broke down a sound fence, and got over into a second close, where he would not otherwise have gone if he had not been induced to do so when in the first field; surely the deft. could not complain of it.

SINGLETON v. WILLIAMSON.

CHANNELL, B.—I am also of opinion that this rule should be discharged. We are asked to grant a new trial on the ground that the jury were misdirected; but I think the ruling of my brother Wilde was quite correct. Assuming in this case that the second or inner hedge, as it has been called, was a strong and sufficient one, the question is, whether the deft. can resist this action, it being clear that the cattle would not have escaped from the plt.'s land but for the defect of the deft.'s fence to his close Bridge-green. It was the deft.'s duty to keep good that fence, and but for his default the plt.'s cattle would not have escaped, and their doing so was the natural, if not the necessary, consequence of his omission, and therefore the deft. had no right to distrain them. I do not think it distinguishable from the case I put and compared it to during the argument—that when the deft. complains of the plt.'s cattle breaking into his land and then over an inner fence into his corn, the plt. may very well reply, "My cattle were in a pound, and you opened the gate from whence they escaped and did the damage complained of—you were the cause of it."

WILDE, B.—I am of the same opinion, that the rule should be discharged. I am not sorry that the question has been discussed, as it has proved to be one of some novelty; but I retain the same opinion now, after having heard the arguments, as I entertained at the trial. Ordinarily speaking, if cattle stray and damage is done by them, the owner is liable; but in this case it was the deft.'s neglect to repair his fence that was the cause of the cattle escaping in the first instance. The deft. was bound to fence the first field in order as much to keep the plt.'s cattle out of it as his own in; he did not do so, and the plt.'s cattle having got into the deft.'s close called Bridge-green, over a defective fence which it was the deft.'s duty to keep good, they escaped into another field of the deft., where the damage was done which was complained of. I do not think the plt. is liable for that damage, either according to common sense or the common principles of justice.

Rule discharged.

SINGLETON v. WILLIAMSON (see the previous case).

Distress damage feasant—Tender of amends after impounding too late—Detinue to recover the cattle after such tender.

Where cattle are distrained as damage feasant and impounded, and the owner after the impounding tenders amends—Such tender is too late to enable him to maintain detinue for the recovery of the cattle.

This was an action of detinue to recover cattle which had been distrained damage feasant and impounded; and after the impounding the plt. had tendered ample compensation for the damage the cattle had done, which deft. refused to accept.

The declaration stated that the deft. detained from the plt. the plt.'s cattle, that is to say, two other bullocks, whereby they were injured, and plt. was put to costs in and about endeavouring to procure a return of them, and the plt., under the last count, claims a return of the cattle therein mentioned, or their value, and 20*l.* for detention, and under the rest of the declaration he claims 50*l.*

Plea.—And for a fifth plea to the second count, deft. says that before and at the time of the alleged detention the deft. was lawfully possessed of closes of land situate in the parish of Gosforth, in the county of Cumberland, and because the said cattle were then wrongfully in the said closes doing damage there to the deft., and eating, and depasturing, and treading down the corn, grass, and herbage of the deft. there then growing, the deft. then seized and took the said cattle in the said closes, so doing damage as aforesaid, as a distress for the said damage, and led and drove the same out of the said closes, in which, &c., to a certain common pound, and there impounded the same, and kept the same impounded there, pursuant to the statute in such case made and provided, until the plt. paid the said costs to have the same released. as and for, and the same being a reasonable satisfaction for the said damage so done, as it was lawful for the deft. to do for the cause aforesaid, he, the deft., using no unnecessary force or violence, and doing no unnecessary damage on such occasion, which is the alleged detention and grievance in the said second count mentioned.

Replication.—And for a second replication to the fifth plea the plt. says, that, after deft. had so impounded the said cattle, the plt. was ready and willing, and then tendered and offered to pay to the deft. the sum of 1*l.* 2*s.* 4*d.*, which said sum of 1*l.* 2*s.* 4*d.* was a reasonable and sufficient satisfaction and amends for the damage done by the cattle, as in the fifth plea mentioned, and all that the deft. was entitled to detain the said cattle for, and all things were done and happened to make the said tender a good tender, and to entitle the plt. to sue deft. for the subsequent detention hereinafter mentioned. And the plt. says that the deft. would not accept the said sum of 1*l.* 2*s.* 4*d.* when so tendered as aforesaid, but afterwards wrongfully detained the said cattle from the plt., which is the detainer complained of,

Demurrer thereto and joinder in demurrer.

Edward James, Q.C., in support of the demurrer, contended that a tender after impounding, when goods are in custodia legis, comes too late, and is not the subject of an action of detinue. The tender is a nullity, because it comes too late after the cattle have been impounded; the owner may get them back by replevin, when the opponent would obtain a bond as a security, and he should have adopted the remedy the law has provided by suing out a replevin. Pilkington v. Hastings, Cro. Eliz. 813, shows that a tender after impounding is too late. The law is clearly stated by Lord Coke in the Six Carpenters case, 8 Co. Rep. 147, that tender upon the land before the distress makes the distress tortious; tender after the distress and before the impounding makes the detainer and not the taking wrongful; tender after the impounding makes neither the one nor the other wrongful, for then it comes too late, because then the cause is put to the trial of the law to be there determined. But after the law has determined it, and the avowant has return irreplevisable, yet if the plt. makes him a sufficient tender he may have an action of detinue for the detainer after, or he may, on satisfaction made in court, have a writ for the redelivery of his goods. In Gulliver v. Cousens, 1 C. B. 788, where cattle were distrained as damage feasant, the owner paid under protest an excessive sum demanded, and then brought an action for money had and received to recover it back: it was held the action would not lie without a tender of sufficient amends. Tindal, C. J. said: "When the plt. found he was too late to make a tender, so as to entitle himself to replevy, his proper course was to make a tender of sufficient amends to cover the damage sustained; and in the event of the tenant refusing to accept the sum tendered and deliver up the sheep, he should have brought detinue [the reporter adds, i. e., upon a tender before the impounding], for they were held by the deft. merely as a pledge." Maule, J. there also adds: "If a sufficient tender had been made before the impounding, the deft. would have been bound to restore them, otherwise not." He also referred to Thomas v. Harris, 1 Man. & Gr. 693;

GRUBB v. THE INCLOSURE COMMISSIONERS OF ENGLAND AND WALES.

[Ex. Ch.]

to the C. L. P. A. 1852, and the commissioners' report upon such proceedings before the Act was passed.

Mellish, Q.C. (T. Jones with him), for plt., was then called upon by the court.—He contended that on a tender after impounding detinue may be maintained, though the tender is too late for replevin. That the reporter's note in Gulliver v. Cousens, 1 C. B. 796, is a mistake for the following reasons: first, because it appears from the report, 14 L. J. 215, C. P., that the cattle had been impounded before the tender; and secondly, because from Evans v. Elliott, 5 Ad. & Ell. 142, it is quite clear that a tender made after the taking, and before the impounding, is not too late for replevin. That the expression used in the judgment in Glynn v. Thomas, 25 L. J. 128, Ex., line 22–23, must have been taken incautiously from the reporter's note in Gulliver v. Cousens. That Lowring v. Warburton, 28 L. J. 31, Q. B., shows that a special count for detaining will lie, and there is no reason why detinue should not. That the law allows a distress as the mode of obtaining compensation, and if the party is not bound to accept the compensation he may hold on forever, unless plt. replevies, and after having necessarily failed in the action of replevin makes a tender, and thereby entitles himself to maintain detinue according to what is said in the Six Carpenters' case. That the law abhors unnecessary litigation, and may safely hold that an action of replevin is not a necessary preliminary to a tender. It has been held that no other action except detinue could be maintained; but there is no case in which it has been held detinue will not lie; the proceedings in replevin do not ascertain the damage, and the sheriff who detains for the distrainer only acts for him, and if the owner of the cattle is ready and willing, and offers, after the impounding, amends for the damage, why is he not to be at liberty to do so and have his cattle returned?

James, in reply, referred to Glynn v. Thomas, 11 Ex. 870; Ellis v. Taylor, 8 M. & W. 415; and Ladd v. Thomas, 12 A. & E. 128. No doubt there are difficulties; but the law is so. After impounding, the deft. does not detain, and has not the possession.

POLLOCK, C.B.—I am of opinion that the deft. is entitled to our judgment upon this demurrer. The books and authorities upon the subject have existed for so long a period that we are not now at liberty to overrule them. The law appears to be, that a tender of amends for damage done by cattle distrained damage feasant after they have been impounded, is too late, because they are then in the custody of law, and not of the deft., so that a tender after impounding may be as ineffective as it would in any other case be after action brought. The plt. therefore cannot maintain detinue.

MARTIN, B.—It seems very strange that, when a person's cattle have been distrained as damage feasant and impounded, the owner of the cattle should not be allowed to tender to the distrainer full compensation and amends for such damage, and get back his cattle. Oftentimes, perhaps, no real damage has been sustained, and yet the owner, after impounding, cannot get back his property without proceedings in replevin. The law may be so, and it may be a very absurd law; but it appears to be the law, and we are bound by it.

CHANNELL, B.—I also think our judgment must be for the deft. The authorities are so strong that we cannot get over them, and the court must abide by them. I was struck at first with the dicta of Tindal, C.J. in Gulliver v. Cousens, but the observations to which I refer were not at all necessary for the decision of the case then before the court.

WILDE, B.—I am of the same opinion. The law is, that a tender of amends, after impounding cattle distrained damage feasant, is too late. If so, the owner cannot maintain an action of detinue against the distrainer to recover the cattle, the same being then not in the possession of the deft., but in the custody of the law. We cannot alter the law as so long existing, and decide in favour of the replication, without overruling that law. Whatever practical inconvenience may arise from it we cannot disturb it. Judgment for deft.

ERROR FROM THE COMMON BENCH.

Friday, Nov. 29.

GRUBB v. THE INCLOSURE COMMISSIONERS OF ENGLAND AND WALES.

Inclosure Acts, 8 & 9 Vict. c. 118, and 11 & 12 Vict. c. 99—Provisional order—Power of commissioners to set out private roads over allotted lands.

A provisional order, made under the Inclosure Acts, ordered certain land to be allotted to the plt. in lieu of his right in the lands to be inclosed, but the order did not expressly exempt such allotment from having a private road made over it:

Held, that the commissioners had power to order the valuer to set out a private road over such land.

This was a rule to set aside a writ of prohibition issued out of the Petty Bag-office, prohibiting the Inclosure Commissioners from confirming an award about to be made by them in the matter of a certain inclosure. From the affidavits it appeared that an application had been made to the Inclosure Commissioners by Lord Carrington and the plt. Mr. Grubb to sanction the inclosure of certain lands of the manor of Hughenden, in the county of Buckingham, and the usual proceedings required by the Inclosure Acts having been made, the said commissioners, on the 5th June 1856, issued their provisional order, by which they declared the following, amongst others, to be the terms and conditions upon which they were of opinion that the proposed inclosure should be made; that is to say, "that Piggott's-common and part of Spring-coppice, High-coppice, North Dean Bottom, Willow-coppice, Drift-way, together with all wood and underwood now growing on such tracts proposed to be inclosed, except Naphill-common, Greenhill and the common fields, be allotted to Edward Grubb, Esq. in lieu of his right and interest in the lands to be inclosed." "That Chappell-hill, Bryants-bottom, Denner-hill-coppice, bottom of Widdenton-hill and Denner-hill-common, containing together 99a. 1r. 8p., be allotted as follows; that is to say, that an allotment equal in value to one-seventh part thereof, after deducting the allotment of two acres for the labouring poor, and the allotments (if any) for defraying the expenses of the inclosure, be made to the Right Hon. Benjamin Disraeli, in lieu of his right and interest in the soil of the said tracts, and in all substrata under the same, and that the residue of the said tracts be allotted among the commoners in proportion to their respective rights;" and "that the residue of the said Naphill-common and Greenhill be allotted among the parties entitled to rights of common or pasturage thereon." The inclosure was sanctioned and directed to be proceeded with, and a valuer was appointed; and on the 31st March 1859 he made his report to the Inclosure Commissioners, and at a meeting held by the assistant-commissioner on the 30th Nov. 1859, for the purpose of hearing objections to the valuer's report, one Roger Williams, to whom lands were to be allotted according to the terms of the provisional order, applied to have a private carriage-road set out for him under the provisions of sect. 68 of 8 & 9 Vict. c. 118, over Piggott's-common, being part of the land to be allotted to Mr. Grubb, when Mr. Grubb objected thereto, and to the right and jurisdiction of the said Inclosure Commissioners to set out the same. His objection was overruled by the commissioners, on the ground that the lands to be allotted to Mr. Grubb, according to the terms of the provisional order, were lands still subject to be inclosed within the meaning of the Inclosure Act, and that there was nothing to take them out of the jurisdiction of the valuer, or to preclude him from dealing with them in the course of such inclosure in the same manner as other allotments; and being of opinion that Mr. Williams' application was reasonable and well founded, reported accordingly to the commissioners, who directed the valuer to set out such private road over Piggott's common, and it having been accordingly staked out, Mr. Grubb caused the writ of prohibition to be issued.

Judgment for the defts., and error thereon.

Couch for the plt. in error (the plt. below).

F. M. White contra.

WIGHTMAN, J.—In this case the question is, as to the effect of the provisional order. For the plt. it is contended that it conveys to him an indefeasible right to the lands allotted to him by such order, such land to be free and clear of all charges and incumbrances, and particularly those of roads and ways. In the provisional order no mention is made as to the making of roads, so that there is nothing which excludes the commissioner or the valuer from setting out private roads. By the Inclosure Acts it is provided that the valuer is to set out ways after the issuing of the provisional order, and before the final allotment of the lands to be inclosed. Sect. 68 of the General Inclosure Act authorises the valuer to set out roads through the lands to be inclosed, and therefore the provisional order must be taken to be made subject to the right of the valuer to set out private roads; and upon this view we ground our decision that the judgment of the court below should be affirmed.

Judgment affirmed.

REG. v. JOHN BAIN.

Indictment for felony—Breaking and entering a shop with intent—Attempt to commit a felony.

On an indictment under the 24 & 25 Vict. c. 96, s. 57, for feloniously breaking and entering a shop with intent to commit a felony:

Held, that a prisoner might be found guilty of misdemeanor in attempting to commit that felony.

Case for the opinion of the Court of Criminal Appeal by the recorder of Manchester.

At a court of quarter sessions of the peace holden in and for the city of Manchester, in the county of Lancaster, on the 13th Dec. 1861, John Bain was tried before me on an indictment for having on the 5th Dec. feloniously broken and entered a certain shop with intent to commit felony, to wit, feloniously to steal certain moneys, goods and chattels therein.

At the trial it appeared the prisoner was disturbed before he had completed the offence with which he was charged. He was seen on the roof of the shop he was indicted for breaking and entering, and taken coming off the roof. On examining the roof it was found that a large hole, upwards of two feet square, had been broken in it, but there was no evidence at all of his having in any way entered the building.

Upon this I told the jury that the prisoner was entitled to his acquittal on the charge of felony, but that if they were of opinion that he broke the roof with intent to enter the shop and steal the goods, they might find him guilty of a misdemeanor in attempting to commit that felony.

The jury found him guilty of the misdemeanor of attempting to commit a felony.

The question for the opinion of the Court of Criminal Appeal is whether the prisoner could be convicted of a misdemeanor on this indictment, which is for a felony created by the 24 & 25 Vict. c. 96, s. 57. The prisoner was on bail before the trial, and is now on bail to appear and receive sentence when called on.

R. B. ARMSTRONG, Recorder of Manchester.

REGISTRATION APPEAL.

Nov. 11 and Dec. 7.

COLLIER (app.) v. KING (resp.)

Election law—County vote—Qualification—

Dissenting minister.

The app., who was minister of a sect called Particular Baptists, claimed to vote in respect of a copyhold house and garden of which he was occupier. The property in respect of which he claimed was vested in trustees, upon trust that the trustees "do and shall from time to time, and at all times for ever hereafter, permit and suffer the said dwelling-house and premises to be held, used and occupied by the minister of the congregation, &c., as and for his place of abode." The deed contained no direction by whom the minister was to be appointed, nor any power for his removal; but in fact he was appointed by a "call" or invitation by letter, signed by three deacons, asking him to become their minister. The evidence as to the appointment being for life consisted in his own statement that he so considered it, and the evidence of one of the deacons who had been a member of the congregation thirty-five years, that the appointment was in the usual mode, and in his opinion was for life.

The revising barrister on these facts decided that it was not proved that the appointment was for life, and expunged the name of claimant from the register:

Held, that though the revising barrister might have inferred from the facts that the appointment was for life, still it was not a necessary inference, and therefore the court would not say he was wrong in expunging the name from the register.

This was an appeal from the decision of the revising barrister, at his court for revising the list of voters for the parish of Downton, in the southern division of the county of Wilts.

CASE.

At a court held at Downton, before the barrister-at-law, duly appointed to revise the list of voters in the parish of Downton, Frederick King objected to the name of John Thomas Collier being retained in the list of voters for the said parish.

The facts of the case are as follows:—John Thomas Collier is the minister of a Dissenting congregation called Particular Baptists, at Downton aforesaid, and COLLIER v. KING.

[C. B.]

stood in the register of South Wilts as follows:—
“Collier, John Thomas Downton (copyhold house and garden), South-lane, himself occupier.”

By deed, dated the 25th Sept. 1813, the property in respect of which he claims to be registered appears to be vested in trustees upon certain trusts, and among others, “that the trustees, and the survivors and survivor of them, and the heirs of such survivors, or such new and other trustees as aforesaid, do and shall, from time to time, and at all times for ever hereafter, permit and suffer the said dwelling-house and premises thereto belonging to be held, used and occupied by the minister of the said congregation for the time being, as and for his place of abode and residence.

There is no direction in the deed as to the mode by which the minister should be appointed, nor any power given for his removal. It appeared that in the year 1847 the said John Thomas Collier received a letter from three deacons of the congregation, of which the following is a copy:—

“From the two visits you have paid us in the capacity of a supply, from the intercourse we have had with you, and from the enjoyment and profit we have experienced under your ministry, we have acquired a conviction of your adaptation and qualification ‘to take the oversight of us in the Lord;’ in accordance with which we herewith cordially and unanimously invite you to become our pastor. But in doing so we leave it entirely to your own judgment whether you will, without any further knowledge of us, at once accede to the invitation, or whether you would prefer to come amongst us for three months longer on probation before you decide, in order that you and we may enjoy the satisfaction of a more marked intimation of the Divine will.

“Aware of the solemnity of the step we are taking, and of the sacredness of the relation subsisting between a pastor and a people, we would earnestly pray that, should that relation subsist between yourself and us, it may be richly realized beneath the most expressive tokens of the Divine benediction. Most devoutly commending you to the wisdom and blessing of the Great Head of the Church,

(Signed) “JOHN ANDREWS,
“JAMES MITCHELL,

In accordance with the request contained in the said letter, the said John Thomas Collier undertook the duties of minister to the said congregation for a probationary period of three months. At the expiration of that time he received, verbally, a second call, in general terms, to become the minister of the congregation, which he accordingly did, and still remains so, and in such capacity has ever since occupied the premises in respect of which he now stands on the register, and which are of the sufficient value to qualify him to vote if otherwise entitled.

The proof of his appointment for life consisted of his own statement, that he so considered it, and the evidence of one of the deacons, who had been a member of the congregation for thirty-five years, that the appointment was made in the usual mode, and, in his opinion, was for life. It was objected that the said John Thomas Collier, under the circumstances above mentioned, is not legally appointed for life, and does not take such an interest by virtue of the said office as would qualify him to be retained on the register.

On the other side it was maintained that, from the above facts, it was shown that such appointment constitutes a freehold interest sufficient to establish the said John Thomas Collier's right to be so retained.

I was of opinion that the right of the said John Thomas Collier to be retained on the register was not established, and accordingly expunged his name.—
ohn Aldridge.

If the court should be of opinion that I was wrong in this decision, the name should be restored.

J. A., Revising Barrister.

Welsby for the app.—Here the claimant asserts his qualification for the franchise in respect of an equitable freehold, he being a minister of a sect called “Particular Baptists.” I am unable to distinguish this case from that of Burton, app., v. Brooks, resp., 11 C. B. 41. It seems to come back to the question whether the appointment of the minister is one to an office for life. The claimant himself and one of those who appointed him say that they believed the office to be an office for life. It is found in the case that the deed contains no power of removal. The case is within the authority of Burton v. Brooks, and the court will therefore hold that the claimant had a right to the franchise.

J. D. Coleridge contra.—When looked at closely, the case of Burton v. Brooks will be found to be an authority adverse to this claim. It was a question of fact for the revising barrister to determine on the evidence before him; and he rightly rejected the claim. Besides this, the appointment to such an office must be in writing to satisfy the 3rd section of the Statute of Frauds.

Welsby in reply.—The case shows that the revising barrister thought he was deciding a question of law: (Rex v. Jotham, 3 T. R.) Cur. adv. vult.

Dec. 7.—ERLE, C.J. now delivered judgment.—In this case the app. claimed to be qualified by an equitable freehold estate, which was vested in the trustees for the minister of the time being of a congregation at Downton. The case sets forth a letter signed by three deacons, requesting the app. to become the minister after three months' probation; the three months' probation and call, in general terms, to become minister; and the continuance in that capacity from 1847. The further evidence in support of the duration of the appointment was the statement of himself and one of the deacons who had known the usage for thirty-five years, that they considered it to be for life. The revising barrister decided that, from these facts, he could not draw the conclusion that the appointment was for life; and we are to say whether that decision is wrong in point of law. The facts found do not necessarily prove that this general appointment operated as an appointment for life. The barrister had, by law, the duty of stating what inference he drew from the premises before him; and although we think he might have inferred that the appointment was for life, it is not a necessary inference, and we cannot say that he was wrong in declining to draw that inference. In Burton v. Brooks, 11 C. B. 46, the revising barrister did infer that the appointment was for life, and the court affirmed his decision, and Maule, J. approved of it. Still, it must be noted that there was additional evidence in that case, for the deed creating the trust expresses it to be for the life of the minister therein named; so that the existing appointment at the time of the deed was clearly for life, and it might well be presumed the subsequent appointment would be for life if no change was indicated. In the Attorney-General v. Pearson, 3 Mer., Lord Eldon directs an inquiry to be made by the master to ascertain whether the general appointment of a dissenting minister there operated as an appointment for life. This direction is more fully stated at the conclusion of this judgment. In Porter v. Clarke, 3 Sym. 323, the appointment was general, and the V. C. refused to infer that it was for life, but he relied much on the fact that there was no house and no endowment for the minister, and nothing beyond voluntary contributions. Although the question referred to us is, strictly speaking, a question of fact, it probably is sent to us in order that some principle may be suggested for future guidance. We would add, that the question is the same as that which would arise in equity, if the trustees brought ejectment against the minister without any legal cause for removal, and the minister applied for an injunction to stay the action. Lord Eldon, for his guidance on that point, in the Attorney-General v. Pearson, above cited, directed the master to inquire as to the usage in respect of the duration of the office, and particularly whether any agreement or understanding was entered into between the minister and the persons for the time being members of the congregation attending the meeting-house and subscribing to its support, touching the duration of the ministry of the minister. According to the result of such inquiry upon the duration of the appointment would be the decision of the revising barrister for or against the qualification. This decision is affirmed.

COOPER (app.) v. HANNAH SIMMONS, Executrix, &c.

Master and apprentice—Infant—Master's death—Apprentice continuing his service with executrix.

An apprentice, who was an infant, put himself apprentice for seven years, as well of his own free will and accord, as with the consent of his father, to T. Simmons, of Wolverhampton, lock-maker, his executors and administrators, such executors or administrators carrying on the said trade or business, and in the town of Wolverhampton; the master died, and his widow and executrix continued the business in the same place. During the apprenticeship the apprentice remained with the executrix in the business for ten months after his master's death, and then, obtaining more wages, being still an infant, went elsewhere. He was summoned before the justices for absenting himself from service under the indenture of apprenticeship, and convicted: Held, upon appeal, that he was liable to serve the executrix under the contract, and the conviction of justices was affirmed, notwithstanding the apprentice was advised by his attorney, and believed, he was not bound to continue in the service after his master's death.

This was an appeal against the conviction of justices, pursuant to the provisions of the 20 & 21 Vict. c. 43, and the following are the facts for the opinion of the court as stated in the following case:—

At a petty sessions of the peace holden in and for the borough of Wolverhampton, on the 19th Sept. 1861, before us, two of her Majesty's justices of the peace in and for the said borough, John Cooper (the above-named app.) was charged upon the complaint of Hannah Simmons (the above-named resp.) as the sole executrix and widow of Thomas Simmons deceased; for that he, the said John Cooper, was bound apprentice to him, the said Thomas Simmons, his executors and administrators, by an indenture bearing date the 5th April 1859, for a certain term which was then existing and unexpired (and upon whose binding no premium was paid or contracted to be paid), and had in the service of his apprenticeship been guilty of misdemeanors, miscarriages and ill-behaviour towards his said mistress, and particularly on the 15th day of April 1861 did, without lawful cause, absent himself from the service of his said mistress, and against her consent. And the said parties being present, the said charge was duly heard before us, and upon such hearing we adjudged the said John Cooper to be guilty of the said offence, and that he should for such offence be imprisoned in the house of correction at Stafford, there to remain and to be held to hard labour for the space of fourteen days.

[MAG. CAS.]

And whereas, the said John Cooper hath, pursuant to the provisions of the before-mentioned statute, given a notice and required us to state and sign a case setting forth the facts and grounds of our determination upon the hearing of the said complaint, in order that he might take the opinion of the said Court of Ex. thereon, and he hath entered into a recognisance with a sufficient surety to prosecute such appeal.

Now we, the said justices, pursuant to such notice and statute as aforesaid, do hereby state and sign such case as aforesaid as follows:—

At the hearing of the said complaint the following indenture was proved:

"This indenture witnesseth that John Cooper the younger, son of John Cooper the elder, of Wolverhampton in the county of Stafford, tailor, as well of his own free will and accord as with the consent of his said father, testified by his being a party to and executing these presents, doth put himself apprentice to Thomas Simmons, of Wolverhampton aforesaid, rim and mortice lock maker, his executors and administrators, such executors or administrators carrying on the same trade or business and in the town of Wolverhampton aforesaid, to learn his art, and with him and them after the manner of an apprentice to serve from the 23rd day of April inst., until the full end and term of seven years thence next following, to be fully complete and ended. During which term the said apprentice his master faithfully shall serve, his secrets keep, his lawful commands everywhere gladly do, he shall do no damage to his said master, nor see it to be done of others, but to his power shall tell or forthwith give warning to his said master of the same. He shall not waste the goods of his said master, nor lend them unlawfully to any. He shall not play at card or dice tables, or any other unlawful games whereby his said master may have any loss with his own goods, or others, during the said term, without licence of his said master. He shall neither buy nor sell. He shall not haunt taverns or playhouses, nor absent himself from his said master's service day or night unlawfully. But in all things as a faithful apprentice he shall behave himself toward his said master and all his during the said term. And the said Thos. Simmons, for and in consideration of the due and faithful service of his said apprentice so as aforesaid to be done and performed, his said apprentice in the art of a rim and mortice lock maker, which he uses, by the best means that he can, shall teach and instruct, or cause to be taught and instructed during the said term. And also shall and will pay, or cause to be paid, unto the said apprentice, or his said father, the sum of 4s. a week from the 23rd day of April inst. until the 23rd day of April 1860, the sum of 5s. a week for the first year thereafter, a sum of 6s. a week for the second year thereafter, the sum of 7s. a week for the third year thereafter, the sum of 8s. a week for the fourth year thereafter, the sum of 9s. a week for the fifth year thereafter, and the sum of 10s. a week for the sixth year thereafter, being the last year of the said term. And the said John Cooper the elder, for himself, his executors and administrators, covenants with the said Thos. Simmons, his executors and administrators, that the said John Cooper the elder, his executors or administrators, will at his or their own expense find his said son during the said term sufficient meat, drink, lodging, wearing apparel, medicine, and all necessaries, and exempt the said Thomas Simmons therefrom. And for the true performance of all and every the said covenants and agreements either of the said parties bindeth himself unto the other by these presents. In witness whereof the parties above named to these indentures interchangeably have put their hands and seals the 23rd day of April, and in the twenty-second year of the reign of our Sovereign Lady Victoria, by the grace of God, of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and "Signed, sealed and delivered by the above-named John Cooper the younger, and Thos. Simmons, in the presence of Robert R. Arnold, clerk to Mr. Foster Gough, solicitor, Wolverhampton.

"Signed, sealed and delivered by the above-named John Cooper the elder, in the presence of Chas. Moody, clerk to the said F. Gough."

At the hearing of the said complaint it was proved on the part of the complainant that the said app. had served under the said indenture of apprenticeship the said Thomas Simmons, her husband, during which time she had taken an active part in the management of the business; that the husband died on the 24th June 1860, having by his will bequeathed his business and personal estate to the resp., and appointed her executrix of his will; that she had continued to carry on the business and take an active part therein, and employed competent workmen, who taught and instructed the apprentices, and the app. had continued to serve her as such executrix under the said indenture of apprenticeship for a period of nearly ten months, namely, until the 15th April 1861, when he ran away and absented himself from her service, immediately upon which she obtained a warrant for his apprehension. The constable in whose hands the warrant was placed was not able to find him, but he voluntarily surrendered himself on the 19th Sept. 1861, having in the interim been working for another master of the like trade at increased wages to those mentioned in the apprenticeship indenture. The resp. was and is still carrying on the same trade as her late husband, and employs competent workmen, who, as well as the resp., are able and willing to teach and instruct the app. in his trade. It was admitted that at the date of the said apprenticeship indenture the app. was an infant, and also was an infant on the 19th Sept. 1861.

Upon the above state of facts the attorney for the resp. contended that the binding to the executors and administrators was usual in such cases, and inasmuch as the executrix was carrying on the same trade as her late husband in Wolverhampton, and was liable, on the husband's covenant, to pay app.'s wages, and to teach and instruct, or cause him to be taught and instructed, and the app. had for his own good served the executrix of his own free will and accord for a period of ten months, the app. was bound to serve the executrix; and that the app.'s father was equally liable on his covenant that he should serve not only the husband but his executrix.

On the part of the app. it was contended by his attorney that the app. was not bound to serve the executrix, the contract for service being a personal one only with the husband to the executrix, being under no personal liability to adopt or to continue to comply with the testator's covenants; and that the app., being an infant, was not competent to bind himself, except by an ordinary indenture of apprenticeship, and that the binding to the executrix was unusual, and as they incurred no liability (except in the representative capacity), it was manifestly for his benefit, and was, therefore, so far as the binding to the executors was concerned, void and of no effect; and he cited Reg. v. Lord, 17 L. J. 181, 182, M. C. He also stated that he, as the attorney for the app., had advised that the apprenticeship was at end on the death of the husband, and that the app., acting on the bona fide belief that the opinion of his attorney was correct, had absented himself from his service, but no evidence was adduced before us, or required by the resp., as to when the advice was given.

In support of his case he quoted Reg. on the prose- cution of Mappin and another v. Youle, 4 L. T. Rep. N. S. 299, Ex.

After a careful consideration of the whole case, we were of opinion that the resp. and her workmen were quite as capable of instructing the app. as the husband was during his lifetime, and that the app. had not left his service for want of proper instruction, but with a view only to get better wages elsewhere. We are also of opinion that the app. is bound to serve the executrix resp. in this case under the above indenture of apprenticeship until the expiration of his term, so long as she manages and carries on the business in the manner proved before us; and with respect to the plea that the app. had been advised by his attorney that the apprenticeship was at an end, and supposing such advice to have been given before absenting himself from his service, he must abide the consequences thereof, as we think it would be no excuse for his doing an illegal act, and having been advised to do it, thereby oust the jurisdiction of justices to deal with the case in a summary manner; besides which we see great danger in allowing defences of this description being set up, as advocates, in their zeal to obtain an acquittal of their clients, may be encouraged to advise the committal of an offence which may turn out to be a criminal one.

And hereupon the judgment of her Majesty's Court of Exchequer of Pleas is respectfully required, whether we were correct in point of law in our determination as aforesaid, or as to what should be done in the premises. Given under our hands the 26th Oct. 1861.

CHARLES CLARK (Mayor).

EDWARD PERRY.

Gray for the app.—The apprentice being an infant, this indenture of apprenticeship is not binding upon him, nor is it any longer in force. It was simply a personal trust, and the master having died, the apprenticeship continued no longer. There is no agreement by the master's executors to teach the apprentice the trade of the master; they are not bound to teach the apprentice the master's trade; they may not have been capable of doing so, nor was the apprentice bound to serve beyond his master's life. There is no covenant on the part of the executors of the deceased to teach: (see Burn's Justice, title "Apprentice," sect. 7.) In Bacon's Abr. "Master and Servant," E. it is said: "The placing out an apprentice to a particular master arises from the good opinion of the party to whom he is so committed, that he will not only instruct him in his trade or calling, but will also be careful of his health and safety, and therefore the law has made it such a personal trust that the master cannot assign or transfer it over; the master must also have the apprentice under his own care and inspection." Here the apprentice is only an infant; if he had been of age the case may have been altered. In the city of London there is a particular custom for assigning the apprentice to another. The executors of a testator are in one sense similar to that of assignees; but the principle to be gathered from all the authorities would appear to be that the relations and friends of the apprentice shall select his own master. Baxter v. Burfield, 2 Strange, 1266, was referred to; also the 32 Geo. 3, c. 57, which would tend to show that such a contract did not bind executors. [MARTIN, B.—Here the party expressly agrees to serve the executors.] Yes; but then it must be remembered that he is an infant. Rex v. Guildford, 2 Chitty's Rep. 284; Rex v. Lord, 12 Q. B. 757, were also cited. There is no covenant binding the executors to teach, and the infant may be left to his remedy against the assets of his late master, and the justices could not act against the executors of the deceased master; there must be some person who is bound to teach, instruct, &c., &c., but the executors are not so bound. It is of the very essence of such a contract that there is a person competent, and does

[Ex.]

COOPER v. HANNAH SIMMONS.

[Ex.]

contract to instruct. Here the indenture of apprenticeship became void at the death of the master. [WILDE, B.—Why is this not a covenant for the benefit of the infant?] It does not say the infant shall be taught by the executors. Secondly, the apprentice bonâ fide believed, and was advised by his legal adviser, that he was not liable to serve the executrix, his master's widow; this is stated in the case, and on that ground he ought not to have been convicted for this alleged offence: (Mappin v. Youle, 30 L. J. 234, Ex.)

Hayes, Serjt., for Mrs. Simmons, the resp.—This is a contract which is valid in law, binding on the apprentice, although he be an infant, and it is such a contract as, when it comes to be considered, is really beneficial to him. It is of importance to him that his term of apprenticeship should be continued and finished where it began. The widow, the executrix, took a very active part in the business of her husband during his lifetime, and is quite as capable of teaching the business with the assistance she has in it as her husband could have been. [WILDE, B.—And it must be remembered that the most valuable part of an apprentice's time and services is towards the end of his apprenticeship, when he knows his work and duties. The earlier part is probably of more work and labour to the master when he has to be continuously instructing the apprentice.] Certainly; and the case finds he has gone away and obtained more wages. By Baxter v. Burfield, 2 Strange, 1266, it would seem that if there had been such conditions in the indenture as these they would have been valid. It is not denied but that the apprentice, with his own consent and that of his friends, may have been transferred, or an apprentice may invalidate the indenture when he becomes of age, perhaps leaving the several other parties to their respective remedies over; but here he continued to serve the executrix for ten months after her husband's death, and then left because he was so well taught that he could go elsewhere and get higher wages for his work. He referred to R. v. East Bridgeford, 2 Strange, 1115, Cro. Cas.; Madden v. White, 2 T. R. 161; R. v. Great Wigston, 3 B. & C. 484. Secondly, the justices find the absenting by the apprentice was without lawful excuse, which takes it out of the principle in Wood v. Ryder, 21 L. J. 1, M. C. If such an excuse as that were to prevail, there would be scarcely ever any conviction.

Gray in reply.—It is ill behaviour in an apprentice in absenting himself, as it is said, without having any lawful excuse for doing so; that justifies magistrates in convicting. But here the apprentice believed, and was advised by his solicitor, that, after his master's death, he was no longer bound to serve or remain with the executrix. It is a mere construction of the terms of a special contract, not that of law which it is supposed every one is bound to know. The indenture must be manifestly for the infant's benefit when he enters into the contract, or it will not bind him. Here it is not so; the executors could not be compelled to teach, and the only remedy may be to sue for possible damages.

POLLOCK, C.B.—This case comes before us under a recent statute (the 20 & 21 Vict. c. 43) for us to say, whether we think certain justices were correct in point of law in the decision they had come to upon the facts stated in the case—an appeal, in fact, against their conviction of an apprentice for absenting himself from his service under an indenture of apprenticeship. The apprentice, who is the app., was bound as an apprentice to the husband of the resp. He served his master as such apprentice until the master died, and after his death his widow and executrix continued the business, and the app. continued to serve on with her some ten months afterwards. He then left and obtained another place, where he was paid more wages than, according to the indenture of apprenticeship, he would have been entitled to if he had continued with the resp. It appeared that the executrix during her husband's lifetime attended a good deal to his business, and was quite competent to manage it then, and to continue it on after his decease, and the apprentice during the whole period up to the time when he ran away was properly taught and instructed according to the indenture of apprenticeship. The app. having left the resp.'s employ, he was summoned before the justices for absenting himself from her service, under the indenture of apprenticeship; the magistrates heard the facts of the case, found him guilty of that with which he was charged, and sentenced him to fourteen days' imprisonment, by way of punishment; from their decision he appealed, and required a case to be stated for the opinion of this court, whether that conviction is correct in point of law. When the apprentice was before the magistrates it seems he stated that he was advised by an attorney that he was not legally bound to serve the executrix, and believing it, he says, to be true, he sets up that also as an objection to the magistrates' decision. The first question is, whether the indenture of apprenticeship is binding; and I think it is. It states that the app. "doth put himself apprentice to Thomas Simmons, of Wolverhampton, aforesaid, rim and mortice lock maker, his executors and administrators, such executors or administrators carrying on the said trade or business, and in the town of Wolverhampton aforesaid." The executrix carries on the business, and in the town mentioned. Where executors are left out of an indenture altogether the case might be different. The next question is, whether the attorney's advice is any answer to the resp.'s complaint; and I think it is not. Several cases were put during the argument, and it may be that, under some circumstances, a mistake upon a question of fact might excuse the strict performance of a special contract; but a mistake as to the law is a different thing. Every one is supposed to know the law; he said he believed he was not bound to remain any longer under the indenture after the master's death, and his having the advice of an attorney is no answer to the application. It would be dangerous doctrine, indeed, if we were to hold that because the party charged believed and was advised by an attorney that he was not liable in respect of it, that such advice and belief would exempt him from all punishment in consequence. The question is, was the app. justified in what he did? I think he was not; and, assuming he thought he was right in leaving the executrix, having remained in her service ten months after the death of her husband, his master, that would be no justification; no doubt he thought he was right, but that is not sufficient. I think the magistrates were right in their decision in point of law, and that the apprentice is not free from the misconduct charged.

MARTIN, B.—I am of the same opinion. There are two objections taken to this conviction: the first was, that the indenture was not binding upon him, because he was an infant; and the second was, that there was no covenant in the indenture binding the executors to teach the apprentice. I think it is implied in the indenture, and that the covenant of the master is binding on the representative of the master. Generally speaking, an apprentice is bound to the master only, and in many cases this is the proper and necessary arrangement, as the business may be one which it would be impossible to have taught by an executor; that is, however, not so here, and it is not improbable such may have been in the contemplation of the parties when the indenture was entered into, and provision made for it to be continued in the same way and in the same town. The indenture states, "that John Cooper the younger doth put himself apprentice to Thomas Simmons, of Wolverhampton, his executors and administrators, such executors and administrators carrying on business in the trade and business of lock-makers in the town of Wolverhampton."

ton, aforesaid," &c. Is this contract absolutely void? It is said in 2 Co. Litt. s. 259, p. 172 a, that an infant may bind himself for good teaching and instruction whereby he may profit himself afterwards. There is no particular known mode of binding an apprentice; the object and intention of the parties in each case is to secure a beneficial result. It has been said that the courts only pronounce contracts of infants to be void when they are prejudicial. Is this to the prejudice of the infant in this case? Certainly there is nothing to his prejudice in it by which we could say it is void. But then it was also said that he was advised he was not bound to serve after his master's death. Can that be any answer? This was treated by Mr. Gray as a criminal proceeding; I think that is not the right way of treating it. It is a proceeding for civil rights, and it may have been thought this was a case requiring summary remedy rather than leaving parties to their right of action. There will be no imputation against this apprentice—certainly not as having done or committed anything in the nature of a criminal offence. Is it then any answer to the complaint that he was advised by his attorney he was not bound to continue his apprenticeship after the death of the master? I think it is not; and having broken the contract, the magistrates have power to punish him in the way pointed out by the statute, and he must abide the legal consequences.

WILDE, B.—I am of the same opinion. In the indenture it is stipulated the apprentice shall serve the executors. The master dies, the apprentice remains, the business is continued by the executrix in the same place, and the apprentice is there instructed. The question is, whether the contract is binding? Mr. Gray says, and rightly, that in order to ascertain this we must look to see what the contract was at the time it was made, and upon the supposition that it was to be performed, and he also says that unless it appears clear that it was to the benefit of the apprentice it is void. I apprehend that is not the law, but rather whether the contract is manifestly to his prejudice. Is this a contract manifestly to his prejudice? If so it is void. Ordinarily speaking, the binding an infant as an apprentice is beneficial to him. Do the additional terms of extending the contract to the executors and continuing in the same town render it less beneficial? I do not think they do. As to the other objection in reference to the advice given to the app. by his attorney, the observations that have been made by the court are, I think, quite right, and as I concur I have nothing to add upon that subject.

PENNELL (app.) v. THE CHURCHWARDENS OF UXBRIDGE (resps.)

Summary conviction—Statement of case under 20 & 21 Vict. c. 43—Transmitting case to the court—Sunday—Delivery of case to app.'s attorney.

Under section 2 of the 20 & 21 Vict. c. 43, the app. must transmit the case within three days after receiving the same, to the court named in his application; and when the last of such three days falls upon a Sunday it is too late to transmit it the day following.

An attorney who appears to conduct the case for the app. before the justices is a proper person (unless his authority be revoked) to whom to send the case when stated by the justices, and it will be deemed to be received by the app. at the time when received by such attorney.

This was a rule calling upon the app. to show cause why this appeal should not be struck out of the Crown paper, on the ground that the provisions of sect. 2 of the 20 & 21 Vict. c. 43, had not been complied with.

It appeared that the app. is the official assignee under the bankruptcy of one David Bassett, and that a poor-rate being due in respect of premises occupied at Uxbridge by the said bankrupt, the said app., as assignee, was summoned to show cause why he should not pay the amount; the demand was resisted on his behalf by Messrs. Ford and Lloyd, who were solicitors to the bankruptcy. These gentlemen, by letter, instructed Mr. Gardiner, solicitor, of Uxbridge, "to appear at the hearing of the summons on the part of the assignees;" at the hearing he accordingly attended, and resisted the application. The justices, however, decided in favour of the churchwardens, whereupon Mr. Pennell himself gave a written demand for a case to be stated under the 20 & 21 Vict. c. 43. On Thursday, 31st Oct. last, the case was sent to Mr. Gardiner, at Uxbridge, too late (as he stated) to enable him to transmit it that evening to Messrs. Ford and Lloyd in London, but that he took it to them the next day (Friday), and they delivered it at the Crown-office on the following Monday.

By sect. 2 of the 20 & 21 Vict. c. 43, it is enacted that the app. "shall within three days after receiving such case transmit the same to the court named in his application," &c.

The ground upon which this rule was obtained was, that inasmuch as the case was received by Mr. Gardiner (the app.'s attorney) on Thursday, it was too late to transmit it to the Crown-office on the following Monday, which was the fourth day after its receipt by the app.

Prentice now showed cause and contended, first, that, as the last of the three days was Sunday, the app. was entitled to exclude that day from the computation, and so was in time in delivering it on the following Monday. He admitted, however, that, if this court would hold itself bound by the decision of the Common Pleas in Peacock v. The Queen, 27 L. J. 224, C.P., he could not sustain the objection. Secondly, that as Mr. Gardiner was only engaged for the special purpose of appearing for the assignee at the hearing, he must not be deemed his attorney for all purposes afterwards, and that the sending of the case to him, therefore, and not to the app., who himself gave a written demand of a case, was a nullity.

Keane, contra, argued that, as regarded the first point, it was settled by Peacock v. The Queen; Woodhouse v. Wood, 29 L. J. 149, M. C.; and Morgan v. Edwards, 29 L. J. 108, M. C., that, as regarded the second point, Mr. Edwards must be taken to be the attorney for the app. in all the stages of the litigation until there was something to show the contrary, which did not exist in this case.

BLACKBURN, J.—The decision of the Court of C. P. is an authority upon the first point, which, sitting here, I am bound by; and, although not wishing to be considered as disagreeing from it, yet, if it were res integra, I should have liked to have further considered it, since it seems hard that the party should be thus deprived of a day. As regards the other point, the question is, when was this case "received" within the meaning of the Act of Parliament? As I take it, the facts were these. [His Lordship here stated the facts.] Now, when the demand of a case was made, there was nothing to show that Mr. Gardiner's authority was revoked; nor is there anything to show that Mr. Gardiner was a mere meddler in the case after the hearing. The justices had a fair reason for believing that Mr. Gardiner had still authority in the matter, and there is nothing in the affidavits to show the contrary. Then, was he an agent to receive the case? There is nothing in the Act of Parliament to show that an agent may not receive it, and indeed it might be very inconvenient if he could not receive it. Therefore, I think that the case was received within the meaning of the statute, when it was received by Mr. Gardiner, and therefore that it was transmitted to the Crown-office too late.

REG. V. ALFRED CHEESEMAN.

Larceny—Attempt to commit—Proximate act—Ownership.

It was the course of business for a contractor who supplied the camp, to send the meat to the quartermaster-sergeant at the camp. The quartermaster-sergeant had his own weights and scales; he and a servant of the contractor weighed out the quantities for the messes, and a soldier attended from each mess, and took his portion away as weighed. The amount delivered was credited to the contractor, and the surplus meat taken away by the contractor's servant. The prisoner, the contractor's servant, in charge of the meat, fraudulently put a false weight into the scale, and a complaint having been made that a mess was short weight, absconded when it was discovered. It was found that the quartermaster's weight had been removed, and the false weight substituted; that the weight of meat delivered was certain pounds short.

The jury found that the prisoner fraudulently substituted the weight with intent to cheat, intending to carry away and steal the difference between the just surplus for which he would have to account to his master, and the apparent surplus remaining after the false weighing, and that he would have carried it away if the fraud had not been detected: Held, that the prisoner was properly convicted of an attempt to steal the particular meat, and also that the property in such meat was properly laid in the prisoner's master.

Case reserved for the opinion of this Court by Blackburn, J., at the Maidstone summer assizes 1861.

The indictment contained three counts:—

The first charged the prisoner with fraudulently keeping a false weight and selling thereby to the Queen 467lbs. of meat as 512½lbs.

The second count stated that Alfred Cheeseman was accustomed to furnish the Queen with large quantities of meat for the supply of soldiers, and that the prisoner, being his servant, fraudulently kept a false weight, &c., as in the first count.

The third count was for an attempt to steal 45lbs. of meat of Alfred Cheeseman.

On the trial it was proved that Alfred Cheeseman was the contractor who supplied meat to the camp at Shorncliffe.

The course of business was, that the contractor each morning sent down by his servants a quantity of meat to the quartermaster-sergeants at the camp, and a soldier from each mess attended. The quartermaster-sergeant has his own weights and scales, which are kept at the camp, with these he and the contractor's servant together weigh out to each of the soldiers in attendance, respectively, the proper quantity of meat for each of their respective messes, and each mess is taken away by the soldier as weighed out and delivered to him. The amount of the whole thus delivered is credited to the contractor as supplied to the Queen, and the surplus of the meat brought down remaining after all the messes have been supplied is taken away by his servants on his account.

On the 27th June, the prisoner, who was a servant of the contractor, came down in charge of the meat, and he and the quartermaster-sergeant proceeded to weigh out the meat to the different messmen with the quartermaster-sergeant's weights, the prisoner being the person who put the weights on the scale. Before the weighing was complete one of the messmen brought back his mess portion with a complaint that it was short weight. He was desired to wait till the weighing was over, when his complaint should be investigated. The weighing proceeded, and in all thirty-four messes were weighed out, which were supposed to be in the whole 512½lbs.; about 60lbs. weight of meat remaining over, which, in the course of business, would have been removed by the contractor's men. The complaint as to short weight was then investigated; it was discovered that the 14lb. weight belonging to the quartermaster-sergeant had been removed and concealed under a bench, and that a false 14lb. weight had been substituted for it and used in weighing out the thirty-four messes, and that the prisoner had absconded on the commencement of the investigation. The messes were all brought back and reweighed, and it was found that the weight delivered was 467½lbs. instead of being 512½lbs., as on the first weighing it had appeared to be, and after the true weight was supplied to the different messes the surplus remaining to be taken by the contractor's men was about 15lbs. instead of being about 60lbs. as it had appeared to be.

The counsel for the prisoner objected that there was no case to go to the jury, inasmuch as the circumstances stated did not amount to a cheat at common law, and there was no overt act so proximately connected with an attempt to steal as to justify a conviction under the third count.

The jury, in answer to questions from me, found that the prisoner fraudulently substituted the false 14lb. weight for the true weight, with intent to cheat; that his intention was to carry away and steal the difference between the just surplus of about 15lbs., for which he would have to account to his master, and the apparent surplus meat actually remaining after the false weighing, and that nothing remained to be done on his part to complete his scheme, except to carry away and dispose of the meat, which he would have done had the fraud not been detected.

I directed a verdict of not guilty on the first count, and guilty on the second and third counts, and reserved for this Court the question whether, on these facts and findings, the prisoner was properly convicted on either of those counts.

The prisoner was admitted to bail.

COLIN BLACKBURN.

Ribton for the prisoner.—As regards the second count, there is no offence disclosed which is indictable at common law. That count is substantially the same as the first, the only difference being that the prisoner is charged as a servant in the second count. There was no evidence to show that the prisoner kept a false weight in the sense required to sustain this count. Merely keeping a false weight is no offence at common law. The prisoner may have had it in his pocket. The offence is when a man keeps a false weight in his shop for the purpose of being used in the course of his trade and defrauding the public. The count also alleges that the prisoner sold, but it was his master who sold the meat to the Queen; he was the contractor. As to the third count, the finding of the jury is not sufficient to support the conviction upon it. The jury say it was the prisoner's intention to carry away and steal the difference between the false weight and the true weight. That does not warrant the jury in finding the prisoner guilty of an attempt to steal. There must be some overt act connected with the thing itself. Here nothing was done by the prisoner in the way of an attempt; the only thing he did was to put the false weight into the scale. That is too remote to make it evidence of an attempt to commit a larceny of the meat. There is a difference between an attempt, and the doing an act with intent to obtain an object. A man may get a rifle made in America wherewith to shoot some one in England, or a burglar may procure a picklock to be made, but without some extrinsic evidence, the procuring a rifle or the picklock is no evidence of an attempt to murder or to break into a house. But for the act of the prisoner's absconding, there could be no pretence for saying that the prisoner had been guilty of an attempt to steal the meat. In Reg. v. St. George, 9 Car. & P. 483 (a), it was held that if a person, intending to shoot another, put his finger on the trigger of a loaded pistol, but is prevented from pulling the trigger, this is not an attempt to discharge loaded firearms "by drawing a trigger or in any other manner" within the 1 Vict. c. 85, s. 34. So in Reg. v. Lewis, 9 Car. & P. 523, where the prisoner, on a refusal by the prosecutor to give him some title-deeds, addressed him, "Then you are a dead man," and immediately unfolded a great coat and took out a loaded blunderbuss, but was not able to point it at the prosecutor before he was seized, it was held not sufficient to sustain a charge of attempting to discharge the blunderbuss at the prosecutor. Farther, the third count describes the meat as the property of the prisoner's master. It is submitted that the meat when put into the scale was the property of the Queen, and that portion which the jury find the prisoner intended to steal ought to have gone to the soldiers. The conviction, therefore, is bad on this ground also.

C. CAS. R.]

REG. v. STANBURY.

ERLE, C. J.—I am of opinion that the prisoner was properly convicted. It is not necessary to determine whether this was a cheat at common law. The evidence is sufficient to support the verdict on the third count, which charged an attempt to steal 45lbs. of meat of Alfred Cheeseman. It is said on behalf of the prisoner that there was no overt act proximately connected with an attempt to steal, and that the meat was not the property of the prisoner's master, as laid in the indictment. I think that the prisoner's counsel has failed on both grounds. It appears that the prisoner, having the charge of the meat, took it down to the camp, and went through the form of delivering a part without delivering the whole quantity. If he had kept back a part and had begun to carry it away, he would have been guilty of the crime of larceny. Where there are several acts proximately connected with larceny, and close to the point of completion, as the preparing the false weight and substituting it for the true weight, and handing over a false weight of meat for the true weight, and keeping back the difference between the false weight and the true weight under his (the prisoner's) own control and possession, it seems very like the case of a servant, sent to deliver two articles, fraudulently keeping one in his pocket and handing over one only. Everything was complete in this case but the beginning to move off with the meat so kept back. The prisoner had the very control of the thing he intended to steal. There was evidence therefore of a sufficiently proximate overt act to constitute an attempt to commit a larceny. Then the next point is, was the meat the property of the prisoner's master? The transaction was not complete, and all the property in the meat remained in the vendor till (by delivery it had passed to the vendee. The conviction therefore was right on the third count.

BLACKBURN, J.—I am of the same opinion. There is a great difference between preparations antecedent to the commission of an offence and an attempt to commit the offence, as in the case of merely going to buy a gun wherewith to commit a murder, which I do not think would be evidence of an attempt to commit a murder. But in the present the actual crime has commenced, and the attempt would have ended in the completion of the crime, had not the prisoner been interrupted. Though nothing had been done which formed part of the crime, the attempt to commit it had commenced. There is nothing in the second point, because until the meat was weighed out and delivered over to the quartermaster the property remained in the prosecutor.

WILDE, B.—I am of the same opinion. The crime which the prisoner intended to commit consisted of two parts. First, there was the reception of the thing intended to be stolen, the getting it into the prisoner's custody; and secondly, the carrying it away. The prisoner had completed the first part, but was detected before he could complete the second. He had therefore attempted to commit the offence.

MELLOR, J.—I am of the same opinion, and for the same reasons. Conviction affirmed. (a)

REG. v. STANBURY.

False pretences—Venue.

The venue in an indictment for obtaining sheep by false pretences was laid in county E., where the prisoner was convicted.

It appeared that the sheep had been obtained by the prisoner in county M., and that he conveyed them into the county of E. where he was apprehended: Held, that he had been indicted in a wrong county.

Case reserved for the opinion of this Court by T. C. G. Marsh, chairman of the Essex Quarter Sessions.

The prisoner was indicted at an adjourned quarter sessions held for the county of Essex, for obtaining sheep by false pretences. The venue was laid in Essex. The sheep were, in the first instance, obtained in Middlesex, and remained continuously in his possession till a few days subsequently. He conveyed them into Essex, where he was apprehended.

The prisoner was convicted and sentenced to twelve months' imprisonment with hard labour, and is now in prison.

The question reserved was, whether, under the venue, the indictment could be sustained: (Reg. v. Simmons, 1 Moo. C. C. 408 (b); 24 & 25 Vict. c. 96, s. 114.) (c)

(a) When this case was called on, five judges were in court, but one immediately left aviso revertendi, as was supposed, but this turned out to be an error. In the course of the argument in the next case the court was reminded that by the 11 & 12 Vict. c. 78, s. 3, the presence of five judges was required to constitute a court, whereupon Keating, J. came and made up the number. This case was then formally called on again, and ERLE quoted Reg. v. St. George, 9 C. & P. 483; and Reg. v. Lewis, ib. 523, in addition to his former argument. The Court said that those cases made no difference in the judgment, and that there is a difference between those cases and the acts proved here with reference to the crime of larceny.

(b) In Reg. v. Simmons, the facts were, that a constable took the prisoner with two stolen horses in Surrey, and afterwards, at his request, rode with him on the horses into Kent, where the prisoner escaped. The prisoner was subsequently apprehended in Surrey, taken into Kent, and indicted there for stealing the horses, and convicted. On a question reserved, the judges were unanimously of opinion that there was no evidence of stealing in Kent, and that the conviction could not stand, but that the prisoner should be removed to Surrey.

(c) The 24 & 25 Vict. c. 96, s. 114, enacts that stealers of property in one part of the United Kingdom, who have the same in any other part of the United Kingdom, may be tried and punished in that part of the United Kingdom where they have the property.

REG. v. BENJAMIN WOODWARD.

Feloniously receiving—Husband and wife—Guilty knowledge.

The principal felon, during the prisoner's absence, left the stolen property with the prisoner's wife, who gave him sixpence on account. Afterwards the principal felon and the prisoner met and agreed on the price, and the prisoner paid the balance. Guilty knowledge as to the property having been stolen was inferred from the other circumstances of the case :

Held, that the receipt was not complete till the principal felon and the prisoner had agreed as to the price, and that the prisoner knowing then that the property was stolen, was properly convicted of feloniously receiving.

Case reserved for the opinion of the Court of Criminal Appeal.

At the quarter sessions of the peace for the county of Wilts, held at Marlborough, on the 16th day of Oct. 1861, before me Sir John Wither Awdry, Bart., and others my fellows, Benjamin Woodward, of Trowbridge, in the county of Wilts, dealer, was found guilty of receiving stolen goods knowing them to have been stolen, and was thereupon sentenced to nine calendar months' imprisonment with hard labour, and the prisoner now is undergoing his sentence.

The actual delivery of the stolen property was made by the principal felon to the prisoner's wife, in the absence of the prisoner, and she then paid 6d. on account, but the amount to be paid was not then fixed. Afterwards the prisoner and the principal met and agreed on the price, and the prisoner paid the balance.

Guilty knowledge was inferred from the general circumstances of the case.

It was objected that the guilty knowledge must exist at the time of receiving, and that when the wife received the goods the guilty knowledge could not have come to the prisoner.

The court overruled this objection, and directed the jury that until the subsequent meeting, when the act of the wife was adopted by the prisoner and the price agreed upon, the receipt was not so complete as to exclude the effect of the guilty knowledge.

If the court shall be of opinion that the circumstances before set forth are sufficient to support a conviction against the prisoner for the felonious receipt, the conviction is to stand confirmed; but if the court shall be of a contrary opinion, then the conviction is to be quashed.

J. W. AWDRY, Chairman.

G. Broderick for the prisoner.—This conviction, it is contended, cannot be sustained. At the trial it was not said on the part of the prosecution that the wife of the prisoner was her husband's agent in receiving the property, but that he subsequently adopted her act of receiving by paying the balance of the price agreed upon. But there was no evidence of any guilty receipt by the wife, or of any subsequent act of receiving by the prisoner. The guilty knowledge and act of receiving must be simultaneous. In Reg. v. Dring and Wife, 1 Dears. & Bell, 329; 7 Cox C. C. 382, where a husband and wife were jointly indicted for receiving stolen goods, and the jury found both guilty, stating that the wife received them without the control or knowledge of and apart from her husband, and that he afterwards adopted her receipt, it was held that the conviction could not be sustained as against the husband; and in his judgment, Cockburn, C. J. observed that, "If we are to take it that the jury meant to say, 'We find the prisoner guilty if the court should be of opinion that upon the facts we are right,' then we ought to be able to see that the prisoner took some active part in the matter, that the wife first received the goods and then the husband from her, both with a guilty knowledge." [BLACKBURN, J.—The verdict in this case is, that he did receive them; there is no question raised as to whether the verdict was justified. ERLE, C. J.—Receiving is a very complex term. There is the case where two persons stole fowls, and took them for sale in a sack to another person, who knew them to have been stolen. The sack was put in a stable and the door shut, while the three stood aside haggling about what was to be paid for them. There the judges differed as to whether there was a receiving by the third person in whose stable the sack was put.] That was the case of Reg. v. Wiley, 4 Cox C. C. 412. The actual receipt of the goods was by the wife, and it is consistent with the evidence that the goods may never have come into the prisoner's possession at all: (The case of Reg. v. Bulton, 11 Q. B., 3 Cox C. C. 229, were also cited.)

ERLE, C. J.—The argument of the learned counsel for the prisoner has failed to convince me that the conviction was wrong. It appears that the thief brought to the premises of the prisoner the stolen goods and left them, and that sixpence was paid on account of them by the prisoner's wife, but there was nothing in the nature of a complete receipt of the goods until the thief found the husband and agreed with him as to the amount, and was paid the balance. The receipt was complete from the time when the thief and the husband agreed; till then the thief could have got the goods back again on payment of the sixpence. I am of opinion, therefore, that the conviction should be affirmed.

BLACKBURN, J.—The principal felon left the stolen property with the wife as the husband's servant, but the court below, as I understand the case, doubted whether the husband could be found guilty of feloniously receiving, as he was absent at the time when the goods were delivered to the wife, and could not then know that they were stolen. It is found that, as soon as the husband heard of it, he adopted and ratified what had been done, and that as soon as he adopted it he had a guilty knowledge; he therefore at that time received the goods knowing them to have been stolen.

KEATING, J.—I am of the same opinion. The case finds that the agreement as to the price was not complete till the thief and the husband agreed. I think therefore that the receipt was not complete till then, and that the conviction was right. If we were to hold that the conviction was not right, the consequences would be very serious.

WILDE, B.—I read the case as showing that the wife received the goods on the part of the prisoner her husband, and that act of her was capable of being ratified on the part of the prisoner. If so, that makes the first act of receiving by the wife his act. In the case of Reg. v. Dring and Wife, the only statement was "that the husband adopted his wife's receipt," and the court thought the word "adopted" capable of meaning that the husband passively consented to what his wife had done, and on that ground quashed the conviction. But here the prisoner adopted his wife's receipt by settling and paying the amount agreed on for the stolen goods.

MELLOR, J. concurred.

REG. v. STANBURY.

[C. CAS. R.]

is not sufficient to support the conviction upon it. The jury say it was the prisoner's intention to carry away and steal the difference between the false weight and the true weight. That does not warrant the jury in finding the prisoner guilty of an attempt to steal. There must be some overt act connected with the thing itself. Here nothing was done by the prisoner in the way of an attempt; the only thing he did was to put the false weight into the scale. That is too remote to make it evidence of an attempt to commit a larceny of the meat. There is a difference between an attempt, and the doing an act with intent to obtain an object. The evidence is sufficient to support the verdict on the third count, which charged an attempt to steal 45lbs. of meat of Alfred Cheeseman. It is said on behalf of the prisoner that there was no overt act proximately connected with an attempt to steal, and that the meat was not the property of the prisoner's master, as laid in the indictment. The venue in an indictment for obtaining sheep by false pretences was laid in county E., where the prisoner was convicted.

It appeared that the sheep had been obtained by the prisoner in county M., and that he conveyed them into the county of E. where he was apprehended: Held, that he had been indicted in a wrong county.

Case reserved for the opinion of this Court by T. C. G. Marsh, chairman of the Essex Quarter Sessions.

The prisoner was indicted at an adjourned quarter sessions held for the county of Essex, for obtaining sheep by false pretences. The venue was laid in Essex. The sheep were, in the first instance, obtained in Middlesex, and remained continuously in his possession till a few days subsequently. He conveyed them into Essex, where he was apprehended.

The prisoner was convicted and sentenced to twelve months' imprisonment with hard labour, and is now in prison.

The question reserved was, whether, under the venue, the indictment could be sustained: (Reg. v. Simmons, 1 Moo. C. C. 408 (b); 24 & 25 Vict. c. 96, s. 114.) (c)

(a) When this case was called on, five judges were in court, but one immediately left ante reverteri, as was supposed, but this turned out to be an error. In the course of the argument in the next case the court was reminded that by the 11 & 12 Vict. c. 78, s. 3, the presence of five judges was required to constitute a court, whereupon Keating, J. came and made up the number. This case was then formally called on again, and Riddon quoted Reg. v. St. George, 9 C. & P. 483; and Reg. v. Lewis, 1b. 523, in addition to his former argument. The Court said that those cases made no difference in the judgment, and that there is a difference between those cases and the acts proved here with reference to the crime of larceny.

(b) In Reg. v. Simmons, the facts were, that a constable took the prisoner with two stolen horses in Surrey, and afterwards, at his request, rode with him on the horses into Kent, where the prisoner escaped. The prisoner was subsequently apprehended in Surrey, taken into Kent, and indicted there for stealing the horses, and convicted. On a question reserved, the judges were unanimously of opinion that there was no evidence of stealing in Kent, and that the conviction could not stand, but that the prisoner should be removed to Surrey.

(c) The 24 & 25 Vict. c. 96, s. 114, enacts that stealers of property in one part of the United Kingdom, who have the same in any other part of the United Kingdom, may be tried and punished in that part of the United Kingdom where they have the property.

REG. v. BENJAMIN WOODWARD.

Feloniously receiving—Husband and wife—Guilty knowledge.

The principal felon, during the prisoner's absence, left the stolen property with the prisoner's wife, who gave him sixpence on account. Afterwards the principal felon and the prisoner met and agreed on the price, and the prisoner paid the balance. Guilty knowledge as to the property having been stolen was inferred from the other circumstances of the case:

Held, that the receipt was not complete till the principal felon and the prisoner had agreed as to the price, and that the prisoner knowing then that the property was stolen, was properly convicted of feloniously receiving.

Case reserved for the opinion of the Court of Criminal Appeal.

At the quarter sessions of the peace for the county of Wilts, held at Marlborough, on the 16th day of Oct. 1861, before me Sir John Wither Awdry, Bart., and others my fellows, Benjamin Woodward, of Trowbridge, in the county of Wilts, dealer, was found guilty of receiving stolen goods knowing them to have been stolen, and was thereupon sentenced to nine calendar months' imprisonment with hard labour, and the prisoner now is undergoing his sentence.

The actual delivery of the stolen property was made by the principal felon to the prisoner's wife, in the absence of the prisoner, and she then paid 6d. on account, but the amount to be paid was not then fixed. Afterwards the prisoner and the principal met and agreed on the price, and the prisoner paid the balance.

Guilty knowledge was inferred from the general circumstances of the case.

It was objected that the guilty knowledge must exist at the time of receiving, and that when the wife received the goods the guilty knowledge could not have come to the prisoner.

The court overruled this objection, and directed the jury that until the subsequent meeting, when the act of the wife was adopted by the prisoner and the price agreed upon, the receipt was not so complete as to exclude the effect of the guilty knowledge.

If the court shall be of opinion that the circumstances before set forth are sufficient to support a conviction against the prisoner for the felonious receipt, the conviction is to stand confirmed; but if the court shall be of a contrary opinion, then the conviction is to be quashed.

J. W. AWDRY, Chairman.

G. Broderick for the prisoner.—This conviction, it is contended, cannot be sustained. At the trial it was not said on the part of the prosecution that the wife of the prisoner was her husband's agent in receiving the property, but that he subsequently adopted her act of receiving by paying the balance of the price agreed upon. But there was no evidence of any guilty receipt by the wife, or of any subsequent act of receiving by the prisoner. The guilty knowledge and act of receiving must be simultaneous. In Reg. v. Dring and Wife, 1 Dears. & Bell, 329; 7 Cox C. C. 382, where a husband and wife were jointly indicted for receiving stolen goods, and the jury found both guilty, stating that the wife received them without the control or knowledge of and apart from her husband, and that he afterwards adopted her receipt, it was held that the conviction could not be sustained as against the husband; and in his judgment, Cockburn, C. J. observed that, "If we are to take it that the jury meant to say, 'We find the prisoner guilty if the court should be of opinion that upon the facts we are right,' then we ought to be able to see that the prisoner took some active part in the matter, that the wife first received the goods and then the husband from her, both with a guilty knowledge." [BLACKBURN, J.—The verdict in this case is, that he did receive them; there is no question raised as to whether the verdict was justified. ERLE, C. J.—Receiving is a very complex term. There is the case where two persons stole fowls, and took them for sale in a sack to another person, who knew them to have been stolen. The sack was put in a stable and the door shut, while the three stood aside haggling about what was to be paid for them. There the judges differed as to whether there was a receiving by the third person in whose stable the sack was put.] That was the case of Reg. v. Wiley, 4 Cox C. C. 412. The actual receipt of the goods was by the wife, and it is consistent with the evidence that the goods may never have come into the prisoner's possession at all: (The case of Reg. v. Button, 11 Q. B., 3 Cox C. C. 229, were also cited.)

ERLE, C. J.—The argument of the learned counsel for the prisoner has failed to convince me that the conviction was wrong. It appears that the thief brought to the premises of the prisoner the stolen goods and left them, and that sixpence was paid on account of them by the prisoner's wife, but there was nothing in the nature of a complete receipt of the goods until the thief found the husband and agreed with him as to the amount, and was paid the balance. The receipt was complete from the time when the thief and the husband agreed; till then the thief could have got the goods back again on payment of the sixpence. I am of opinion, therefore, that the conviction should be affirmed.

BLACKBURN, J.—The principal felon left the stolen property with the wife as the husband's servant, but the court below, as I understand the case, doubted whether the husband could be found guilty of feloniously receiving, as he was absent at the time when the goods were delivered to the wife, and could not then know that they were stolen. It is found that, as soon as the husband heard of it, he adopted and ratified what had been done, and that as soon as he adopted it he had a guilty knowledge; he therefore at that time received the goods knowing them to have been stolen.

KEATING, J.—I am of the same opinion. The case finds that the agreement as to the price was not complete till the thief and the husband agreed. I think therefore that the receipt was not complete till then, and that the conviction was right. If we were to hold that the conviction was not right, the consequences would be very serious.

WILDE, B.—I read the case as showing that the wife received the goods on the part of the prisoner her husband, and that act of her was capable of being ratified on the part of the prisoner. If so, that makes the first act of receiving by the wife his act. In the case of Reg. v. Dring and Wife, the only statement was "that the husband adopted his wife's receipt," and the court thought the word "adopted" capable of meaning that the husband passively consented to what his wife had done, and on that ground quashed the conviction. But here the prisoner adopted his wife's receipt by settling and paying the amount agreed on for the stolen goods.

MELLOR, J. concurred.

Conviction affirmed.

REG. v. SARAH SHEPHERD.

Misdemeanor—Parent and child—Neglect to provide medical assistance for daughter.

The prisoner's unmarried daughter, aged eighteen, having for some time previously gone out to service, and occasionally returned to live with her mother and stepfather, at such times working at glove-making in order to earn her subsistence, was confined with child at her stepfather's house, and the prisoner, her mother, purposely neglected to procure a midwife or other proper person to attend her daughter when she was taken in labour, and by reason thereof she died in childbirth:

Held, that there was no legal duty on the prisoner to procure proper assistance under the circumstances, and therefore that she was not guilty of manslaughter.

Case stated for the opinion of this Court by Williams, J.

The prisoner was indicted for the murder of her daughter Mary Ann Ashton, and tried before me at the gaol delivery for the county of Devon, in December last.

The case for the prosecution was, that the prisoner having a great ill-will towards the deceased, had purposely neglected to procure a midwife, or other proper person, to attend her daughter when she was taken in labour; and that, by reason thereof, she died in childbirth. She was about eighteen years of age and unmarried.

The prisoner, nearly four years before the trial, had married a second husband, who was not the father of the deceased. After the marriage, the deceased lived with her stepfather and her mother for some time, and then went out to service, occasionally returning to live with them when she was out of place, and at such times working at glove-making in order to earn her subsistence. About the beginning of the harvest before her death (which took place on Oct. 26, 1861) she came back from service to her stepfather's house, and continued to reside with her mother and her stepfather and their family till she died, except that she was absent staying with an aunt near Bridgwater for about six weeks, whence she returned to her stepfather's house on Tuesday and continued there till the following Saturday, when she died.

At the close of the case for the prisoner it was objected by the counsel for the prisoner that she was under no legal duty or obligation to procure, or try to procure, the attendance of a midwife for her daughter, and therefore that she was not criminally responsible for neglecting to do so.

I told the jury to consider whether it was established by the evidence that the death of Mary Ann Ashton was attributable to the prisoner's neglect to use ordinary diligence in procuring the assistance of a midwife, or other proper attendant, and, if it was not so established, to acquit the prisoner. But, if it was so established, then to consider, secondly, whether, by so neglecting, she intended to bring about the death of her daughter, and if so, I told the jury to convict her of murder, but if not of manslaughter.

The jury convicted her of manslaughter, but I respite the judgment in order to obtain the opinion of this court whether the objection to the conviction was well founded. EDW. VAUGHAN WILLIAMS.

H. T. Cole for the prisoner.—The conviction cannot be sustained. There was no legal obligation on the prisoner to procure or attempt to procure a midwife for her daughter. [WILLIAMS, J.—The view adopted by the jury must be taken to be that, if the deceased had had the assistance of a midwife of ordinary skill, her life would have been saved.] The sole question now is, was there a legal duty on the part of the prisoner to procure or attempt to procure for the deceased such assistance? Before the Act simplifying the forms of indictments, the act by which the prisoner destroyed the life of the deceased must have been shown on the face of the indictment; in this case the duty must have been shown, and also that the prisoner had the means of complying with it. [WILLIAMS, J.—If the indictment had stated the facts, it would have been quite sufficient, and so now the question is, "Do the facts create the duty?"] The duty must arise, if at all, from the relation of the parties, or by virtue of a contract. Here there was no duty arising from contract, and it is submitted that there was no legal duty on the prisoner as the mother of the deceased, who was an emancipated child, or her husband, as the stepfather. The obligation imposed by the stat. 43 Eliz. on relations to support one another, extends only to blood relations: (Rex v. Munden, 1 Stra. 190.) And it has been expressly held that a stepfather is not bound to support his wife's children by the first marriage: (Cooper v. Martin, 4 East, 76.) Then the 4 & 5 Will. 4, c. 76, s. 37, fixes the age of sixteen as that up to which time a stepfather shall be bound to support the children of his wife by a former marriage. If there is no obligation after that age to supply food, a fortiori there is no obligation to find medical assistance. In Rex v. Friend and Wife, Russ. & Ry. 20, the neglect to supply an apprentice of tender years with sufficient food was held to be indictable on the ground that there was a breach of duty created by contract. In Rex v. Squire and Wife, 1 Russ. on Crimes, 19, where the prisoner was charged with murder of an apprentice, who died from debility, and for want of proper food and nourishment, a married woman was held not to be responsible for not providing an apprentice with sufficient food and nourishment, though, if the husband had allowed her sufficient food for the apprentice, and she had wilfully withholden it from him, she would have been. That decision has been since acted on in Rex v. Saunders, 7 C. & P. 277, and Reg. v. Edwards, 8 C. & P. 611. There is no allegation in this case that the prisoner prevented her daughter from obtaining medical assistance. [WILLIAMS, J.—The verdict must be taken as finding that the prisoner might have got a midwife if she pleased. There were two living near the spot, and one did come when sent for.] Again, there was no evidence that the prisoner had the means of providing such assistance. In Reg. v. Chandler, 1 Deane C. C. 453; 6 Cox C. C. 519, an indictment for neglecting to provide an infant with sufficient food alleged that the prisoner, who was the mother of the child, had the means of doing so; it was not proved that she actually had the means of doing so, but only that she might have obtained relief by applying to the relieving officer, and it was held that this was not sufficient to support a conviction. And in Reg. v. Hogan, 5 Den. C. C. 277; 5 Cox C. C. 255, it was held that an indictment for abandoning a child without having provided any means for its support should state that the prisoner had the means of supporting the child.

Carter (M. Bere with him) for the prosecution.—

The jury have found criminal neglect on the part of the prisoner, and it is submitted that there was a duty on the part of the prisoner to sustain the conviction. There is a natural duty recognised by law in parents to support their children (2 Steph. Black. 296-7; 43 Eliz. c. 2, s. 7; 4 & 5 Will. 4, c. 76, s. 56); and there is no time pointed out when that duty is to cease. If parents have not the means of providing proper food and nourishment for their infant children, who are incapable of taking care of themselves, it is their duty to apply for parochial assistance, and therefore when a married woman, who having a child under such circumstances, wilfully neglected for several days going to the union for the purpose of getting support for it, she knowing that such neglect was likely to cause the child's death, she was held to be guilty of manslaughter: (Reg. v. Mabbett, 5 Cox. C. C. 339.) [ERLE, C. J.—The proposition I am reported to have laid down in that case contemplates death, which I apprehend was a tolerably safe proposition.] In Reg. v. Middleship, 5 Cox C. C. 275, upon an indictment against the prisoner for the manslaughter of her newborn child, which had dropped from her whilst on the privy and had been smothered in the soil, it was hinted that if the jury were of opinion that after it had been born the mother had the power of procuring such assistance as might have saved the child's life, and she neglected to procure it, she was guilty of manslaughter. The following cases were also quoted: Reg. v. Marriott, 8 C. & P. 425; Rex v. Cheeseman, 7 C. & P. 455; Rex v. Ferguson, 1 Low. C. C. 181; Rex v. Walters, 1 Russ. on Crimes, 488; Rex v. Huggins, 2 Stra. 882; Rex v. Simpson, 1 Low. C. C. 172.

ERLE, C. J.—We are to consider whether, on the facts in this case, there has been an omission of duty on the part of the prisoner, making the prisoner liable to the felony of manslaughter. It is extremely important that the boundaries of crime should be defined as far as they reasonably can be, and it is obvious that there is very much indefiniteness in the use of the terms neglect and want of ordinary care. Taking the facts to be that the prisoner did not ask for the aid of a midwife at a time when her daughter was suffering the pains of childbirth, and in the course of which a difficulty occurred, which terminated in her death, was that a breach of duty for which she is responsible, in a criminal court, for not asking a midwife to come and attend her daughter? If she had used ordinary care, she might have known where a midwife was to be found, and who would have come; but there is no evidence that she had any means at her command to pay for such professional aid. It cannot be a ground of indictment that she failed to ask for aid which might, perhaps, have been given, without her incurring any expense. In a great many cases childbirth occurs without the necessity of any professional aid at all. It is enough to say that this case does not fall within any of the authorities or the principle of them. In the case of persons imprisoned, and who are under the care of those who have the custody of them, there is a duty cast by law on the part of those who have such custody to provide them with all necessaries, and so in respect of the relation of parent and child, and some other cases. So also where the relation by contract of master and apprentice exists, the same duty may arise. But in this case the relation is that of a parent and daughter beyond the age by which a duty is cast by the statute to maintain and support her, the daughter being entirely emancipated. In my judgment therefore the question must be answered in the negative, as I cannot find any authority or principle according to which the prisoner has been guilty of a breach of duty, making her criminally responsible.

WIGHTMAN, J.—I am of the same opinion. I put my judgment on the ground that the circumstances stated do not show any legal duty to do that for the omission of which the prisoner was charged.

WILLIAMS, J.—I am of the same opinion. No doubt, morally speaking, the prisoner has been guilty of a shocking crime, but not of a legal one.

REG. v. JOHN CORSS SMITH.

Statute—Repeal—Saving clause—Offence committed before expiration of repealed statute—Bankrupt.

The 12 & 13 Vict. c. 106, s. 251, enacted, among other things, that a bankrupt not duly surrendering himself to the court should be deemed guilty of felony, and be liable to transportation or imprisonment.

The 24 & 25 Vict. c. 134, s. 230, repealed the above enactment, "but such repeal shall not affect any proceeding pending or any penalty incurred, or that may be incurred, in respect of any transaction, act, matter, or thing, done or existing prior to or at the commencement of this Act, under or by virtue of any of the Acts or parts of Acts repealed."

The offence of not surrendering to the Bankruptcy Court pursuant to the 12 & 13 Vict. c. 106, was complete on the 26th Sept. 1861. The bankrupt commissioner issued his warrant for the apprehension of the prisoner, and the information on which it was founded was given, and also the magistrate's warrant for the prisoner's apprehension was issued, before the repeal of the 12 & 13 Vict. c. 106. The indictment framed on that statute was not found until after its repeal:

Held, that the warrants and information made this a proceeding pending within the saving part of the repeal clause, sect. 230 of the 24 & 25 Vict. c. 134.

Case reserved for the opinion of this Court by the Recorder of London:—

At a session of the Central Criminal Court, held on Monday, the 16th Dec. 1861, John Corss Smith was tried before me on an indictment preferred and found against him on the 25th Nov. last, which charged that he, being adjudged a bankrupt, feloniously did not surrender himself to the Court of Bankruptcy on the day limited for his surrender—that is to say, on the 26th Sept. 1861—with intent to defraud his creditors.

The bankruptcy and non-surrender were proved. It was also proved that a warrant of the commissioner for the prisoner's apprehension on this charge, and the information on which it was founded, were signed and dated before the coming into operation of the new Bankruptcy Act, and that the magistrate's warrant for the like purpose was also issued a week before that period—namely, on the 4th Oct. 1861.

Metcalf, on behalf of the prisoner, contended that the indictment must fail, inasmuch as the stat. 12 & 13 Vict. c. 106, s. 251, upon which it was founded, had been repealed from and after the 11th Oct. 1861, by 24 & 25 Vict. c. 134, and that sect. 230 of the latter Act was not sufficiently large in its terms to preserve the offence of felony. He contended, as to sect. 230, that the indictment was not a "proceeding pending" on the 11th Oct. 1861; that the word "penalty," used in that section, must be construed "pecuniary penalty;" but that, even if a larger construction should be put upon it, so as to include penal servitude or judicial punishment of any kind, yet that the penalty alone was preserved, and not the offence of felony. He referred to Reg. v. Swan, 4 Cox Crim. Cas. 108; and Reg. v. Nairn, 4 Cox Crim. Cas. 115, in support of his argument, and contended that, though penalties might be preserved and proceedings kept alive, the offences were not mentioned, and that the offences must be preserved in the clearest and most express terms before a conviction could take place.

Parry, Serjt., for the prosecution, contended that the indictment was a proceeding pending within the meaning of the 230th section of the last Act, the warrant of the commissioner for the prisoner's apprehension and the warrant of the magistrate for the like purpose having issued at least a week before the coming into operation of the new Act, and the information on which the warrants were granted, and the direction of the commissioner to prosecute, being both before the new Act; that the offence of the prisoner was complete on the 26th Sept., and that he had then incurred the "penalty" of penal servitude; and that if the new Act preserved the penalty, it must of necessity preserve the offence of felony.

The prisoner was found guilty by the jury, but entertaining great doubts whether the prisoner was liable to be convicted of felony, I respited judgment and discharged the prisoner on recognisance, with sureties, and reserved for the consideration of the justices of either bench, and barons of the Exchequer, the question Whether, under the circumstances, the prisoner was liable to be convicted of felony.

RUSSELL GURNEY.

Metcalfe for the prisoner.—This conviction cannot be sustained. The indictment was found on the 25th Nov., and on the 11th Dec. the prisoner was convicted for his non-surrender to the Court of Bankruptcy. The statute under which he was indicted, the 12 & 13 Vict. c. 106, s. 251, was repealed, and also certain preceding Acts, from and after the 11th Oct. The words used, however, in the exceptional clause were not sufficiently large to preserve the charge of felony for which the prisoner was tried. The word "penalty" must be construed as a pecuniary infliction, and has no application to the crime of felony. Mr. Serjt. Parry, at the Central Criminal Court, contended that the offence came within the exception comprised in the 230th section of the Bankruptcy Act, inasmuch as the warrant for the prisoner's apprehension was issued at least a week before that Act came into operation. But if that statute preserved any penalty it must be that for felony, which clearly could not have been contemplated by the law. The prisoner was found guilty, but judgment was arrested on the point whether, under the circumstances stated, the prisoner had been convicted of an offence which had been kept alive by the statute which repealed all the old Acts, with certain exceptions specified in sect. 230. With regard to Acts repealed, they are to be taken as having no existence. The offence for which the prisoner could be tried, if any, was a mere statutable one. There was no offence committed unless the repealing statute had preserved that offence pro tanto. The words of sect. 230 of 24 & 25 Vict. c. 134, are: "all other Acts, or parts of Acts, which are inconsistent with this Act, are repealed;" and then it is provided that "such repeal shall not affect any proceeding pending, or any right that has arisen, or may arise, or any penalty incurred, or that may be incurred, in respect of any transaction, act, matter, or thing done or existing prior to or at the commencement of this Act, under or by virtue of any of the Acts, or parts of Acts, repealed." Those words do not keep alive an offence committed before the passing of the Act, for the purpose of indicting a man for it. That for which the bankrupt was indicted, namely, non-surrender to the Court of Bankruptcy, was a statutable offence. No argument could be drawn from the common law, and the statute being swept away the offence fell with it. Mr. Serjt. Parry contended below, that inasmuch as the warrant for the apprehension of the prisoner was granted before the passing of the Act, as well as the commissioner's order to prosecute, that the offence was kept alive, and made a "proceeding pending." The latter words no doubt would keep alive the warrant of the commissioner for the purpose of protecting the officer in its execution, but not for any proceeding in a criminal court. It was not a "proceeding pending" connected with the indictment; it was a warrant for an apprehension prior to the commencement of a prosecution, but it was not a "proceeding pending" within the meaning of the section. Although the warrant of commitment might have saved a prosecution under the Game and other Acts, to get over the period of limitation for the commencement of a prosecution, yet there is no case to show, in the words of the section, that a warrant for a commitment is a "proceeding pending." The real question raised in the court below was whether the words "penalty incurred, or that may be incurred, in respect of any transaction, act, matter, or thing done, or existing prior to or at the commencement of this Act" saved the offence. It would be contended that the word "penalty" was to be used in a larger sense. No doubt the word "pœna," from which "penalty" was derived, showed that, as generally used, it had that signification; but its legal meaning is limited to the extracting from a man a pecuniary fine for something he has done, and not imprisoning, transporting, or hanging him for any offence.

WILDE, B.—What is "the extreme penalty of the law?"

Metcalfe.—No doubt that is death.

BLACKBURN, J.—In the marginal note of a previous section the word is "punishment," and not "penalty." The latter word is in the body.

Metcalfe.—In the previous Bankruptcy Acts the very same word "penalty" has been held by the judges to have only a pecuniary signification, and that it did not apply to a criminal offence. The learned counsel then referred to Reg. v. Swan, 4 Cox's C. C. 108, where Coleridge, J., and Rolfe, B. had expressed an opinion to that effect; and to Reg. v. Nairn, 4 Cox's C. C. 115, where Patteson and Talfourd, JJ., had held that an indictment could not be maintained where similar words were used, in the 12 & 13 Vict. c. 106, s. 1, 4, with a slight difference in wording, including all matters necessary for keeping alive any proceedings in bankruptcy. In the judgment of the four judges mentioned it was held that the word "penalty" did not apply to offences; the words "recovery and application" would not have been used if it had been intended to be so applied. The last statute said, "any penalty incurred, or that may be incurred, in respect of any transaction, act, matter, or thing done." Did that mean any offence for which a man might be imprisoned or sent to penal servitude? Why did the clause use the words "may be incurred?" Clearly in contemplation of such an act as that of taking larger fees by the commissioner than he was authorised to receive, which would render him liable to punishment by a fine; but it did not apply to an offence punishable by imprisonment or penal servitude. The commissioner's warrant was for the purpose of arresting the bankrupt and taking him before a magistrate; then the magistrate's warrant was for the purpose of committing him to prison for the offence. If it was "penalty incurred," it must be under the old Act; but if it was a "penalty to be incurred," it came under the new Act. The words in the former statute, "any right that has arisen or may arise," were just of the same effect. There was nothing that could be incurred subsequent to the passing of the new Act. The new Criminal Acts, passed the same day as the new Bankruptcy Act, were drawn by gentlemen conversant with criminal law; but the other was not. The 24 & 25 Vict. c. 95, s. 3, the repealing clause, kept alive by most express words offences and penalties (committed before the commencement of the Act) which were to be dealt with and recovered in the same manner as if the said Acts and parts of Acts had not been repealed. The words "penalty" and "offence" were both used; and it was provided that they were to be dealt with and inquired into, determined and punished, in the same way as though the Act was not passed. It kept alive every portion of the former penalties and offences eo nomine. It was very odd, if there really was an intention in the new Bankruptcy Act to keep alive the offence, that the same words, or some equivalent to them, were not used. There the word "penalty" was used in contradistinction to the word "offence." In the court below attention was drawn to the fact that both the Acts provided that persons guilty of perjury before the Bankruptcy Court should be subject to the "pains and penalties" of perjury. The offence was punished by the common law with fine, and by the statute with imprisonment.

C. CAS. R.]

REG. v. JOHN CORSS SMITH.

[C. CAS. R.]

ERLE, C.J.—I well remember when every prisoner convicted of perjury was sentenced to be fined 1s. and then to be transported also for seven years. For the common law offence the prisoner was fined 1s., and for the statutable offence he was punished with transportation in addition.

Metcalf.—In Sir Robert Peel's Act, the same provisions were inserted as were introduced into the Criminal Acts in express terms, because the Legislature thought them necessary to keep alive the offence. Rolfe, B. said that upon the principle now contended for by the other side, a man might be hanged for an offence whilst there was a statute in force declaring that he should not be tried for it. It was not right to speculate upon what was intended to be done by the Legislature. They had no right to take judicial notice of a marginal note in a book, although the handwriting was recognised by the court. Their Lordships must be guided by the words of the Legislature and nothing else. Its intention even may have been frustrated by what took place in Parliament. The judgment of Lord Tenterden in Surtees v. Ellison, 9 B. & C. 750, was not unimportant. There it was held that when an Act repealed the previous statutes, they were to look at the existing statute as though it had been the first Act ever passed on the subject of bankruptcy. The indictment in Reg. v. Swan was founded upon a section of the 5 & 6 Vict. c. 122, which made the non-surrender to bankruptcy an offence punishable with transportation for life, or for not less than seven years; but that upon which the present indictment was founded reduced the same offence to a misdemeanor punishable with a maximum imprisonment of three years. The case drawn up for the consideration of the court stated that the prisoner had been guilty of "felony," and the question is whether he has been rightly so convicted of that offence. Under what law has he been convicted of felony? Supposing the words "proceeding pending" kept alive an offence; what was it? Not felony, but misdemeanor. There were other authorities bearing upon the same point, and amongst them that of Reg. v. Mackenzie, Russ. & Ry. 429, and Reg. v. Austin, 1 Car. & Kir. 621; the latter was upon a charge of night poaching, and the question was, whether the offence had been committed within twelve months from the date of the prosecution. The Lord Chief Baron there said that the warrant must be held to show the commencement of the prosecution. In the present case, however, the warrant of apprehension may have been for fifty other purposes besides that of prosecuting. The prisoner was not apprehended and taken before a magistrate prior to the new Act passing. It would not be said to be the same "proceeding pending" which was afterwards brought before the Central Criminal Court.

WILDE, B.—The statute alludes to taking criminal proceedings against a man.

Metcalf.—But the "proceedings" must be the same as those "pending," whereas the indictment under which the prisoner was tried was quite new matter, having nothing to do with the previous "proceedings pending."

Parry, Serjt. rose to reply, but

ERLE, C. J. intimated that they need not trouble the learned gentleman, to whom, however, the court always listened with the best attention. His Lordship was of opinion that the conviction of the prisoner was legally right. By the 12 & 13 Vict. c. 106, s. 251, he had been guilty of felony in not surrendering to his bankruptcy. Under the powers conferred by that statute the commissioner had issued a warrant for the prisoner's prosecution for that crime, in respect of which an information had also been laid before a magistrate, in pursuance of which, and prior to the present Act coming into operation, the magistrate issued his warrant for the prisoner's apprehension. Before the indictment was framed the 12 & 13 Vict. was repealed by the 24 & 25 Vict. After the latter statute was passed, the indictment was preferred under which the prisoner was convicted. Sect. 230 of that statute was what the court had to construe upon the present occasion. By it the 12 & 13 Vict. was repealed, as far as concerned certain offences. Mr. Metcalf's argument was perfectly just, and his Lordship went with it to the fullest extent, except as to his view of what was the effect of the saving clause. The statute was repealed, and with it the offence would have gone, and, of course, all proceedings in respect of it with it, had not the saving clause prevented the effect of that repeal. The excepting section was in these words: "This repeal shall not affect any proceeding pending, or any penalty incurred in respect of any act, matter, or thing done prior to or at the commencement of this Act." Now, was there a "proceeding pending," and was there a "thing done" before the commencement of this Act? I answer both questions in the affirmative. First, was there a "proceeding pending" in respect of a "thing done" before the commencement of this Act? The "thing done" by the bankrupt was feloniously abstaining from surrendering to his bankruptcy; that was the "thing done." Secondly, was there a "proceeding pending" in respect of it at the time? There were the matters I mentioned—the issue of the warrant of the commissioner, the information laid before the magistrate, and the warrant of the magistrate for the prisoner's apprehension. To my mind these are all steps taken towards one thing, which comes to its completion by indictment, conviction and punishment of the prisoner. The crime has been committed, proceedings are taken for the purpose of bringing the criminal to justice, and such acts as I have mentioned are all of them steps which were brought to a consummation by indictment and conviction. It seems to me, then, to be within the meaning of this statute. The warrant of the commissioner, the information before the magistrate, and the warrant of the magistrate, were all parts of a "proceeding pending," and the last part of that line of a "proceeding pending" was the indictment founded thereon. That section of the statute, therefore, I think does apply to the case. I should also take it in conjunction—because it is all in the same sentence—with the words "penalty incurred, or that may be incurred, in respect of any transaction, act, matter, or thing done, or existing prior to or at the commencement of this Act," as being excepted by that repeal. I think it extends to all the penal consequences by law due to an offence, and not to a pecuniary penalty only. How stands the matter with respect to a "proceeding pending?" In my opinion the words of a statute are to be construed in a great degree by reference to the statute itself. It is useful, in giving a meaning to the words, to consider what was the state of the law at the time when a new statute passed, what is apparent from the statute itself, what has been the purpose of the law that comes in question, and then, bearing those points in mind, to construe the words about which the doubt arises. The state of the law was this: the 12 & 13 Vict. created several offences; and the effect of the new statute was to abolish them, and substitute a new set of proceedings, to take effect after the time that the Act should come into operation. What would be the purpose if the repeal instead of being absolute was qualified? I take it it would be qualified, certainly in respect of all rights which may arise. Why is it not then to be intended to apply to all liabilities that may have been incurred before the repeal should come into operation? According to the contest of Mr. Metcalf all inchoate proceedings—any proceeding in respect of a felony, or by way of indictment—were rendered null, and impunity was given for all offences which previously were punishable. I cannot find any rational ground upon which I can come to the conclusion that the Legislature intended to give such impunity, or to stop proceedings that were begun for the prosecution of an offence, before the guilt of the party was inquired into, and before, if found guilty, retribution was suffered for that offence. The repeal is not to affect any "proceeding pending." In an ordinary action for malicious prosecution, the information before a magistrate, the warrant to apprehend the party, and the indictment, are all steps in the proceedings for the prosecution. It is the constant experience of those conversant with such proceedings that the action may lie in respect of a warrant, it may lie in respect of an information, and it may lie in respect of an indictment founded thereon; that it may lie in respect of either of them, and that all the others may have been taken with reasonable and probable cause, and the last step without it. It is constantly in the course of experience that they are all taken as a series of proceedings constituting the prosecution of the criminal upon the charge—all necessary steps to be taken in prosecution before the indictment. So much as to the branch of the argument that the indictment is not a "proceeding pending" at the time of the repeal. Then as to the other branch of the argument, respecting the penalty incurred and about to be inflicted upon the prisoner in respect of a felony committed before the repeal, whether that is a "penalty incurred" in respect of a "thing done" prior to the repeal coming into operation. To my mind those words are capable of meaning not merely a pecuniary, but any penalty or punishment. "The last penalty of the law" has been adverted to as a phrase indicating the highest punishment that can be inflicted—words certainly capable of being applied to any penalty consequent on any offence. "Penalty" applies to the punishment of death, to penal servitude, to imprisonment, fine, or any infliction which may accrue upon an offence. It seems to me that the intention of the Legislature, notwithstanding the repealing part of the Act, was to leave the responsibility of the bankrupt as it was before the Act came into operation. We have been pressed very much with the fact adverted to that the same or similar words are to be found in other statutes. I say again that every statute is to be construed very much by reference to the state of the law at the time when it came into operation, and the purpose of the law must be construed in a very great degree by the words contained in the statute itself. In respect to the cases founded on the 12 & 13 Vict., the same clause there speaks of the "recovery and application" of the penalty. The recovery and application of any penalty was, it is said, there stated in the nature of words signifying rather a pecuniary penalty recovered and applied than an infliction of punishment. I say again that the words are to be construed by reference to the statute itself, and that no "proceeding pending" in respect of any "thing done," and no "penalty incurred in respect of any thing done" is to be affected by the repealing section. In sect. 221 some of the offences of which the bankrupt may be guilty under the statute are provided for, and the words of that section are, "From and after the commencement of this Act, any bankrupt who shall do any of the acts or things following, with intent to defraud or defeat the rights of his creditors, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and shall be liable, at the discretion of the court before which he shall be convicted, to punishment by imprisonment for not more than three years, or to any greater punishment attached to the offence by any existing statute"—felony, misdemeanor, or penalty, as the matter may be. The Legislature, at the time when they were drawing this Act, said, virtually, "For the future the bankrupt shall be liable in respect of any acts or things following;" and with respect to the old law, "the repeal shall not affect any proceedings pending, or any penalty incurred in respect of any act or thing done before the repeal of the old Act. For the future they are to be proceeded against under this section. But for acts before the repeal came into operation, and the penalties incurred in respect of them, they shall be inflicted according to the provisions of the former statute." I observe that in the cases which have been before decided upon other statutes, such as the game laws, and treason by coining, the issuing of the writ for the apprehension of the parties has been considered as a continuation of the proceedings, the warrant beginning and the indictment terminating the "proceedings pending;" so that it seems to me that I should not lay much stress on those decisions founded on other statutes, because I think that the ground of construction of each statute ought to be state of the law at the time it was brought into the Legislature and the purpose of the Legislature in bringing in the statute, and then the construction to be put on the words, if very usual words, or if capable of a variety of meanings, that the one ought to be chosen which most consists with the purpose of the Legislature, and with the whole statute, taking it in connection with the state of the law at the time; and taking this statute in connection with the state of the law at the time it was passed, and the purpose of the Legislature, I am clearly of opinion that there can be no rational reason assigned why all the criminals under the last statute should have an immunity, and that absolutely all proceedings should be rendered null, and that a man committing an offence under this Act shall not be reached by a penal indictment. No rational purpose can be suggested for giving to the words the meaning which Mr. Metcalfe has dwelt upon, as taken by themselves, without any reference to the rational purpose of the Legislature. Without that rational purpose they are incapable of the meaning which he has given to them; but, in my humble judgment, having reference to the rational purpose of the Legislature, and the state of the law at the time of the enactment, they are capable of the meaning I have given to them, and for that reason I am of opinion that the conviction must be sustained.

BLACKBURN, J.—I am of the same opinion. The 230th section enacts, "that the Acts and parts of Acts set forth in schedule G. to the extent to which they are therein expressed to be repealed, and all other Acts or parts of Acts which are inconsistent with that Act are repealed, but such repeal shall not affect any proceeding pending, or any right that has arisen or may arise, or any penalty incurred or that may be incurred in respect of any transaction, act, matter, or thing done or existing prior to or at the commencement of that Act under or by virtue of any of the Acts or part of Acts repealed. Under that section the parts of the 13 & 14 Vict. c. 106, which created the felony of which the prisoner was found guilty, is repealed. I perfectly agree with the decision in Reg. v. Nairn, that if that provision had been simply repealed, the felony would no longer be in existence; but the section reserves power to proceed in respect of existing crimes, which would be otherwise done away with. The first question is, was this a proceeding pending? Now, I think it was the intention of the Legislature, by this saving clause, to prevent criminals going free. The word "penalties" used by the draftsman is large enough to extend to all kinds of punishments, whether pecuniary or affecting life or limb, or any other. In Reg. v. Nairn the decision turned on the effect of the words in the saving clause of the repeal section of 12 & 13 Vict. c. 106, and that clause was held only to apply to summary proceedings under which a penalty could be awarded. The context there showed that the Legislature was speaking of penalties of the same kind, and not of penalties in the nature of

REG. v. VESTRY OF ST. LUKE'S, CHELSEA.

[Q. B.]

imprisonment or penal servitude. In the present Act there is nothing in the context or Act to show that the test was intended to be, whether the penalty was of a pecuniary nature or not, but the words of the section will apply to every kind of penalty. For the reasons given by the Lord Chief Justice, it seems to me that the Legislature by this enactment never supposed that criminals who had committed offences were to be set free, but that in future a different code was to prevail.

KEATING, J.—I am of the same opinion. The question is not whether more apt words might not have been used for keeping alive the provisions in the old Act relating to offences, but whether the words used in the new Act are sufficient for that purpose; and, for the reasons already given, I am of opinion that they are sufficient.

WILDE, B.—I am of the same opinion. I have been very clearly of opinion all through the discussion that the prisoner was rightly convicted, and that under the words "proceeding pending" the Legislature might fairly be deemed to include such a case as the present. I should expect to find very strong words if it had been intended to let free all persons who had previously offended against the provisions of the former Act. In Wallace's case, 1 East, P. C. 186, where the question was, whether the prosecution had been commenced within time, the judges unanimously held, that the information and proceeding before the magistrate were the commencement of the prosecution within the meaning of the statute; and so in Reg. v. Brooks, 1 Den. C. C. 217, the information and warrant were held the commencement of a prosecution for night-poaching, under 9 Geo. 4, c. 69. These cases are authorities for saying that the information and warrant are parts of a proceeding pending in the present case. The second point is equally plain. The term "penalty" is broad enough to include criminal punishment. The 12 & 13 Vict. c. 106, s. 254, in dealing with the offence of perjury, uses the words "shall be liable to the penalties of wilful and corrupt perjury."

MELLOR, J.—I am of the same opinion. The section relied on, when taken in connection with the other sections of the Act, clearly was not intended to affect existing liabilities. Conviction affirmed.

REG. v. VESTRY OF ST. LUKE'S, CHELSEA.

Metropolis Local Management Act, sect. 69—Mandamus—Discretion of vestry—Priority of sewerage works in particular places.

A mandamus reciting the Metropolis Local Management Act ordered a metropolitan vestry to make a sewer for the use of a partly finished street in the parish. The vestry in their return said there were other parts of the parish in course of being drained which in their discretion they thought more important, and the particular works were not necessary, and that they could not do all the works at once:

Held, this return was a good answer, and that the mandamus in order to be valid ought to have shown some reason why that particular part of the sewerage works was to be singled out and done at once in preference to all others:

Held further, that the mandamus was bad because it ordered the vestry to make a sewer, which it required the previous sanction of the Metropolitan Board of Works to make, and so the writ was conditional.

Mandamus.—Victoria, &c., to the Vestry of the parish of St. Luke, Chelsea, Middlesex, greeting:—Whereas, the said parish of St. Luke, Chelsea, is a parish mentioned in schedule A to the 18 & 19 Vict. c. 120, entitled "An Act for the better local management of the Metropolis;" and whereas, after the passing and coming into operation of the said Act of Parliament, it became and was necessary for effectually draining a certain part of the said parish, called Limerston-street, that the said vestry should make certain sewers and works, and they were duly requested to make the said sewers and works, by and on behalf of Edward Wigan and John Alfred Wigan, the owners of certain houses in the said street, whose property was greatly injured for want of such sewers and works for effectually draining the same, and to take all necessary steps in that behalf; but that the said vestry had neglected and refused to make such sewers and works as were necessary for effectually draining the said part of the parish, or to take all or any necessary steps or step in that behalf, in contempt of us, &c., to the great damage of the said Edward Wigan and John Alfred Wigan. Whereupon, they have humbly besought us that a fit and speedy remedy may be supplied in this respect. Now we, being willing that due and speedy justice be done in the premises, as it is reasonable, do command you, the said vestry of the parish of St. Luke, Chelsea, in the county of Middlesex, firmly enjoining you that, immediately after the receipt of this our writ, you cause to be made such sewers and works as may be necessary for effectually draining that part of the said parish called Limerston-street, and that you take all necessary steps in that behalf, or that you show us cause to the contrary thereof; lest by your default the same complaint shall be repeated to us, and how you shall have executed this our writ make known to us at Westminster, on Friday, the 2nd of Nov. next, then returning to us this writ, and this you are not to omit.—Witness, &c.

Return.—That the said sewers and works in the said writ mentioned and commanded to be made, are not nor were necessary for effectually draining the said parish of St. Luke, Chelsea, in the said writ mentioned, within the meaning of the said Act of Parliament in the said writ mentioned. That Limerston-street is a street formed after the passing and within the limits of a certain Act of Parliament passed in the ninth year of the reign of Queen Victoria, for better paving, lighting, cleansing, regulating and improving the said parish of St. Luke, Chelsea, exclusive of the district of Hants-town, in the county of Middlesex, and that the said street was never sufficiently paved, flagged, stoned, gravelled, levelled, drained and sewered to the satisfaction of the commissioners for putting the last-mentioned Act into execution, and has never been sufficiently paved, flagged, stoned, gravelled, levelled, drained and sewered to the satisfaction of the said vestry, since the coming into operation of the said Act for the better local management of the metropolis in the said writ mentioned, and that it was and is the duty and obligation of the respective owners of the houses and tenements adjoining or abutting on the said street on each side thereof, subject to the directions contained in the last-mentioned Act, and in the Act for the better local management of the metropolis in the said writ mentioned, and in the bye-laws made and published by the Metropolitan Board of Works under and pursuant thereto, at their own respective charges and expenses, to well and sufficiently pave, flag-stone, gravel, level, drain and sewer so much of the said street to the centre thereof as was and is opposite to and co-extensive with their respective houses or tenements adjoining or abutting on such street. That Limerston-street is a road or way set out by and at the expense of private parties, for the use and accommodation of certain private property near thereto, partly built and partly unbuilt upon; that the soil of the said road or way is private property; that the said road or way is not a highway repairable by the inhabitants of the said parish, and has never been paved or made in a proper or substantial manner. That a large portion of the land abutting on the said road or way is uninclosed building land, upon which no houses have been erected or begun to be erected. That the said road or way is not a street within the meaning of the said Act of Parliament for the better local management of the metropolis in the said writ mentioned. That there is in a certain part of the said parish of St. Luke, Chelsea, to wit, in King's-road, near to the said road or way called Limerston-street, a public sewer vested in and cleansed and maintained by the said vestry, conveniently situated and well adapted as an outlet for the drainage of the said road or way, and of the houses and land abutting thereon. That the vestry are ready and willing, subject to the previous approval of the said Metropolitan Board of Works, to permit the respective owners of the said road or way and the said houses and land, at their own costs and charges, to drain the same into the said public sewer in the King's-road aforesaid. That the said vestry were not nor are now by law liable or bound under or by virtue of the said Act of Parliament for the better local management of the metropolis in the said writ mentioned, or otherwise, to cause to be made the said sewers and works in the said writ mentioned and thereby commanded to be made. That the said vestry have, from the time of the passing of the said Act for the better local management of the metropolis in the said writ mentioned, exercised a reasonable discretion and judgment in causing to be made such sewers and works as were in their judgment from time to time necessary for effectually draining the said parish, and had, in exercise of such reasonable judgment and discretion, and with the previous approval of the said Metropolitan Board of Works in manner directed by the said Act for the better local management of the metropolis, caused to be made divers sewers and works in and for the drainage of the parish, which sewers and works the said vestry in the exercise of such reasonable discretion and judgment as aforesaid had deemed expedient and proper to cause to be made before and at the time of the issuing of the said writ of mandamus, or at any time since, in execution of and for the purposes of the said Act for the better local management of the metropolis in the said writ mentioned. That the sums required for causing to be made and completed the several sewers and works necessary for effectually draining the whole of the said parish in the writ mentioned would amount to a very large sum, to wit, to a sum exceeding 12,000/., and that the moneys in their possession or control before and at the time of the issuing of the said writ of mandamus, or at any time since, were and are wholly inadequate and insufficient to defray the cost of making and completing such sewers and works. That the said vestry could not, otherwise than by making and levying rates wholly exorbitant and unreasonable in amount, and vexatious and oppressive to the ratepayers of the said parish, raise sums which would be sufficient to defray the cost of making and completing the said sewers and works, and also to meet the costs, charges and expenses to which sewers rates leviable within the said parish in the said writ mentioned are now liable by law; that is to say, the costs and charges of and incident to the cleansing, maintaining and managing the existing sewers in the said parish vested in the said vestry, the payment of the interest and portions of the principal of the mortgage-debts of the late Metropolitan Commissioners of Sewers, contracted under the Metropolitan Sewers Act 1848, and the Acts for continuing and amending the same, and charged under the said Acts upon the said parish, amounting to 8226l. 10s. 5d., and the payments of the amounts required by precepts of the said Metropolitan Board of Works, and payable by the said vestry for and towards expenses of the said board in the execution of the said Act of Parliament in the said writ mentioned, and for raising moneys for the Metropolis Main Drainage rate, under and pursuant to the Act 22 Vict. c. 104, for altering and amending the Metropolis Local Management Act 1855, and extending the powers of the Metropolitan Board of Works for the purification of the Thames and the main drainage of the metropolis; and for those reasons and causes, the said vestry had not caused to be made the said sewers and works in the said writ mentioned, or taken all necessary steps in that behalf mentioned.

REG. v. VESTRY OF ST. LUKE'S, CHELSEA.

Pleas:—1. To the whole return, that the sewers and works in the said writ mentioned and thereby commanded to be made were and are necessary for effectually draining the said parish of St. Luke, Chelsea, in the said writ mentioned, within the meaning of the said Act of Parliament in the said writ mentioned. Issue thereon. 2. To the whole return except the statement above traversed in the first plea, that the part of the return herein pleaded to is bad in substance. Joinder in demurrer. 3. To the whole return except the statement traversed in the first plea, that the vestry have not made any order that the said street called Limerston-street should be sewered pursuant to the local Act in the said return referred to, and that divers of the owners of the houses and tenements adjoining or abutting on the said street on each side thereof, have refused at their own expense or charge respectively to sewer any part of the said street, of which the said vestry had notice long before the issuing of the said writ of mandamus, and the owners of the said houses and tenements adjoining to or abutting on the said street, willing to sewer such part of the said street as is opposite to and co-extensive with their respective houses or tenements adjoining or abutting on the said street, could not make the sewers and works mentioned in the mandamus; of all which the said vestry had notice long before the issuing of the said writ and before the request in the said writ mentioned. Demurrer to this plea, and joinder therein.

The 69th section of the Act, 18 & 19 Vict. c. 120, enacts, "the vestry of every parish mentioned in schedule A to this Act, and the board of works for every district mentioned in schedule B to this Act, shall (subject to the powers by this Act vested in the Metropolitan Board of Works) from time to time repair and maintain the sewers under this Act vested in them, or such of them as shall not be discontinued, closed up or destroyed under the powers herein contained; and shall cause to be made, repaired and maintained such sewers and works, or such diversions or alterations of sewers and works, as may be necessary for effectually draining their parish or district, and shall cause all banks, wharves, docks, or defences abutting on or adjoining on any river, stream, canal, pond, or watercourse in such parish or district, to be raised, strengthened, or altered or repaired, where it may be necessary so to do, for effectually draining or protecting from floods or inundation such parish or district; and it shall be lawful for any such vestry or district board to carry any such sewers and works through, across, &c.; provided always, that no new sewer shall be made without the previous approval of the Metropolitan Board of Works," &c. By sect. 137 the Metropolitan Board of Works may declare sewers to be main sewers, and take under their jurisdiction certain sewerage matters. By sect. 138 the Metropolitan Board shall also, from time to time, make orders for controlling vestries, &c., in the construction of sewers, &c.

The Attorney-General (Atherton) and Keane for the prosecutors.—The main question here is, whether the vestry can return to a mandamus calling upon them to make certain sewers, that they have exercised their discretion in the matter, and have decided that other drains and sewers are more important and must

REG. v. VESTRY OF ST. LUKE'S, CHELSEA.

be disposed of first. The vestry do not allege that they have applied for the approval of the Metropolitan Board of Works; nor, on the other hand, do they deny their obligation to make the sewers in question. They only say in substance, that they have done such works as were necessary, and that it would be very expensive to do the particular work now commanded. Their duty, however, is to do this work when commanded. [CROMPTON, J.—Why must this particular part of the work be done immediately? They can't do everything at once. You show no reason why they are to do this particular work at once, or that they have had a reasonable time to do it, and have failed.] The duty on the vestry is imperative to take steps to do the work. [COCKBURN, C. J. — That's your difficulty. They are only bound to do it when due regard has been given to other things which may claim precedence. Now, you call on them to do absolutely what they are only bound to do in a contingency.]

Sir F. Kelly, Q.C. and Welsby for the defts.—It is in the discretion of the vestry, subject to the superintending control of the Metropolitan Board, to do one part of the work before another. It is therefore not compulsory on them to make any particular drain communicating with a particular house. There may be many unfinished streets in so large a parish as this, and isolated houses, and it would be most unjust to call on the vestry to execute the drainage works connected with these before they have time and money to do other works of a more pressing nature. The work to be done and made incumbent on the vestry is of enormous magnitude, and may require half a century to complete it; and it cannot be that any individual owner can at any moment put his finger on a particular part of the work and say, "you must do this immediately." The duty is general, to do the works from time to time, leaving it discretionary in the vestry to determine the order of precedence in which the works are to be done. This particular drain is not shown to be for the good of the parish; it is only for the good of the particular houses. [COCKBURN, J.—Does the return not in substance mean "we will never do the drainage in this particular street at any future time?" If so, that will be a difficulty to be got over.] It is enough for the present to say that it is not necessary now to do the drainage in the particular district. The mandamus does not even say that a reasonable time has elapsed for the doing of the work. The vestry cannot by law construct a new sewer without the approval of the Metropolitan Board of Works, and the mandamus does not say that the approval has been obtained, or that the vestry had been requested to apply for such approval. Moreover, a mandamus does not lie to compel the doing of that which is contingent and uncertain. The mandamus must show an absolute and positive obligation to do this work, and that is not done.

The Attorney-General in reply.—It is enough to show the necessity of doing this work. The duty of the vestry is to drain the whole parish, and if so its duty must be to drain every part. If there is any particular reason why this part should not be drained, it is matter within the knowledge of the defts., and ought to be returned by them. It is enough for the prosecutors to assume that this is part of the whole parish, and the whole parish is to be drained. [CROMPTON, J.—I rather think it lies on you to show there is a present and immediate obligation on the vestry to make this drain.]

COCKBURN, C. J.—I am of opinion that this writ of mandamus calling upon the vestry of St. Luke's, Chelsea, to drain a certain street called Limerston-street, is defective. In order to constitute a writ which will be sufficient, there ought to appear on the face of it a present duty on the part of the defts. to do the work in question, and that this duty has not been performed. Now, the only duty shown is a general duty to drain, &c.

the whole of the parish, and it does not appear that in this particular instance there is any present duty to do the particular work. By the Metropolitan Local Management Act I agree that there is imposed on the vestry a general duty to drain the parish, and this involves all the parts of the parish; but I think also, that in the discharge of that duty a reasonable time for its discharge is necessarily implied; and I think, when we consider the magnitude and extent of the works thereby imposed, and the nature of the funds which are to defray the expense, there must be vested in the body on which that duty is cast some discretion to select the extent and order of their operations, in reference to the means at their disposal, and with reference to the greater or less degree of necessity for selecting one district in preference to another. It cannot be expected that the vestry are to levy the whole sum necessary to complete the works at once. The work must be done with reference to what is reasonable and proper under the circumstances. Therefore some discretion must be vested in the vestry or local board to select one part of the works, to begin with, in preference to another. It may well be that in reference to this locality the vestry may have thought the works in other parts of the parish were of more pressing necessity, and that this locality might wait for a time. Taking all those circumstances into consideration, I do not think it is enough to say that there is a large part of the parish undrained; it must be shown that there was a present duty on the vestry to do this work, and that a reasonable time for its discharge had elapsed. Now, the present duty is not at all shown in this mandamus. Another objection raised is, that this is a conditional duty, the condition being that the approval of the Metropolitan Board of Works was to be first obtained. I do not think such a conditional mandamus as this has ever been issued before. In the event of a peremptory mandamus issuing, what would be the return? It would be that the vestry had applied to the Metropolitan Board for their approval, and that they had or had not obtained it, and if they had not obtained it, then they could not do this work. I see a difficulty in such a course, though perhaps such a difficulty might be got over by issuing two writs of mandamus applicable respectively to the cases of their obtaining and their not obtaining this approval. I do not, therefore, rely on this objection at present. It is enough to say that the other objection is fatal.

CROMPTON, J.—I think it is now very well established that on a return to the writ of mandamus the title may be questioned, and the title here does not warrant the mandatory part of the writ. The question is, if the recital warrants the conclusion that this particular part of the works is to be done immediately? I think it does not. The writ does not follow the words of the statute, which apply generally to the whole parish, but it selects a particular part of the parish, and says certain works in this part are necessary, and must be done immediately. That won't do; you must show that this particular part of the parish is to be drained in priority to the other parts. Now, it is plain from the statute that there must of necessity be some discretion left to the body which is to do all these works as to the order and time of doing them. Then what is there to show either that there are funds or other circumstances making it necessary that this part of the works shall be done at once? This is not made out. I adhere to what I have said before, that though the mandatory part of the mandamus may be very general, still a title must be shown. Now, the real duty here under the statute is to do what ought to be done first, having reference to all the circumstances, and in the exercise of the discretion of the board upon those circumstances. Now all discretion is sought to be excluded by this writ, and this part of the parish sought to be immediately drained without any reference to the claims of the other parts of the parish. I think also that the writ is defective for not showing that the duty is absolute on the vestry, seeing that they must obtain the previous sanction of the Metropolitan Board of Works. I do not say it was for that board to interfere, but I do think that no duty lies on the defts. absolutely to do the work, and therefore the writ could only be for the vestry to go to the Board of Works and get its sanction. Now that is conditional, it is making the matter dependent on the will of third parties whether the work is to be done or not. In that case the only course would be to get a second writ of mandamus after the vestry had gone before the Metropolitan Board. Still, that is a defect in this writ of mandamus. Therefore on both points the mandamus fails. This is the case of a series of works to be done, and the writ does not show anything to warrant its mandatory part, whereby one part is to be preferred to all others, and also the writ is conditional.

MELLOR, J.—I am of the same opinion. The statute imposes a general duty on the vestry, and without saying to what extent the interference of this court might go, still there is some discretion in the vestry, and the writ takes that discretion away, and so there is no title shown. I also think that the objection that this is a conditional writ is fatal. The writ ought to show that the duty lies imperatively on the defts. to do the work without the necessity of consulting the will of a third party on whose decision the work is contingent. On both grounds the writ is bad.
